Had I time, Mr. Editor, I might make a few suggestions as to the real source whence springs this morbid dread of chanting the Psalter and other parts of the church service not ordinarily so celebrated in these days. For the present, I must conclude with the hope that PRINCIPLE will not overlook the remarks I have taken the liberty to make on this subject. For I cannot but think that he did overlook the extract from Bishop White's Memoirs, which I gave in the Banner of Dec. 9th. Upon any other supposition it is difficult to account for his second attack, upon the assumed ground that he had the American reviewers of the Liturgy on his side. Permit me also to express a hope that SACERDOS will not scorn to allow me to follow his lead in this good cause.

With sincere respect,

I remain very truly yours,

THE CALIFORNIA BISHOPRIC.

MR. EDITOR:

The communication of your correspondent in the last number, in which he suggests the necessity of early measures for the establishment of a Bishopric in California, is every way worthy of attention by the Church. The Board of Missions might hesitate—on the grounds of the additional expense, and of the backwardness of the Church to meet and supply the wants of those already in the field. I would suggest the importance and necessity of adopting early measures to endow a Bishopric for California, so that at the earliest possible opportunity, we might have a Bishop upon the spot. It may seem somewhat of a novelty in this country to endow Bishoprics at the outset;—but its novelty is no objection against it,—besides that—as I apprehend—we shall be obliged ere long to have resort to this plan for sustaining all our Missionary Bishops. The plan of endowment is adopted—however imperfectly—in all our large dioceses, and I am well satisfied that it would be productive of rich benefits in the instance of California. There is no want of means in the Church; but we have, in some way, overlooked the right plan of drawing out these means. Now, why not make the attempt—let it be a bold and decided attempt to make at once an endowment for California. Let an agent—I would suggest, visit all our principal cities, and lay the matter before the Church, and where he cannot visit the rural parishes, let him urge the matter by letter. Fifty subscribers of one thousand dollars each, would make the endowment; or a thousand subscribers of fifty dollars each would make it. Better still perhaps,—if fifty Churches or even less would open a correspondence with each other, and mutually pledge the Church to raise the required sum. Could it not be done? Certainly it could be. Let Philadelphia say that she will give ten thousand dollars of the sum; New York will follow; and the remainder will follow, for such an example would prove contagious. Let the thing be started. A beginning is all that is wanted. Call a meeting of all the City Rectors, and as many of the Country Rectors as can conveniently assemble, and have the subject laid before them—the Bishop presiding. The work would go forward. The prayers would be answered; and California would have a Bishop, who would watch—with his clergy, the sheep of Christ's flock who are scattered abroad. *

And now, let me suggest another plan. The close of 1848 witnesses the agitation of this question. Let the beginning of 1849 witness united and earnest prayer that God will send forth more labourers into His harvest; and especially that He will give us Bishops for California and Africa. It was just after He had prayed to His Father during a whole night, that Christ instituted the Apostle's office and appointed the twelve to minister in His name and stead. And for myself, I nothing doubt—that if in our private devotions we keep these two missions prominently before us—God will give us both the Bishops. We may appeal to the purses of our people and accomplish but little. An earnest appeal to the Lord of the harvest, would bring us both the means and brethren.

P. P. ON THE AMERICAN TRACT SOCIETY.

MR. EDITOR,

Allow me to say, that while I sympathize with P. P. in respect to the book trade, at least so far as to regret that it should receive any material harm by the agencies of the Tract Society, or others, yet in view of the spiritual wants of remote parts of the country, I cannot but bless the Providence that supplies them, by any Christian hand. I live in a region of this State, where no bookseller does any thing to supply the wants of the many scattered over the country, out of the villages. There are hundreds of families, who are inevitably left without religious books, unless they are sent to their door. If the regular booksellers would send out such men as the colporteurs, with such books, at such prices, this will do: but will they? And if not, they should be willing, in order to save the scattered sheep and lambs of Christ's fold, to suffer any thing that may come upon them by new modes of circulating books. It seems to me, knowing as I do, things that a city bookseller cannot so well understand, or at least clearly see, that I would sooner lose my right hand than pen a line against the American Tract Society, in regard to this branch of its operations. Could P. P. visit some of our wildernesses, and learn how many are taught repentance toward God, and faith in our Lord Jesus Christ, by the Colporteur system, I am sure his benevolence would drive away all unpleasant thoughts of it, and bid it God speed. For myself, I should not dare oppose, were the incidental and temporal evils, occasioned by it, tenfold what they are.

The origin of the name WORD, applied by St. John to our blessed Lord.

MR. EDITOR:

At this season, when we are called upon to commemorate the Nativity of the Saviour, it may not be uninteresting to some, to learn the probable origin of the appellation “Word,” by which the “beloved disciple” designates Him.

The use of this term in manifest reference to the Second Person of the Adorable Trinity, is, among the writers of the New Testament, peculiar to St. John. Whence did he derive it?

Some would have us believe, from Plato. And in favor of this theory say, that St. John's residence at Ephesus, between which and Alexandria, where Platonists were numerous, the intercourse was frequent, would afford him opportunity of becoming acquainted with Platonic philosophy and phraseology. But though Plato used the term, he does not plainly intend thereby a substantial person, as does the Apostle. Not to urge the improbability of his borrowing from the philosopher, we must therefore seek elsewhere the derivation of the term.

Not a few in ancient, as well as modern times, have supposed the Apostle's usage to be taken from the Old Testament Scriptures; and think the Second Person in the Trinity is meant by the term as it occurs in such passages as the following, “By the word of the Lord were the heavens made,” “The Lord appeared again in Shiloh: for the Lord revealed himself to Samuel in Shiloh by the word of the Lord.” But though this opinion is highly probable, yet it must be acknowledged that these, and other similar passages, are susceptible of another interpretation.

The opinion carrying with it the highest degree of probability, would seem to be that which traces the use of the term, as applied to the Deity, to the Chaldee Targums. These are paraphrases, rather than literal translations of the Old Testament Scriptures; written by learned Jews, for the benefit of their countrymen; to many of whom that tongue was more familiar, after the Babylonish captivity, than the pure Hebrew. No doubt those Jews who returned from Babylon brought with them incorporated into their language many Chaldee words and idioms. So that, (as some infer from Nehemiah viii. 8., in which it is said of the Levites and others who ministered in the congregation, “They read in the book of the law of God distinctly, and gave the sense, and caused them to understand the reading;”) it became thenceforth necessary, when the Scriptures were read in the original, to interpret or explain them, for their sakes, who had ceased to have a perfect understanding of the tongue of their fathers.

This necessity was probably increased from time to time, by the return of other Jews, until at length, to meet their wants, the Chaldee Targums were prepared.

The authors of the two principal, one upon the Pentateuch, and the other upon the historical and prophetic books, Onkelos and Jonathan, are believed to have flourished, the former, during the reign of Herod the Great; the latter, a little later, and but a short time before our Lord's advent. In these books, where the Hebrew has simply “Jehovah,” the paraphrasts have substituted the title “the word Jehovah” or “the Jehovah word;” particularly in those places in which God is represented as speaking or acting. And although the term is used by them to denote a Divine being, yet sometimes it is employed in speaking of a person not identical with the Father.

A similar use of the term occurs in the apocryphal book of Wisdom, thought to have been composed by an uninspired writer about the time of the Maccabees. The passage is so remarkable that I will quote it. The author is describing the slaying of the first-born of the Egyptians.

“While all things were in quiet silence, and that night was in the midst of her swift course, thine Almighty Word leaped down from heaven, out of thy royal throne, as a fierce man of war into the midst of a land of destruction, and brought thine unfeigned commandment, as a sharp sword, and standing up filled all things with death; and it touched the heaven, but it stood upon the earth.”

Through the influence of these writings upon the religious phraseology of the Jews, the term “Word” came at length to be applied in the Evangelist's time, to that Redeemer who is constantly spoken of in the Old Testament, but variously designated, according to the varying usage of the time.

The fact that St. John wrote at a later date than they, would satisfactorily explain, why the other writers of the New Testament do not employ the term as well as he.

If, as the fathers, and even some Jews supposed, God has ever made his communications to man through the instrumentality of the Second Person in the ever blessed Trinity, the application of this term to Him who was the medium of communication, was most beautifully appropriate. And if so for the Jews, how much more for us who live since his advent in the flesh, and enjoy the benefit of his recorded teachings, of whom St. John writes, “No man hath seen God at any time; the only begotten Son, who is in the bosom of the Father, he hath declared him?” For as language is the vehicle for the conveyance of our thoughts to others, so was the Eternal Word the channel of communication from God to man—“no man knoweth the Father, save the Son, and he to whomsoever the Son will reveal him.” The other gospels are chiefly taken up with the record of the acts of the Saviour; this of St. John, with the account of his teachings.” There is therefore a peculiar propriety in the use of the term by him. Studious of brevity, I will close this article with an exquisitely beautiful and suggestive simile of the “Incarnate Word,” taken from the “Acts of the council of Ephesus.” “The discourse which we utter, which we use in conversation with each other, is incorporeal, imperceptible, impalpable; but clothed in letters or characters, it becomes material, perceptible, tangible. So too the word of God, which was naturally invisible, becomes visible, and that comes before us in tangible form, which was by nature incorporeal.”

Festival of St. John, Ev., 1848.

Rev. Dr. Hagen?

From the English Churchman.

There are many well-meaning persons who consider it very uncharitable to assert that Dissent has a natural and manifest tendency towards Infidelity. “Granted,” they say, “that those who separate themselves from the Church miss many privileges and blessings, still, they are Christians—they believe in the Bible, though they do not believe in the Church.”

If such apologists would only take the trouble to place clearly before themselves the several items of Doctrine and Discipline which they deem essential to a Christian, and would then go through the catalogue, striking out everything which is denied by some one of the numerous sectarians, they would find that what remained constituted a mere fragment of that “faith once delivered to the Saints.” A principle, which, when honestly applied, sets aside any portion of that faith, must necessarily have an infidel tendency. The amount of infidelity may be small; but it may be large without altering either the principle or its application.

What the amount of infidelity may be in the following leading article from one of the most able of the Dissenting organs—the Nonconformist—we leave to the decision of any one who has read the Bible in simplicity and truth, and who recalls to his mind the numerous precepts, promises, and examples which plainly prove the utter falsehood of such assertions and arguments:—

THE PRAYER FOR THE CHOLERA.

It would appear that we are living in an age of cant—in a day when great sounding words are currently received and devoutly reiterated, although they may fail to represent one truthful idea. Last year a fast was proclaimed, and a prayer was read in all the Churches, on account of the potato rot; this year, for the sake of a little variety, we have the prayer without the fast, and the reason is, that we are threatened with the cholera. Now, it appears to us, that the reasonableness or absurdity of this may be made to appear by one simple question; namely, are we, or are we not, living in the age of miracles? Have we, or have we not, any authority given, or any precedent to which we can refer, to encourage the idea that the ordinary routine of the natural laws of creation will be interrupted in consequence of prayer? If we are living in such an age, or if we have such authority, then is the Archbishop of Canterbury right in what he has done; but if, on the contrary, we know that no such interruption will take place, and never has taken place, since the time of miracles, then we think there can be only one name given to the prayer in question, namely, that it is the very essence and spirit of cant. In order to render the position we have taken more clear, it will be necessary to give our idea of what prayer really is, and for what it is commanded; and in so doing, we must first assume, not only as being in accordance with reason, but with Scripture also, that all prayer should be effectual; that is to say, that every word used in prayer should have its origin in belief, and its result in establishing that belief in the mind; and that all prayer which has not this origin and result, is mere waste of words—mere senseless vapour.

Now, if this is so, it follows, necessarily, that we must pray for nothing except where we believe that our supplication will be granted; and as all belief rests either on experience or testimony, so must we be satisfied by one or the other of these authorities, that our prayer will be effectual before it can be called the prayer of faith. Thus, for instance, a man may pray for health in time of sickness, for rain in time of drought, or for wealth in time of poverty; but having neither of these authorities for such prayer, he has no belief that it will be replied to, and he has, therefore, no right to offer it up; his spirit may, indeed, be stirred within him, he may be moved to ecstasy, and his words may be like the sound of many waters, but they will also be like water spilt upon the ground, which cannot be gathered up; he will find no result in his own mind, and his prayer will have been of no effect. But let a man, on the other hand, offer up this prayer, “Thy will be done,” and the result will be resignation; why? because he has, in the first place, the testimony of Christ that such a prayer is acceptable to God, and he has also the experience of its efficacy on himself, or he could not have offered the prayer, which is simply resignation rendered audible. Thus, then, it must be evident, that the object of prayer is to benefit the mind of man, by bringing it into communion with the mind of God, and therefore any prayer which is not in accordance with that mind, and which is not the result of the certainty of such accordance, must be unacceptable.

To enter upon any refutation of this miserable attempt to destroy men's faith in the efficacy of Prayer to ALMIGHTY GOD—the very foundation of every species of worship—would be almost as insulting to our readers as it is unnecessary. We give the extract simply as a significant specimen of the “Development” of Dissent.—English Churchman.

The Society then adjourned to attend Divine Service. Evening prayer was said by the Rev. F. Ogilby, and the Lessons read by the Rev. M. A. De W. Howe. After which the Report of the Board of Managers was read by the Rev. H. E. Montgomery, and a most instructive and eloquent Sermon preached by the Rev. Dr. Coleman, from the text St. Matthew, 10: 6. "But go rather to the lost sheep of the house of Israel."

From the Report, which was a very interesting one, we learned that the receipts of this Society, during the past year, were $3328 59, the expenditures, $3481 71, making a deficiency of funds amounting to $153 12.

The Society provides in part, for the support of twenty-one Missionaries. These labor in twenty-five organized Parishes, embracing about 700 families. They have baptized 27 adults, and 248 infants. Ninety-seven candidates have been prepared by them, for confirmation, and 124 persons added to the list of the Church's communicants. The whole number of communicants within their Missions, 800.

Although the collection at this meeting was small, we are happy to say that St. STEPHEN'S church, always the most liberal supporter of this Society, made up for the deficiency.

The collection in this Church on the first Sunday after Epiphany, amounted to SEVEN HUNDRED AND FIFTY DOLLARS.

CHURCH OF THE REDEMPTION.

MR. EDITOR:

Unless the Vestry of the "Church of the Redemption," can raise twelve hundred dollars within a few weeks, we fear the parish will be involved in difficulties, and the church property endangered. We did hope that the appeal of the Rector would have been responded to in a more liberal and prompt manner. But only two churchmen have come forward to aid this mission, in her time of suffering need. These gentlemen have given very generously, their noble liberality will not be forgotten by the congregation at Fairmount. Let others follow their example, relieve the parish from her embarrassments, and place this highly important mission upon a firm basis. Whatever is to be done must be done AT ONCE. Let there be no delay. Shame, shame if the Episcopalians of our city permit the first and only Episcopal church at Fairmount, to pass into the possession of those hostile to the purpose for which it has been erected.

Donations in aid of this mission may be left with the Rev. George A. Durborow, Callowhill above Schuylkill Front; Osmon Reed, Esq., 74 Market street, or with any of the Vestry.

WISCONSIN.

We give the following extract from a letter received from the Missionary at Beloit, the Rev. Mr. Millett, acknowledging the receipt of the sums contributed through the Editor of the Banner.

"I have delayed acknowledging the receipt of the sum of $53 which you kindly remitted for the church at Beloit, until this late period, that I might be able to make more full and definite statements of our wants and our doings. Like most other western parishes, this is feeble in point of numbers and means. But feeble as we are, the necessity is now deeply felt by the few decided churchmen here, of doing something, and that, immediately. It gives me pleasure to be able to say to you, that a few evenings since, we resolved to enter into a contract with the mason, to draw the stone this winter, and put up the walls the first thing in the spring. We have an excellent plan from Mr. Otis of Buffalo, which it is the intention of the committee to follow implicitly. The encouragement to build, is increasing every day. I doubt not that as soon as the people of the village find that we put our own hands to the work, and are determined to persevere, that they will assist us considerably. The few churchmen have to exert themselves beyond their means; and we shall need the assistance of our brethren at the East, in order to accomplish the work. Money is difficult to be obtained here; and most of those who give, are obliged to give labor or materials, such as stone, lime, &c. Lumber we have to pay the money for."

ALABAMA.

ORDINATION.—On Sunday December 17th, in St. Paul's church, Selma, the Right Rev. N. H. Cobbs, D. D., ordained to the order of Priesthood the Rev. W. A. Stickney. The candidate was presented by the Rev. J. H. Linebaugh, and the sermon preached by the Rev. J. H. Morrison. There were also present of the clergy, the Rev. F. B. Lee, the Rev. N. J. Ellis, and the Rev. R. A. Cobbs. At night the Bishop preached and administered the rite of Confirmation to four persons. There was a large attendance on all the services notwithstanding the extreme inclemency of the weather, and every thing seemed to indicate that the Parish was in a very flourishing condition.

DIOCESE OF TENNESSEE.

On the fourth Sunday in Advent, the Rt. Rev. Bishop Otey held confirmations in St. Peter's Church, Columbia. Evening prayer was said by the Rev. Dr. Wheat, Rector of the parish. The sermon was preached by the Rev. Mr. Cressey, and eight persons were confirmed. Of these persons, five were pupils of the Female Institute, the Diocesan school for girls.

On the Sunday after Christmas, the Bishop confirmed five persons in St. John's Church, Ashwood. Morning prayer was said by the Rector, the Rev. Mr. Cressey, and the sermon preached by the Bishop. Two of these persons were colored.

From Church Papers.

MARYLAND.

ORDINATION.—The Advent ordination was holden in St. Andrew's church, Princess Anne. The Bishop preached. Mr. Samuel Kerr Stewart was admitted to the Holy Order of Deacons, on presentation by the Rev. Joseph J. Nicholson, Rector of Somerset Parish. The Rev. Thomas R. B. Trader, Deacon, was ordained to the Priesthood, on presentation by the Rev. J. Crosdale; the Rev. Messrs. Crosdale and Nicholson joining in the imposition of hands.

CONSECRATIONS.—On Thursday, the Feast of St. Thomas the Apostle, Saint Paul's church, Annesessex, in Coventry Parish, Somerset co., was solemnly consecrated to the service of Almighty God. The Deed of Donation was presented by Dr. L. Handy, and read by the Rev. John Crosdale, Rector of the parish. The sentence of Consecration was read by the Rev. James Young, Rector of Worcester Parish. The Bishop preached, administered the Holy Communion, and briefly addressed the congregation both before the offertory and after the conclusion of the services. A very large congregation was in attendance.

On Thursday, the Feast of the Holy Innocents, Grace church, Hungary Neck, Wicomico Parish, Somerset co., was solemnly consecrated to the worship and service of Almighty God.

The deed of Donation was presented in behalf of the Vestry, by Dr. Thomas W. Stone, and read by the Rector, the Rev. Thomas R. B. Trader.

The Bishop preached, and celebrated the Holy Communion, assisted by the Rector.

This very neat church has been occupied for worship about two years, but has only lately been freed from debt, in part by the effort of the late Rector and the parishioners, and in part by the liberality of one whose name is concealed.

CORNER STONE LAID.—On Wednesday morning, December 20th, the corner stone of another new church (the third within as many years) in Coventry Parish, was laid at Dividing Creek, Worcester county. A large congregation assembled for Morning Prayer in the old chapel, immediately adjacent to the site of the new building. After prayers, the Bishop confirmed three persons, addressing them, as usual, before the sponson. The office of confirmation over, the congregation moved in procession headed by the Bishop and clergy, to the place of the corner stone. There the office appointed for that purpose in this diocese was used by the Bishop, assisted by the Rev. Messrs. Crosdale and Young. The last prayer concluded, the congregation returned in procession as before, to the old chapel, where the Bishop delivered the address, and afterward proceeded to the celebration of the Holy Communion, aided by the rector of the parish. The new church, to be called St. Stephen's, is the third upon this site, or immediately adjoining. The present chapel is only a transept built in addition to the first chapel, which becoming ruinous, was pulled down many years ago. All the buildings are of wood.

CONFIRMATIONS.—On the second Sunday in Advent, Dec. 10th, in St. Paul's church, Baltimore, in the morning, thirty-three persons were confirmed.

On Friday, December 15th, in the evening, in St. Peter's church, Salisbury, ten persons.

On Saturday morning, the 16th, in St. Matthew's church, Worcester county, three persons.

On the third Sunday in Advent, in the evening, in St. Paul's church, Berlin, Worcester co., one person.

On Monday morning, the 18th, in All Hallows' church, Snow Hill, two persons.

On Wednesday morning, the 20th, in the Dividing Creek chapel, Coventry Parish, three persons.

On Friday morning, the 22d, in Rehoboth church, Coventry Parish, five persons.

On the fourth Sunday in Advent, December 24th, in St. Andrew's church, Princess Ann, at night, four persons.

On Monday, the Feast of the Nativity, in All Saints' church, Somerset Parish, four persons.

On Wednesday, the Feast of St. John the Evangelist, in St. Paul's church, Spring Hill Parish, ten persons.

On Friday, the 29th of December, in St. Philip's church, Quantico, four persons. [This being the third confirmation at this visitation of Spring Hill Parish, making in all twenty-four persons.]

On the Sunday after Christmas, December 31st, in St. John's church, Huntingdon, Baltimore county, four persons.—Church Times.

WESTERN NEW YORK.

CONSECRATION.—On December 28th, the Festival of the Holy Innocents, the new edifice of St. Peter's Church, Cazenovia, was solemnly consecrated to the worship and service of Almighty God, by the Rt. Rev. Dr. De Lancey, the Bishop of the Diocese.

The Bishop and Clergy in their official robes, were met at the door of the church by the Vestry, and proceeded up the aisle in the opening services. The request to consecrate was handed to the Bishop by Wm. Greenland, Esq., the Senior Warden, and read by the Rev. J. R. Davenport, of Syracuse. The sermon was preached by the Bishop. The holy rite of confirmation was administered immediately before the sermon, and six persons were confirmed, the confirmation preface being read by Mr. Coxe.

Notwithstanding the snow storm, a large congregation attended. It was a joyous day to the church people of Cazenovia, signaling the completion of a work primarily begun by the zealous and persevering piety of a former Missionary, the Rev. Mason Gallagher, and carried out by the pious talent, energy and zeal of his successor, the Rev. Samuel Hanson Coxe, both admirably sustaining the firm, consistent, persevering and noble faith and piety of a few friends of the church in that attractive village, who for years cherished, in steady adherence to the church and its holy principles and doctrines, the faint hope, now happily realized, of seeing an Episcopal church edifice rearing its sacred head among the beautiful mansions of the village. The absence of the Rev. Mr. Gallagher, who is laboring for the winter, in Kentucky, was much regretted by all.

In style of architecture the church is Gothic, and generally after the model of St. Thomas's Church, Hamilton, whose congregation already may see the fruits of their pious example of zeal and devotion to the church.

We learn that the building, erected with great skill, prudence, and judgment, cost about $3400; that pews have already been sold to the amount of $3100, and that the Vestry have yet on hand eight of the best class pews worth about $1000; the whole presenting a blessed encouragement to faithful, pious and constant devotion to the church, under circumstances often dark and disheartening, but now terminating in the reality, and the sunshine of success and joy, and we trust, of enduring good to many to whom it shall hereafter prove to be "none other but the house of God and the gate of heaven."

CONSECRATION OF GRACE CHURCH, ROCHESTER.—On Thursday, the 21st inst., being the Festival of St. Thomas the Apostle, the newly restored church belonging to the parish of Grace Church, (formerly of St. Paul's) Rochester, was consecrated by the Right Rev. the Bishop of the Diocese, in the presence of a numerous attendance of both the clergy and laity.

Confirmation was then administered by the Bishop to eight persons, (one from the Parish at Pittsford,) the Rector reading the confirmation preface. Ibid.

ORDINATION.—On the 29th December, Bishop De Lancey held an ordination in St. Peter's Church, Cazenovia, when Mr. Theodore Marsh Bishop, candidate, was admitted to the holy order of Deacons. The candidate was presented by the Rev. Mr. Gay. The sermon was preached by the Rev. Mr. Wilson, of Sherburne, and the holy communion administered by the Bishop, assisted in the distribution of the elements by the Rev. Mr. Coxe.

INSTITUTION.—On Sunday, December 31st, the Rev. William Bliss Ashley was instituted Rector of St. Paul's Church, Syracuse, by Bishop De Lancey. Mr. Easton, as senior warden, presented the keys of the church to the new Rector. The sermon was preached by the Bishop, and the holy communion was administered by the Rector, assisted by the Rev. Mr. Davenport.

In the afternoon the Rev. Mr. Gay preached at St. Paul's Church, and in the evening the Bishop preached at St. James' Church, the Rev. Mr. Ashley reading prayers, assisted by the Rev. Mr. Davenport, who read the lessons. Full congregations attended these services. Ibid.

CONNECTICUT.

CONSECRATION.—St. Mark's church, New Britain, was consecrated to the service of Almighty God on the 23d ult. by the Rt. Rev. the Bishop of the Diocese. The request to consecrate was read by the Rev. Mr. Capron, and the sentence of Consecration by the Rev. Mr. Jackson. Morning prayer was read by the Rev. Dr. Williams, President of Trinity College, assisted by the Rev. Mr. Chauncey. The Bishop officiated in the Ante Communion service, the Rev. Mr. Jackson reading the Gospel and the Rev. Mr. Fisher the Epistle. The Sermon was by the Rev. Mr. Coxe, from Ps. lxxxiv. 3, "Yea the sparrow hath found a house, and the swallow a nest," &c. It was an earnest and affectionate discourse well suited to the occasion and the circumstances of the parish. After the sermon the Bishop administered the Holy Rite of Confirmation to nine persons.

The prospects of this parish are at present very encouraging though it has seen some dark days. By a most energetic and praiseworthy effort, it has exchanged the former unsightly and badly located house of worship for one convenient in situation and beautiful in appearance. The new church contains 60 pews on the floor of the nave and more than 50 of these were rented at once for a sum more than sufficient to pay the Rector's salary. The village is rapidly increasing in population, so that a few years must see this a strong and well established parish. The Rev. Professor Jackson has labored here as a missionary since Easter 1846, and now resigns the parish into the hands of the Rev. Alexander Capron, of the Diocese of New York, with heartfelt prayers for its peace and prosperity.—Calendar.

Clerical Changes.

The Rev. Jas. A. Woodward, has accepted a call to the Rectorship of St. Thomas' Church, Morgantown, Berks Co., Pa., (late resigned by the Rev. Levi Bull, D. D.), in addition to his previous charge of St. Mark's Church, Honeybrook, Chester co.; and requests, that letters, and papers for him, be directed to the former place.

The Rev. W. W. Lord, Deacon, has been received into the diocese of Maryland from the diocese of New Jersey, by letters dimissory from the Right Reverend the Bishop, and is settled as Assistant to the Rector of St. Ann's Parish, Anne Arundel county. P. O. Annapolis.

The Rev. Samuel K. Stewart, Deacon, has been invited to the Assistant ministership of Coventry Parish, Somerset and Worcester counties, Md. P. O. Princess Ann.

The Rev. W. P. Saunders, late of Little Rock, Arkansas, has removed to Monticello, Florida.

Rev. Alexander Capron has taken charge of St. Mark's Church, New Britain, Ct.

The Rev. Horace Hills, has resigned the charge of Emmanuel Chapel, Glenville, and accepted the Rectorship of Trinity Church, Newton, Conn. Highly commendatory resolutions were passed, as we find from the calendar, by the Vestry of the parish from which Mr. Hills has withdrawn.

Letters and papers intended for the Rev. Wm. Henry Rees, will be directed to New Milford, Conn.

THE CHILD'S DREAM.

(From the Churchman's Monthly Penny Magazine.)

"I dreamed that I sailed to a sunny land,
Where the skies were always blue;
Where roses and lilies bloomed fresh and fair,
And the north wind never blew.
And I had a home,—a beautiful home,—
On that lovely distant shore,
The woodbine and star-light jessamine twined
With the ivy around our door.

"There was fragrance borne on every breath
Of the fresh and balmy breeze,
And music soft in its murmuring sound
In the tops of the lofty trees;
And beautiful birds of the sweetest song,
In the rainbow's colours drest,
Flew fearlessly down to eat from my hand,
And laid in my bosom to rest.

"And mother, dear mother, you, too, were there,
But not with that sad sweet smile,
For sorrow and sickness alike were unknown
In that happy and joyful clime.
Your cheek was no more so deadly pale,
And your brow was free from care,
And your voice had a calm and a peaceful tone
As with me you knelt in prayer.

"My brother, my own twin-brother, was there,
With his dove-like deep blue eyes,
And he smiled, as sweetly he used to smile,
When he looked on the starry skies.
And we played again at our merry old games,
And gathered the dewy flowers,
And wreathed them in garlands around your brow
In the early morning hours.

"Dear mother,—oh! could it be all a dream?
Or is there a sunny land,
Where sometime we all together shall dwell
In one happy household band?
Can I have been, in the still midnight hours,
To my brother's distant home?
Is it far away over those rugged hills,
And over the ocean's foam?"

"Not over those hills, my own darling child,
Not over the deep dark sea,
Is the land where thy lovely brother will dwell
Through a long eternity.
This beautiful earth will fade like thy dream,—
Time seems but as one brief day,—
'Tis only above—'tis only in heaven
Things change not nor pass away."

FÉNELON AMONG THE IROQUOIS.

Read before the New York Historical Society, on the evening of Tuesday, the 5th of December, 1848.

BY ROBERT GREENHOW.

In the course of my researches, with regard to the early discoveries of the French, in the regions of the Great Lakes and the Mississippi, I met with some curious statements, involving a probability of a nature so interesting, especially to the citizens of this state, that I venture to communicate them to the New York Historical Society, which may perhaps consider them not unworthy of its notice.

This probability is no less than that the illustrious Archbishop Fénelon, one of the best and wisest men whom France or any other country has produced, may have passed some of the years of his youth as a missionary among the Iroquois or Five Nations, in the western part of this state. To those who are acquainted with the life and labors of Fénelon, as exhibited by his numerous biographers, such an announcement may appear too strange to merit a moment's attention; and the evidence upon which it rests is indeed very slender. This evidence is, however, uncontradicted by any other; and it will now be laid before the society, with all its qualifications, so as to anticipate all objections, and to present the probability in its simplest expression reduced to its true value.

It will be convenient to begin by showing what is certainly known, and what is not known, of the great Fénelon, during the period which he is here supposed to have spent in America. Many accounts of his life have appeared, of which the most full and authentic is that by Cardinal de Beausset, published at Paris, in 1808, under the title of "History of Fénelon, Archbishop of Cambrai, founded upon original manuscripts."* This is the standard biography of Fénelon, comprising all that could be discovered respecting him, among his own manuscripts, as well as in the Archives of the Government, in those of the Archbishopric of Cambrai, and the Seminary of St. Sulpice, and in all other places from which information could be derived. The work is minute to a fault. Nothing connected with its subject is deemed unworthy of insertion, and the dates of each event are given, whenever they could be procured, with an exactness which cannot be too highly commended.

In this work, particular as it is, no notice appears of any mission undertaken by Fénelon, in America, or in any other country out of France; nor does any other of his biographers give the slightest hint of his having been thus engaged, at any period; nor does anything appear in his writings or his conduct in after life, to countenance such a supposition.

According to Cardinal de Beausset, François de Salignac de la Mothe Fénelon, son of the Count de la Mothe Fénelon, was born on the 6th of August, 1651. Being destined from early youth, and apparently by his own choice, for the ecclesiastical profession, he was placed, first at the College du Plessis, where at the age of fifteen, "he preached a sermon," says his biographer, "which had extraordinary success;" and thence, he was soon after transferred to the Theological Seminary of St. Sulpice, in Paris, under the especial direction of M. Tronson, a learned priest, as his tutor. Whilst at this institution, in 1667, he conceived the desire to enter, immediately, upon a more active scene; and for the attainment of this object, he paid a visit to his uncle and guardian, the Bishop of Sarlat, after several letters had been written to that personage, by himself and by M. Tronson. One of these letters from M. Tronson, dated February, 1667, is given at length by Cardinal de Beausset: the tutor there assures the Bishop, that he has done all in his power to divert the youth—then only sixteen years old—from his design, but "his inclination is still so strong, and his intentions are so entirely disinterested, that I have been obliged to give up the attempt, after employing without effect every means in my power; considering that such being the character of his dispositions, I was not authorized to do violence to his desire." This letter, though long and devoted to the same subject, gives no information as to the nature of the design on which the young man was so strongly bent, as to render his tutor evidently inclined to consider that he should be allowed to prosecute it. "None of his biographers," writes Cardinal de Beausset, "have thrown any light upon this circumstance in the life of Fénelon. Some original documents have, however, been communicated to us, which seem to show that the zeal of Fénelon was then urging him notwithstanding his extreme youth, to consecrate himself to Missions in Canada, where the Congregation of St. Sulpice maintained a considerable establishment in the Isle of Montreal, for the purpose of contributing to the conversion of the savages, and of procuring the succors of religion for the inhabitants of the colony." The Cardinal then proceeds to state, that "the Bishop of Sarlat, alarmed with good reason by a determination so absolutely incompatible with the very delicate health of his nephew, refused his consent and ordered him to return to St. Sulpice, and there to remain until he should have rendered himself, by retirement and study, more worthy of exercising with advantage the ministry to which he believed himself to be specially called."

Immediately following what is last extracted from the History of Fénelon, his biographer says:—"The Abbé de Fénelon,† having received the sacred orders at the Seminary of St. Sulpice, devoted himself to the functions of the Holy Ministry in the community of the priests of the same parish." After some general reflections on the importance of those functions, we next learn that—"He consecrated himself for three entire years to the ecclesiastical ministry, and was then charged by the curate of the parish of St. Sulpice, to explain the Holy Scriptures to the people on Sundays and Holidays, a duty which began to make him known, and from the performance of which he himself derived the greatest advantages. Fénelon was summoned to Sarlat in 1674 by his uncle; we have one of his letters, written from Sarlat to the Marquis de Fénelon [another uncle], without date, in which he, however, speaks of the death of the Marquis de St. Abré, his maternal uncle, killed at the battle of Sintzheim, on the 16th of June, 1674, as a very recent event," &c.

These are all the particulars which the most minute of the biographies of Fénelon presents respecting his life, during the seven years intervening between his first visit to his uncle, the Bishop, in February, 1667, when he was so anxious to go to Canada as a missionary, and 1674, when he again went to see that respected personage. Of this whole long interval, comprising an interesting portion of his history, no details whatever are given. The date of his ordination as a priest—an event of great moment in the life of a Churchman, and which would certainly have been so considered by a Churchman—is not given; although the Cardinal had before him, as he says—"the original register, written by the hands of the different directors of the Seminary of St. Sulpice, marking, day by day, the entrance and the departure of all the ecclesiastics, who had been received at that place between 1641 and 1709, and their register must have been very minute, as from it was derived all the information respecting the desire of Fénelon to devote himself to missions in Canada. The other biographers of Fénelon place his ordination in the twenty-fourth year of his age, that is, in 1675-6, with the exception of one,* who without advancing any authority, writes that he was ordained at twenty-two or in 1673-4. The Canons of the Roman Catholic Church fix twenty-four as the earliest period at which one can be admitted to the priesthood; though dispensations are granted—only by the Pope—for ordination at an earlier age. As nothing is anywhere said of such a dispensation having been given in Fénelon's case, we are bound to suppose that he was not received as a priest before 1675, which would in consequence have been the commencement of the period of three years, devoted by him to the functions of the ministry in the parish St. Sulpice.

In 1675, Fénelon's desire to engage in missions again broke forth, and he determined to repair with that object to Greece; circumstances, however, induced him to remain in France, and in 1686 he was made preceptor to the Duke of Burgundy, the heir apparent to the crown, an ill-conditioned whelp, whom no instructions could raise to the degree of a civilized being. From this painful position he was raised to the Archbishopric of Cambray in 1697; and two years afterwards his Telemaque was published surreptitiously, by the person charged with copying the manuscript, which brought upon its author the hatred of the despot, Louis XIV., a hatred occasionally masked, but constantly subsisting, until the death of Fénelon in 1715.

Thus it appears that we have no direct and positive account of the manner in which Fénelon passed the six or seven years immediately following 1667, when he was so ardently desirous to devote himself to missions in Canada; and only from the silence of his biographers can we infer that those years were spent by him in the Seminary of St. Sulpice. Now it is precisely to this interval, from 1667 to 1674, that the evidence applies, which will now be produced tending to show that Fénelon did actually engage in those missions, and was thus employed, for some time, among the Iroquois, in the western part of the territory, now included in the State of New York.

The first piece of evidence to be presented, is extracted from "The History of New France,"† by the accomplished Jesuit Father Charlevoix, a work of extraordinary research and unsurpassed elegance of style, a large and important portion of which relates to the countries bordering upon the southern side of Lake Ontario, and the Iroquois or Five Nations, originally occupying them. In his ninth book, Charlevoix writes thus:—"A considerable number of Iroquois were established near the western extremity of Lake Ontario, among whom were many Christians; and the Bishop of Petreoa [Vicar-Apostolic of New France] considering it improper to leave them without pastors, sent thither Messrs. de Fénelon and Trouvé." This was in 1668 or 1669; of the labors of those Missionaries nothing is said by Charlevoix, nor do we find any further mention of M. de Fénelon, except on the following occasion. In 1673, the Count de Frontenac arrived at Quebec, as Governor and Captain-General of New France—including all the territories claimed by France in North America—and he immediately engaged in a dispute with the Bishop of Quebec, late Bishop of Petreoa, as to the part which the latter might take in the administration, and more especially as to the prohibition of the sale of ardent spirits by the traders to the Indians, which the Missionaries were ever anxious to have enforced. The dispute was carried very far; the Bishop openly censured the Governor General, and the latter retorted by causing Molière's comedy of Tartuffe to be performed in the street opposite to the ecclesiastical residence. Moreover, writes Charlevoix, "The Abbé de Salignac Fénelon, of the Seminary of St. Sulpice, was put in prison, under the pretext that he had preached against the Count de Frontenac, and had taken the depositions of various inhabitants of Montreal, in favor of their Governor M. Perrot,‡ whom the General had caused to be arrested."

These extracts from the History of New France merely show that a M. de Fénelon, was sent as a Missionary among the Iroquois in 1668-9, and that an Abbé de Salignac Fénelon was, in 1673, imprisoned at Quebec, on account of his resistance to the mandates of the arbitrary Governor General. That the two individuals, thus mentioned by Charlevoix, were one and the same, is rendered certain by the index to the history, composed with extreme care, in which both of the events above-mentioned, refer to the Abbé de Salignac Fénelon. Of this person Charlevoix says nothing more; and it must be conceded as highly improbable that the historian should have failed in his work published in 1744, to notice the circumstance, if the Abbé de Fénelon, who had been engaged in such arduous and praiseworthy labors, and had been treated with such indignity by the Governor General, had been the same, afterwards so well known, and holding positions so eminent in France.

There is, however, one other, tending still more to confirm the belief in the identity of the Abbé de Fénelon, who served as a Missionary in Canada, with the Abbé de Fénelon, who wrote Telemaque, and who was preceptor to the Duke of Burgundy, and afterwards Archbishop of Cambray. This testimony, indeed, comes from an impure source, and it is vitiated by an accompanying error, as to the principal point related; yet when taken in conjunction with the other circumstances related, it bears a strong face. It comes from Friar Louis Hennepin, whose name is indissolubly connected with the history of this country, by his successful labors in the exploration of the central portions of the Continent, as well as by the interesting descriptions of those regions and their inhabitants, which he was the first to make known to the civilized world. Hennepin came to Canada in 1678, with La Salle, whom he accompanied, in the following year, upon his first expedition towards the Mississippi; and having been detached to examine the great river, northward from the Illinois, he performed that duty, in a manner most extraordinary, considering his means, or, rather, his want of all means, except those afforded by his own courage and determination. From the Upper Mississippi he returned to Canada, and thence proceeded to France in 1682, where he soon after published the narrative of his adventures, containing the earliest exact accounts of the regions west of the great Lakes.* This narrative, fair, truthful, and most interesting, even at the present day, is almost unknown; and its author is now judged only by the evidence of his character afforded by subsequent works, published in Holland in 1697-8, which are filled with gross falsehoods and absurdities, the fruits of disappointment, combined with old age and penury. In the first of these latter works—the well-known "New discovery of a Country larger than Europe,"† while speaking of the period of his residence in America, he says—

"I remained in that country four years, and I was sent on a Mission, whilst the Abbé de Fénelon, now Archbishop of Cambray, was residing there." This is, indeed, a positive assertion; but it is unfortunately erroneous, as to the date assigned; for, certainly, the Abbé Fénelon, who became Archbishop of Cambray, was residing in France during the whole period of Hennepin's stay in Canada—that is to say, from 1678 to 1682. Hennepin is, however, only to be charged with an inaccuracy, which might well have occurred, without leaving any imputation on his veracity in this case. He does not say that he had ever met the Abbé in Canada, and he may have been misinformed as to the period of that person's residence there; but he evidently believed him to be identical with the Archbishop of Cambray, and he speaks of the circumstance, as one too well known to admit of any doubt. It may be added, that Cardinal de Beausset, though he gives many particulars respecting the family of Fénelon, and mentions several persons of that name, does not speak of any one, except the subject of his biography, who could have been the Missionary in Canada.

It has now been shown by testimony which cannot be questioned—that the Abbé de Salignac Fénelon, afterwards Archbishop of Cambray, when a student of theology in the seminary of St. Sulpice at Paris, in 1667, before he had attained his seventeenth year, was ardently desirous to engage immediately in a Mission in Canada; and it should be observed, that his youth at that time would have presented no obstacle to his employment in such duties, as numerous instances are found of persons still younger being thus engaged in preaching, catechising, and otherwise instructing; though they were, of course, unauthorized to receive confessions, or to administer sacraments. It has also been proved equally beyond dispute, that in 1668 and in 1673, and probably during the intermediate period, an Abbé de Salignac Fénelon, of the Seminary of St. Sulpice, was residing in Canada and the adjacent countries, as a Missionary; and that this Abbé, or one bearing the same name, who was a Missionary in Canada about the same time, was supposed by a contemporary ecclesiastic, to be the same person, afterwards holding the high dignity of Archbishop of Cambray. When to these facts is added the consideration, that none of the biographers of the Archbishop present a satisfactory account of the place where, and the manner in which, he spent this period of his life, comprised between 1667 and 1674, the identity here supposed probable, may be admitted to be at least possible; and encouragement thus offered for pursuing an inquiry which may end in connecting the great and good Fénelon, by ties the most sacred with the History of our own Republic.

STORY OF A SAILOR.

Four years ago, I left the port of Boston, the master of a fine ship bound for China. I was worth ten thousand dollars, and was the husband of a young and handsome wife whom I had married six months before. When I left her, I promised to return to her in less than a twelvemonth. I took all my money along with me, save enough to support my wife in my absence, for the purpose of trading when in China on my own account. For a long time we were favored with prosperous wind; but when in the Chinese Sea a terrible storm came upon us, so that in a short time I saw the vessel must be lost, for we were drifting on the rocks of an unknown shore. I ordered the men to provide each for himself, in the best possible manner, and forget the ship, as it was an impossibility to save her. We struck—a sea threw me upon the rock senseless, and the next would have carried me back into a watery grave, had not one of the sailors dragged me farther up the rocks.

There were only four of us alive, and, when morning came, we found we were on a small, uninhabited island, with nothing to eat but the wild fruit common to that portion of the earth. I will not distress you by an account of our sufferings there; suffice it to say that we remained sixty days before we could make ourselves known to any ship. We were taken to Canton, and there I had to beg; for my money was at the bottom of the sea, and I had not taken the precaution to have it insured.

It was nearly a year before I found a chance to come home, and then I, a captain, was obliged to ship as a common sailor! It was two years from the time that I left America that I landed in Boston. I was walking in a hurried manner up one of its streets, when I met my brother-in-law. He could not speak, nor move, but he grasped my hand, and the tears gushed from his eyes.

"Is my wife alive?" I asked.

He said nothing.

Then I wished I had perished with my ship, for I thought my wife was dead; but he very soon said

"She is alive."

Then it was my turn to cry for joy. He clung to me, and said:

"Your funeral sermon has been preached, for we have thought you were dead for a long time."

He said my wife was living in our cottage, in the interior of the State. It was then three o'clock in the afternoon, and I took a train of cars that would carry me within twenty-five miles of my wife. Leaving the cars I hired a boy, though it was night, to drive me home. It was two o'clock in the morning when that sweet little cottage of mine appeared in sight. It was a warm moonlight night, and I remember how like a Heaven it looked to me. I got out of the carriage and went to the window of the room where the servant girl slept, and gently knocked. She opened the window and asked, "Who was there?"

"Sarah, do you know me?" said I.

She screamed with fright, for she thought me a ghost, but I told her to unfasten the door and let me in, for I wished to see my wife. She let me in and gave me a light, and I went up stairs to my wife's room. She lay sleeping quietly. Upon her bosom lay our child, whom I had never seen. She was as beautiful as when I left her, but I could see a mournful expression upon her face. Perhaps she was dreaming of me. I gazed for a long time—I did not make any noise, for I dared not to wake her. At length I imprinted a soft kiss upon the cheek of my child. While doing it, a tear dropped from my eye, fell upon her cheek. Her eyes opened as clearly as though she had not long been sleeping. I saw that she began to be frightened, and I said:

"Mary, it is your husband!"

And she clasped me about the neck and fainted.

But I cannot describe to you that scene. She is now the happy wife of a poor man. I am endeavoring to accumulate a little property, and then I will leave the sea forever.—Chr. Wit.

UNREALITIES IN THE CHURCH.

It must have struck every one that the result of the labours of the most diligent Pastor falls very far short of what might reasonably be expected from them, were there no counteracting influences. I know many good and pains-taking Clergymen, but I do not know one parish where the majority of the people are consistent Christians. Sermon after sermon is preached with earnestness and plainness; the children are mostly attendants at some sort of school. In populous places you may see, in our Sunday schools, numbers of lads and girls just emerging into manhood and womanhood, and sometimes not a few who have reached that period of life. Much good instruction is given to these children and young people: but when you look for the fruits of the sermons preached in the Church, and of the instruction communicated in the schools, you find few or none. Even in country parishes, with a very moderate population, and a resident Clergyman, comparatively few are seen earnestly working out their salvation, and giving all diligence to make their calling and election sure. If one in ten is a communicant, it is thought a great thing; though the proportion ought to be about five times as great. In populous parishes, in the manufacturing districts, even where there is not much dissent, one in a hundred of the population is not unfrequently the proportion of the communicants; and it does not often reach one in fifty. In ten such parishes and chapels, all well cared for, it was ascertained, not long ago, that one in every fifty-two was a communicant, and the average attendance one in eighty-five. Thousands of young people are confirmed every three years, but it is exceedingly doubtful whether, on an average, one in six becomes and continues a communicant. The greater part of the persons who die, it is a painful and notorious fact, had lived out of the communion of the Church; and they generally die as they lived, without any real sense of their guilt and danger; with a vague and apathetic hope of mercy; but without any of those qualifications which the Scriptures speak of as indispensable to the attainment of it. All these are undeniable facts: and our church building, church restoration, and extension of the gospel ministry to those who had used to be neglected, however encouraging as indications of an awakened interest in those matters which concern the glory of God and affect man's salvation, ought not to blind our eyes to the miserable condition of the country, generally, as to spiritual things, and the sad inefficiency of the means employed to improve it. One naturally asks how it happens, that so much labour should be so unproductive of results; and to this question different answers may be, and, indeed, have been given. To repeat all that has been said, or that may be said on this subject would occupy too much of your space; and even if you were disposed to find room for it, it would be tedious to most readers. Instead, therefore, of repeating in detail all the excellent things that have been said on this subject, permit me to suggest, that much of the fruitlessness of clerical and other exertions may be ascribed to that want of reality which is often so painfully manifest in almost every office and administration of the Church.

To begin with the Sacrament of Baptism. What numbers are allowed to look upon it as the mere giving of a name, or at least but a decent mode of admission into the visible Church, conveying necessarily no spiritual grace. In few cases are the subjects of baptism regarded, and treated, and taught, and watched over as "members of Christ, children of God, and inheritors of the kingdom of heaven." In nine cases out of ten, no more account is made of them than if they had never been baptized at all. They are almost invariably addressed as if they were mere heathens to be converted, and not children of God to be trained up for heaven. Then as it regards sponsorship, a most important provision of the Church, is it not notoriously, in very many places, a mere sham? Persons are admitted to answer for children, who, in all probability, will never see them again,—who have, it may be, been called off a cab-stand to meet, ostensibly, the requirements of the Church, but in reality to evade them; for she undoubtedly intended that there should be a real suretyship, and not a merely nominal one. Such a flagrant evasion of the Church's provision may be, and probably is, a rare occurrence: but the general practice is quite as contrary to her intentions. In most cases the sponsors neither understand their duty, nor mean even to try to learn it and fulfil it. I have myself prepared, within the last few years, several hundred young persons for confirmation: and, upon inquiry, found that not one in ten of their sponsors had even spoken to his godchild respecting the things he had promised for him in his baptism, and pledged himself to see him taught, and, as far as possible, led to believe and do. The Clergy in general know well that such is the almost uniform character of the persons who stand for children: and yet, so far as appears at present, few scruple to admit them to this solemn responsibility, though they must be well aware that their promises are mere matters of form, and regarded by the makers as imposing on them no obligation to take any interest in the children in whose name they answer. In populous places, it often happens that not one in ten of these sponsors is even a regular attendant at church, much less a communicant.

The Church meant that her children, as soon as they are capable of learning their duty and their principles, should come under the teaching of their Priest. But how rarely are they thus cared for and instructed, except for two or three months before confirmation, during which they can learn extremely little. After they have been confirmed, they are, for the most part, left again to themselves, without efficient guidance and further instruction, except what they receive in the Sunday school, where they probably remain till they think themselves too old to be scholars: and then, unless they have become teachers, they leave it, and, in populous places, nine-tenths of them are lost to the Church, relapsing into the heathenish, or rather atheistical ways of their parents.

Confirmation itself is still too much an unreality, though a great improvement has taken place with regard to it. Surely the Church did mean that it should be looked upon as a solemn mission, by the Church's chief Pastor, to a full participation in all her privileges, and especially in that great privilege and means of spiritual life, the Holy Communion of the body and blood of Christ; and also as a rite in which an increased measure of spiritual strength is to be obtained to enable those who then take upon themselves their baptismal vows to abide by their promise, and ever after live as becometh saints. Now all this manifestly supposes an honest purpose, on the part of the candidates, to avail themselves of their privileges, live in the communion of the Church, show dutiful respect to all her appointments, and endeavour earnestly to lead godly, righteous, and sober lives. One would think that no persons would be recommended to the Bishop for confirmation, without reasonable ground to believe that he had this honest purpose, and felt that his reply to the question, there put to him, was a solemn pledge to continue, with God's help, "steadfastly in the Apostles' doctrine and fellowship, and in breaking of bread, and in prayers." But is it not well known that numbers are admitted to confirmation who have no such purpose? that sometimes not one in ten means really to avail himself of the privileges acquired by his confirmation? As it regards the greater part, the "I do" has no meaning; they feel themselves not one whit more pledged to lead a godly life than they did before confirmation. And now that they have attained what in most places it is thought somewhat disreputable to be without, they are far less likely to be influenced by their Pastor than if they had not been confirmed at all.

SATURDAY, JANUARY 13, 1849.

THE ROMAN REVOLUTION.—To all who feel concern in the religious state of the world, there can be no more interesting questions proposed than those which relate to the probable effect of the present political condition of Rome. The immediate consequence, so far as driving away the Roman Pontiff, in the disguise of a footman, from the assumed centre of his spiritual dominion, is evident. Pius IX, by this act, has degraded himself, personally, in the eyes of an astonished world, and, so far as he could do it, has brought contempt upon his office. The successor of the lion-hearted St. Peter, the Vicar of Christ, the Chief Pastor of the earth, running away from his own flock, in the garb of a lackey! It would seem strange enough to behold a shepherd fleeing from a wolf, but the wonder grows when we are called to witness the spectacle of a shepherd running, in dismay, from his own sheep.

If the Roman Pontiff indeed occupies the chair of St. Peter, surely the spirit of this noble Apostle has departed from its ancient seat. If the Roman Bishop is indeed the Head of the Church on earth, then the spirit of Her Old Martyrs and Confessors is not in him. Before he should have thus been driven from his place, if he shared the office of St. Peter, he was called upon to share the Apostle's crown of martyrdom. But while the immediate consequences of these events are manifest, so far as regards the general estimation of the person and office of Pius IX, the ultimate result is not so certain as some would suppose. Without much thought, men are tempted rashly to conclude that the Papal system is overthrown with the temporal power of its fugitive head.

To show that this is a matter not to be decided without thought, and a reference to the history of the past, we published an able article on this subject, last week, from the English Churchman. Though we did not fully agree with all the conclusions of that article, we received it too late for the addition of any remarks of our own. A correspondent has kindly furnished the following remarks upon this article, and we gladly adopt them in the room of any further comments.

The last steamer brings us the following additional information:—

ROME.—The Pope has been declared deprived of all temporal power. The Minister, Sterbini, has addressed the citizens. He says:—The Pope, under the title of Bishop, would have the right to enter Rome; but that all the Cardinals and Prelates would be strictly prohibited from entering the city. The people, in their enthusiasm, ran about the streets crying death to the Pope—death to the Cardinals.

The Pope has written the following letter to Gen. Cavaignac, as chief of the Executive Government of France, dated the 7th:

"MONSIEUR LE GENERAL: My heart is touched, and I am penetrated with gratitude for the spontaneous and generous movement of the eldest daughter of the Church, who shows herself anxious, and already in action to hasten to the succor of her Sovereign Pontiff. A favorable opportunity will, without doubt, offer itself to me to manifest in person to France my paternal sentiments, and to be able to diffuse over the soil of France, with my own hand, the benediction of the Lord, as I now supplicate Him by my voice, to consent to diffuse them in abundance over you and the whole of France.

"PIUS PAPA NONUS."

THE POSITION AND PROSPECTS OF THE PAPACY.

DEAR MR. EDITOR:

The article in your last number on "the present situation of the Pope," extracted from the "English Churchman," is well worth attention, as giving the views of a thoughtful mind, upon a topic of no little interest, whether in its political or ecclesiastical bearings. The writer, after a passing notice of the conjectural and uncertain interpretations of prophecy, that have been offered on this subject, proceeds to state the question in the following terms:—"The question is, supposing Pius IX. to have lost his temporal dominion over the Roman States, what effect is this likely to produce in the affairs of Christendom, or the spiritual condition of that part of Europe which is still in subjection to the See of Rome?" He then refers us to History rather than Prophecy, for an answer to the question. "Now here, we think, History is a much more certain guide to fallible men than any interpretations of Prophecy, however ingenious."

To this opinion, properly qualified, I cheerfully subscribe. All private interpretations of Prophecy are to be wholly distrusted, until they are justified by the event. Conclusions as to the future, drawn from the experience of the past, are generally our sole reliance, whether in public or private affairs. But to be reliable, we must be very sure that the cases compared, are clearly analogous, in all important respects. It is only with this proviso, that we may safely assume to interpret the future by the past. Now I think that the intelligent writer in the "English Churchman," wholly fails in this particular. He compares the present position of the Papacy, under one set of circumstances, with its past history under another and essentially different state of things; and argues that its fortunes will be in the one case, what they were in the other. This may be the issue: but his argument does not make it probable, because the cases compared are not analogous; as will, I think, readily appear, upon a little reflection.

"If we look to History," (he says), "we may very easily find that the temporal position of the presiding Pope has again and again been very uncomfortable to himself, but has had little or no effect upon his spiritual sovereignty." This argument he seeks to fortify by instances drawn from the times of Nicholas II., Gregory VII., Boniface VIII., the Avignon Popes, Clement VI.; all, be it observed, anterior to the sixteenth century. His argument is in brief this; that because, during the period specified, (viz. from the eleventh to the fifteenth century inclusive), the "temporal position of the Popes was often very uncomfortable," with "little or no effect upon their spiritual sovereignty;" therefore the present very "uncomfortable position" of the Pope will not be attended by any material effect upon his spiritual sovereignty.

Now it is certain, that the temporal position of the Popes has been, not only "again and again," but almost always (as, being usurped, it must needs be), "very uncomfortable;" whether from the domestic troubles, occasioned now by a factious aristocracy, and again by a restless people; or from the treatment it has experienced at the hands of the Princes and States of Europe, to whom, at different times, it has stood in the various relations, of subject, ally, enemy, or master. This it is unnecessary to prove. And it would be easy to show, that the uncomfortableness of its temporal position sometimes inflicted injury, and at other times conferred advantage, upon its spiritual sovereignty. But it is enough, for my present purpose, to make it appear, that there is no analogy between the present general condition and relations of the Papacy, and its state in the period to which the writer in the English Churchman confines his comparison. This being shown, his conclusion, from its actual fortunes during that period, as to its probable future lot, loses all its force and virtue.

Be it remembered, then, in the first place, that during the period to which he refers, the "spiritual sovereignty" was not only admitted, but heartily received and sustained, by all the kingdoms of Europe. I do not mean, in that plenitude of power, in which it was asserted by Boniface VIII., under the figment of the "double sword," including in fact universal temporal sovereignty also; but as involving a superior jurisdiction and authority, in all matters ecclesiastical, over all the churches of the West. The uncomfortableness of the temporal position of the Pontiff had little or no effect upon his spiritual sovereignty, during that period, simply because nobody, however hostile to his temporal ascendancy, cared to dispute his title to superior spiritual authority; if we except certain parties (e. g. the Franciscan Spirituals, and other extreme advocates of the Imperial prerogatives,) during the latter portion of the period referred to. In point of fact, during most of that period, the spiritual sovereignty, as developed by Hildebrand and his successors, both included within itself, and became the foundation of the temporal sovereignty; which extended then, not only (nor primarily,) over the States of the Church, but (at least in theory) over all Christendom. It was not indeed until the very end of the period referred to, that the reaction against the pretensions of the Papacy, which was caused by their intolerable extravagance, compelled the Pontiffs to think of narrowing their temporal sovereignty to the States of the Church; a dominion, for which Gregory VII., Innocent III., and Boniface VIII., would have scorned to contend. To most of the Popes, indeed, of the four centuries or more, from which the writer in the English Churchman borrows his illustrations, their local sovereignty of Italy was of little account comparatively, except so far as their comfort was concerned; that temporal sovereignty, which they claimed, being co-ordinate and co-extensive with the spiritual sovereignty, which they arrogated as vicars of Christ on earth, supreme over all estates of men, in all the relations of life. So long as the mind of Europe lay in bondage to the absolute spiritual supremacy, which Hildebrand and his successors so long arrogated, how could the spiritual sovereignty of the Pontiff be sensibly affected by the petty fluctuations of Italian politics? This it is, that explains the apparent anomaly, that Hildebrand, dying an exile at Cassino, was not less a spiritual Autocrat than when he sat in triumph at Canosa, to receive the homage of the prostrate Emperor: and that John XXII., in his "Babylonian captivity" at Avignon, (whatever temporary concessions his false position forced him to make to France,) was more audacious, in his demands upon Louis of Bavaria, than Boniface VIII. had been, in his bearing towards Philip the Fair.

But has Pius IX. the same universally acknowledged, and well nigh absolute, spiritual sovereignty to fall back upon, if the seven-hilled city fail him? Is either the spiritual, or the temporal, sovereignty of the Popes, such as they were, from the eleventh to the fifteenth centuries, that we can, with any probability, argue from the one to the other? I think not. The Papacy has, I apprehend, encountered a novel crisis in its history. Whether its ambidextrous policy will bear it through, with either its spiritual, or temporal, sovereignty unscathed, time only can show. Should that selfish and earthly (if not devilish) policy, which tempted it to pervert its spiritual supremacy into an instrument for the acquisition of a temporal kingdom, be at length turned against it, and made the means of its own utter overthrow, none can question the justice of such retribution; nor can any well-instructed Churchman regret the severance of that unholy alliance between the kingdom of Christ, and the kingdom of this world, in the hybrid system of the Papacy, at whatever cost it may be effected. May God in mercy spare the Church of Rome, and revive it in its ancient purity, whenever it shall please Him to sweep away, with the besom of destruction, the Court of Rome, with which its fortunes and its state have been so long, and so disastrously identified.

Rev. J. D. Ogilby

SOUTHERN CHURCHMANSHIP.—The writer of the following is much mistaken if he thinks that either the Author of the article referred to, or the Editor of the Banner, would say a word to depreciate the general character of Churchmanship in the South. The article which has excited the jealous regard of "a Southerner," was written by a clergyman very far "down South," one who would uphold the honor of the South in word, and who, in deed, would do honor to any quarter of the compass. Locality and local interests may excite hostile feeling among politicians, but Churchmen should own no such distinctions. We profess to believe, not in the Church "down South," or the Church "down East," but in the "Holy Catholic Church," and she is neither bounded by a horizon, nor divided by the points of the compass.

Though we were not "born and raised down South," we have as high a regard for Churchmen there as any where else. In this we yield not, even to "a Southerner." We must frankly own we have occasionally seen a "Southern Churchman" whom a little elevation might improve, in our esteem, but, on the whole, we think that nowhere are "the old paths" more wisely or faithfully followed than "down South." If this had not been the case, "the fancy Liturgy," no novelty in many other quarters, would not have been set down, by our Southern Correspondent, among the "novelties which disturb our peace."

For the Banner of the Cross.

MR. EDITOR:

In your paper of the 30th December, I notice some remarks of a correspondent, under the title—"Novelties that disturb our peace," in which he complains against a "specimen of Fancy Liturgy habitually used by an Episcopal Clergyman down South." When reports of this kind are made the offender should be more particularly located. "Down South" implies a section of the country considerably below "the line," as "down East" implies that far removed section known as New England. If this is the intention of your correspondent, I am disposed to take issue with his informant, (for he does not speak on his own authority,) and deny the truth of his statement: that is, if he refers to any part of the South below Virginia. I was born and raised "down South," and can testify that, upon the whole, there is better Churchmanship among the Episcopalians there, than either North, East, or West. They are not rent asunder by faction, nor disturbed by "novelties," but move onward in the "old paths," governing themselves by those wholesome rubrical regulations which the Church has appointed for our government; and so far as my observation has extended, (and it has not been limited,) I have never seen the least digression from the rule "down South."

REVERENCE FOR SACRED PLACES.—In publishing the following communication we are tempted to add a word to the excellent suggestions here made. In the opinion of some, a Church does not become a Holy place until after it has been consecrated. Others go further, and consider that a House of God claims no peculiar reverence except in time of worship. The result is that many lose sight altogether of the solemn character of the Holy Temple. We therefore conclude that in this respect, as in all others, if we would end aright, we should begin so.

The moment the corner stone of a church is laid, with that solemn invocation of the ever-blessed Trinity, the building, from its foundations is dedicated to the Most High God, and all employed therein are engaged in a religious work, and all who approach that place should come in the fear of God.

These remarks apply, with still greater force, to the consecrated Temple when workmen are engaged in repairing it. We have often been shocked with the manner in which it is profaned at such times. And, we are sorry to add, that this irreverence is not only exhibited by ignorant and godless workmen, but, those who should be better informed, act with equal disregard of all decency. We refer to cases where the young and thoughtless, and sometimes their equally unthinking elders, come to the House of Prayer to decorate it for Christmas. At such a time, and in such a place, mirth and levity are not only unseemly, but wicked. This conduct results, often, from mere thoughtlessness, and we trust a word of earnest caution may help to remedy the evil.

DEAR MR. EDITOR:—

I have observed that the founders of the Church of St. Mark, of this city, have caused to be placed upon its walls the enclosed placard. As it seems exceedingly appropriate, and particularly so in these times, I would suggest its publication in the Banner, provided it meets with your approval. Perhaps others, engaged in the same good work, may be induced to adopt the same means, to prevent that irreverent behaviour and improper language, so often seen and heard amongst those who are employed in rearing a Temple to the Most High God.] CATHOLICUS.
Philad., Dec. 18, 1848.

TO ALL PERSONS EMPLOYED IN BUILDING THIS CHURCH.

1. A church is the house of God; and therefore any work that has to do with a church is a holy work. Every stone you lay, and every beam you hew, is laid and hewn for the honour of Almighty God.

2. The behaviour of those who are employed in a holy work ought also to be holy. How careful then should Churchmen be, in working upon a church, to avoid (even more than at any other time) all unseemly words, all oaths, and every thing like an oath. Every idle word that men shall speak, they shall give account thereof in the day of Judgment.

3. This church, when it has been solemnly dedicated to God by the Bishop, will become the house of peace: therefore let it not now be profaned by lightness of speech, much less by unseemly noise, or words of quarrelling and anger. Remember in what holy quietness Solomon's Temple was built.

4. A Churchman will also, while working in the house of God, avoid any act which may seem irreverent, such as singing or whistling idle tunes; or taking his meals within the circle of the church walls.

The founders of this church trust that every visitor who may enter it while in the course of building, will show by his reverent behaviour that he remembers its solemn destination to be the house of God.

CHURCH OF THE REDEMPTION.

Under the head of Church Intelligence will be found a communication in relation to this most interesting and important parish.

It seems that the sum of $1200 must be raised, within a limited time, in order to rescue the church from serious difficulty. The spiritual destitution of the neighborhood in which this church is placed, the success which has attended the devoted labors of the faithful Missionary, the good which has been done, and may be done, the loss which must ensue if this noble work fails, all urge upon the members of the Church the duty of meeting promptly this demand upon their charity. Whatever is to be done in this case must be done promptly, and it should be done cheerfully.

CHURCHMEN'S MISSIONARY ASSOCIATION FOR SEAMEN.

We earnestly commend the following appeal to the attention of our readers.

Though, Mr. Editor, it may be thought that your readers are in full possession of all necessary information concerning the Mission for seamen, which has been undertaken in this diocese, there are a few particulars which it is deemed important to lay before them. The duty thence arising must be self-apparent. It is just about a year, since the first contributions were received in behalf of this effort, and the signal success, which so far has attended it, affords the most unanswerable proof, that God is with those whom He moved by His Spirit to undertake the work. It would be interesting to trace out the many Providences, which have been displayed in this whole matter, but our limits forbid. Suffice it, that in every respect we have been blessed. While deeply grateful to God, therefore, we with the more confidence, make this appeal for aid at the hands of our fellow Christians, for we feel conscious that we do but speak in His name.

A very few zealous Christians have been chiefly instrumental in advancing the work so far. They have through the Divine favor and blessing, been enabled to complete the beautiful little floating Church. To liquidate however the claims against the Association, so that the church can be consecrated, a liberal few have assumed the responsibility of the remaining debt, both to the builder, and for furniture, &c. On the approaching Sunday the doors of this new Sanctuary are to be opened for Divine service, with the permission of Him, by whom all things are done. Shall then, those who have generously assumed this debt be required to liquidate it? I would rather say, shall they reserve to themselves the privilege of making this offering to God? Are none anxious to share it with them? If any who have given already, think that they have done their part, I ask them seriously to consider whether they have done all that they can; whether enough is ever done, when anything remains undone, and above all, whether they have answered as they might, this call which God makes upon his servants? To those who have as yet done nothing let conscience speak. If other religious objects claim precedence in their opinion, of course they are bound to prefer them, after duly weighing the respective merits of all; but unless this be the reason of their withholding assistance, I will only ask them for their own sakes to remember and obey the command "As we have opportunity, let us do good unto all men," and to ponder well the question "Whosoever hath this world's good, and seeth his brother have need, and shutteth up his bowels of compassion from him, how dwelleth the love of God in him?" A prompt and generous response (such as becometh Christians,) is alone necessary, and the mission will be enabled to begin its operations, free and unincumbered. He who hath begun this good work, will prosper and continue it, and abundantly bless all who have helped to provide an ark of safety for the tempest tost, and long forsaken mariner. We ask all our Christian brethren, "will you come and help us?"

ACTON; OR THE CIRCLE OF LIFE. A collection of thoughts and observations, designed to delineate LIFE, MAN, and THE WORLD. Published by Messrs. Appleton, New York and Philadelphia.

This book, though creditable to its publishers, is somewhat too fanciful for a book of wisdom. We have read many of the thoughts and observations, which prove that the author is one who thinks and sees. Although they are classified under particular subjects, the train of thought and observation does not go upon a very regular or direct track. There are too many sharp turns to make the travelling very pleasant, at least, to our taste. In fact 'we have' never been over fond of this method of heaping up wisdom. Bricks and stones we can admire when they are put together in a shapely structure, but we could never see much to attract in a pile of the one, or a heap of the other. We know that these aggregations of wisdom are to some extent popular, and have been so since the time of "Lacon," whose author, by the way, made rather a bad use of his own disjointed wisdom.

It seems to some minds, to be an approach to "the wisdom of Solomon," to deal in sententious proverbs. Inspired wisdom may utter its precepts in a form which ill becomes a fallible imitator. And one grave objection to this style of writing is, that it assumes too much, it is always pronouncing judgment, its decrees resemble the laws of the Medes and Persians. We are speaking now of this class of writers, not of the author of "Acton," and we are, let it be remembered, only expressing views in which few may agree. Those who have a taste for this kind of writing, will find a very favourable specimen of it in the book we have noticed.

PROFESSION AND PRACTICE. By the Rev. Hugh White, A. M. First American from the 10th London edition. Philadelphia: Herman Hooker, 206 Chestnut street, 1849.

Although the author of this book differs from us in his theoretical views, yet, for the most part, his practical teachings are excellent. He seems to be well acquainted with many of the prevailing practical errors of our day, but he does not so clearly apprehend the connection between false practice and erroneous profession. He strongly condemns practical evils, which are the natural result, in our esteem, of the very profession he upholds. We think the book will do good, and we have marked several passages which we may extract for the benefit of our readers, and to give them an idea of the sound sense and practical wisdom displayed by the author.

AN APPEAL TO THE CHRISTIAN PUBLIC, on the Evil and Impolicy of the Church Engaging in Merchandise, &c., &c.—We have only room to acknowledge the receipt of this Pamphlet, and to say that it contains the articles published in the Banner, over the signature of P. P., with additional notes and a postscript. Our readers have had an opportunity of forming a judgment, for themselves, of the work. It is to be obtained at the store of Mr. H. Hooker.

We cannot insert the following just tribute of respect, without expressing our own deep sympathy with those who mourn over the loss of one so deservedly esteemed. In the death of MAJOR ROACH, who once held the responsible office of Mayor of this city, Philadelphia has lost a good citizen, and the Church, on earth, has parted with one of her most faithful members. Distinguished by all those qualities which win our esteem and love, his earthly virtues were ennobled by the graces of Christian devotion. Those who attended the daily service at St. Peter's will miss an earnest voice, whose responsive tones were seldom unheard at the hour of Prayer in the Temple. That voice, we may well believe, is now added to the mighty chorus in the more blessed temple above, where all our prayers are turned to praise.

ST. PETER'S CHURCH, Philadelphia, Jan. 2, 1849.

The members of the Vestry attended the funeral of the late ISAAC ROACH Esquire, who departed this life on Saturday, December 30th; and after the burial service in the church, and at the grave, a special meeting of the Vestry was held. Present, Messrs. Lawrence Lewis, James S. Smith, F. G. Smith, James S. Newbold, John Welsh, Jr., Henry Reed, and Horace Binney, Jr. The Rector being absent, in consequence of an urgent summons to visit a sick person, the Accounting Warden was called to the chair.

On motion it was unanimously

Resolved, That the Vestry of St. Peter's church, record on the minutes the deep sense of the loss they experience by the death of their fellow member, Major ISAAC ROACH, and their sincere respect and affection for his memory.

Resolved, That the connection of Major Roach with the Vestry is remembered for the faithful and active share which during a period of twenty years he bore in the business of the parish, and for the cordial spirit of friendliness that characterized his personal intercourse.

Resolved, That the Vestry believe that this record of affectionate esteem expresses also the feelings of the parish for the memory of a fellow-worshipper, to be remembered as one, who, having been trained in childhood to the services of the Church, in this parish, of which his parents were members, was never separated from it, except when duty to his country called him away during a part of his life, spent in distinguished military services in the war of 1812; and who in later years, amidst the cares of arduous stations in civil life, and during the season of a well-earned retirement, was faithful in the fulfilment of a Churchman's duties in the daily devotions of this sanctuary.

Resolved, That a copy of these Resolutions be communicated to the family of the late Major Roach, as an expression of the condolence of the Vestry in their day of affliction.

Resolved, That these Resolutions be published in the Banner of the Cross.

AN IDEAL OF A CHRISTIAN PARISH,

DERIVED FROM A STUDY OF THE SERVICES AND RUBRICS OF THE PRAYER BOOK.

We have often been struck with what may be termed the fragmentary character of our Ritual. It bears the clearest internal evidence of its having once formed a part of a system which does not now practically exist, whilst it is manifest that the attempt to carry out all its provisions, without any further help than may be derived from its own contents, is impossible. We know from external evidence that our Ritual is but a fragment of the Ecclesiastical structure which Apostolical Liturgies, Catholic Tradition and Canon Law combined to erect in England; and that on many points we, American Churchmen, are compelled to resort to these sources, for explanations of Rubrical provisions, and for the proper mode of yielding practical obedience to the requirements of our Prayer Book. For example, the Prayer Book appoints the Psalter to be read, but we resort to tradition for the responsive mode of recitation. Again, the first rubric in the ordering of Deacons, prescribes that the candidate shall be "decently habited," we resort to Anglican sources to understand that the decent habit is the Surplice.

But we do not design expanding this remark at present, and have made it simply by way of preface to the outline which follows. In our study of the Prayer Book, we have often fancied we perceived allusions to divers matters, touching the arrangements and even the Architecture of a Parish church, which from external sources we know, bear upon the decent performance of the Divine and Ecclesiastical offices. Sometimes, for example, a rubric seems to assume that certain arrangements exist. We think that a skilful Churchman having the time and patience, might construct an ideal of a perfect Christian parish from the letter or spirit of the Rubrics and Services of the Prayer Book. To this work we do not pretend to aim, in the present exercise, although we have ambitiously (for which let us have pardon) placed it as the caption of this article. What has been done, now follows.

I. From the Form of Consecration of a Church, we have certain hints about the church-building; such as:—

- 1st. Each parish is to possess a church-building.
- 2nd. The edifice is to be paid for, and, if possible, be endowed. The rubric speaks of "the instruments of donation and endowment."
- 3rd. It is to be consecrated.
- 4th. It is to be opened for no unhallowed or common uses.

5th. It is to be in a style as worthy as possible of Him who is worshiped in it. The Bishop's address alludes to "reason and sense of the natural decency of things."

6th. It is a blessed and a pious work to build a church. The Bishop's address connects it with "the secret inspiration of the blessed Spirit," with "pious works approved of and graciously accepted by our heavenly Father," and blesses God for putting it into the people's hearts, "to appropriate and devote a building to God's honor and worship."

II. From the Holy Communion Office, the Ordinal, the Offices for Consecrating a Church, and Instituting Ministers, &c., we find some hints about the Interior Arrangements, such as:—

1st. Each church is to have a chancel, and it should be distinct from the body of the church.

2nd. There is to be a structure of such ornament and form as will answer to the title of "the Lord's Table," "the Holy Table," "the COMMUNION TABLE," and "the Altar."

3rd. The altar is to be railed off from the rest of the chancel.

4th. There is to be an "aisle" leading up to the chancel. The Consecration of a Church Service directs "the Bishops and Clergy shall go up the aisle of the Church to the Communion Table repeating the 24th Psalm alternately."

5th. There is to be in the Altar space, a Bishop's Chair; also, a credence or Side Table to hold the elements before they are placed on the holy Table. The Rubric directs, "The Priest shall then place upon the Table so much bread and wine, 'as he shall think sufficient.'"

6th. The space included within the rails of the Altar is to be ample, not only enough to hold the Communion Table, the Bishop's Chair, and the Credence Table, but to accommodate several clergy. The Rubric contemplates that beside the Bishop and Officiating Priest, an Assistant Minister to hand the Cup, and other clergy may be present.

7th. Each church is to have "a place where Morning and Evening Prayer are appointed to be said," otherwise called "the Desk."

8th. The Desk is to be at the same end of the church with the Altar. The Rubric in the Office of Institution directs, "all the clergy present standing without the rails of the Altar, except the officiating Priest, who shall go into the Desk."

9th. There is to be a Litany Desk, as we may infer from the fact that the Litany is a distinct service from the Morning and Evening Prayers, and to be used, as the Rubric says, "after Morning Service."

10th. The Altar and hence the Chancel, is to be at the east end, for the Rubric speaks of, "a right (i. e. north) side, and hence a recognized rule of Ecclesiastical position. Orientation cannot be Puseyism so long as "north-entation," is Liturgical.

11th. The Holy Table is to be out from the wall, so that the Priest, in consecrating the Holy Eucharist may stand "before it," that is, to the east, (the east being the controlling point in the ecclesiastical compass) in order that he may "break the bread before the People."

12th. The People are to kneel, facing the Altar, and the pews or seats to be constructed as to afford the communicants an uninterrupted view of the Act of Consecration: The Priest being required by the Rubric, so to stand that he may "break the bread before the People."

13th. The Priest is not to be turned to the people when he prays, because the Rubric says, "then shall the Minister turning to the people, rehearse distinctly the ten Commandments;" and again, after the Confession in the Communion office, "Then shall the Priest stand up, and turning to the people, say."

14th. The Priest's position when not turning to the people is, "to the Lord's Table," according to the Rubric, "Then shall the Priest turn to the Lord's table, and say."

15th. There are to be no galleries, and the Priest not much elevated above the people, for he is to "turn to," not to "turn up," nor to "turn down," when he rehearses the commandments, &c.

16th. The Sermon is to be delivered from the place where the Priest reads the Gospel and gives the notices of Holy Days, &c., he being already "turned to" the people, and the Rubric directing, "Then shall follow the sermon."

17th. The Minister is not to quit the Chancel from the beginning to the end of the Holy Communion Office. The Rubrics for the Ante-Communion, the Sermon, the Communion, and the Post-Communion making no provision for such absence, but implying the contrary.

18th. The Bishop is always to appear in church in his prescribed robes, the Rubrics speaking of "the Episcopal Habit."

III. From the Baptismal Office, we seem to gather some hints, such as these:—

1st. The Font is to be at some distance from "the Desk," (at the church door perhaps) for the Minister after the Second Lesson, is to leave the desk, and walk, far enough at least, to give a meaning to the Rubric "coming to the font."

2nd. The Font is not to be a bowl or small basin—for the infant may be immersed. (There is no such term as "sprinkling" used in our Prayer Book.)

3d. There is to be a baptistery, for an adult may be immersed.

4th. There is to be some decent vessel provided for complying with the Rubric that after all are assembled at the font, it is "then to be filled with pure water."

IV. From the Form of Solemnization of Matrimony we learn, amongst other matters, that there is to be some place, (just outside of the Altar-rails perhaps) "in the body of the church," as the Rubric says where the Marriage is to be solemnized.

V. From the Order of the Burial of the Dead, we gather:—That the grave yard should be around the church, for "the entrance of the church yard," is a point from which the Minister may go, "either into the church or towards the grave."

VI. From the decision of the Bishops, the Clergy, and the Laity, in Convention of 1832, prefixed to the Psalms in Metre, we learn:—

1st. That it is the minister's duty to appoint what is to be sung, to give order concerning the tunes, and to suppress all unseemly music, and all irreverent performance of it.

2d. That it is the minister's duty to obtain assistance from persons skilled in music, and this will lead to a choir where it may be had.

3rd. As the Rubric provides against "vain and ungodly persons profaning the Service of the Sanctuary with light, unseemly, indecent, or irreverent music," it may be concluded that, when it is possible, devout churchmen "skilled in music," should compose the choir, and that the chastened music of the church catholic should be preferred to that of continental operas, or of puritan psalmody.

VII. From all the Offices we learn, not from hints, but from express Rubrical enactment:

1st. That the present cry against consistent churchmen for their attention to architecture, music, posture, form, holy vestments, and holy utensils, is a cry against the church herself.

2d. That the charge of novelty and attention to trifles, preferred against those who will not neglect Liturgically enacted matters, is flatly refuted by the Prayer Book.

3rd. That when some good natured people raise their hand and cry, we have nothing now but "robes," and "altar cloths," and "holy vessels," they had better cast down their eyes and see how the Prayer Book talks of the Bishop's "Rochet, and the rest of the Episcopal habit," and of the Deacon's "decent habit," and how glibly such terms seem to be used as the "fair white lined cloth" for the Eucharistic holy supper, the "decent basin" for the offertory; and the "Paten, cup, and every vessel," for the administration. Now what a singular Prayer Book we have that cannot just say "habit," without prefixing "decent;" or "cloth," without saying "linen;" and adding too, that it shall be "fair," and "white!" And how provoking this Prayer Book is, which will not just keep itself to the blunt word, "table," but will sometimes say, as if it liked the words, "holy table," "Lord's table," "Thy table, O Lord," and even "ALTAR!" And how "Puseyitish" is this Prayer Book which has so many "rubrics," and some of them about nothing but "posture" and "form:" saying 'Then shall you stand up,' and then 'shall you sit down,' and 'then shall you kneel,' then shall you 'say,' and then shall you 'sing;' then shall you 'turn to the people,' and then shall you 'turn to the Lord's table!'

How Popish is this Prayer Book, which does not once from beginning to end use the word "pulpit," nor recognize the existence of any such distinct structure; which says that even the money at the offertory shall be "reverently brought to the Priest, by Deacons, Church-wardens, or other fit persons, and that he 'shall humbly present and place it upon the holy table;' which will not permit the remains of the consecrated elements to be taken out of the church, but commands that they be 'reverently eaten and drunk by the communicants;' and which can exhort the people "who cannot quiet their own consciences," to come unto some, "Minister of God's word and open their grief!"

Indeed, Mr. Editor, if the Prayer Book of the Protestant Episcopal Church is to be the authority, we are constrained to declare, that the apprehension of 'Romanism,' which certain people express, when seeing the buildings erected, and services performed, in accordance with the letter and spirit of the Church's Rubrics, is, whether such persons mean it or not, neither more nor less than the apprehension of consistent Churchmanship.

But we will not further trespass upon the reader's patience, or your paper's columns. If we have hinted at a train of thought, we shall be satisfied. A large and careful induction from other authorized Ecclesiastical sources, would, in our judgment, be the most successful refutation of the charge of novelty, so freely and ungenerously preferred against Churchmen for their attention to Architectural, Musical, Devotional, and other subjects expressly, or by implication enjoined by the laws of our church.

REV. MR. EDITOR:—

R. W. D. Colhoun.

Your correspondent J. B. C. having traced the unsightly doors of some of the "anti-ecclesiastical churches" to Pagan Rome, it may be worth while to point out some of the defects, which are common to them and some of the churches in communion with Papal Rome.

First. In the absence of the distinct chancel (in opposition to the plans of primitive churches, our venerable Christ church, and thousands of early English churches, from which the latter is modelled,) as obtains in the Pagan door churches and the Papal churches of St. Mary, St. Augustine, and others of the same communion.

Second. In the use of unsubstantial and inferior materials, which being plastered or painted are of the sham order, and made to resemble those things which they are not, as if God could be deceived thereby.

Third. The use of ill looking galleries which not only deform the churches, which have them, but form receptacles for all the improprieties nearly, committed in church.

The object of those who first omitted the distinct chancel building, as in the case of the Pagan door churches, was to display a great marble or wooden pulpit (to the overshadowing or thrusting aside of God's altar,) "a shrine" to elevate the preacher, from which he denounced or diminished the importance of the Holy Sacrament.

The object of the Romanists, in omitting the distinct chancel building, seems to have been to display their tinselled high altars as near the body of the people as possible,—the arrangement being totally unlike the modest and beautiful chancels of the best Anglican models, which from their depth are not calculated for the popular display and pageantry of high mass, but for the solemn consecration and administration of the Holy Eucharist.

* The plan of an ancient church given in a book entitled, Canons of the church to illustrate the 11th canon of the Council of Nice, (A. D. 325,) has an apse or chancel just half as deep, as the length of the nave, or one-third of the whole of the length of the church.

† It is satisfactory to know from the work published after his return from England, that the Rev. Dr. Tyng, also the Right Rev. Bishop of Massachusetts, do not approve of a pulpit and reading pew being placed within the chancel rails.

Another departure from the best models of Gothic or Christian architecture, is the outrageous number of steps, which the aged and infirm, lame and halt, have to climb, to get into some of the "anti-ecclesiastical churches." Penance is not intended by this, though no doubt inflicted thereby, on many. But even the many steps have their Romish counterpart, in the 28 steps of ascent and descent, which the faithful on their knees, had in 1818, half worn away, in the "holy stair-case and chapel of our Saviour called Sancta Sanctorum, at Rome."

"To improve the subject." It is strongly recommended to the anti-ecclesiastical brethren, to eschew all the errors of modern Rome, whether in Church architecture, Doctrine, or Jesuitism, also the blemishes and absurdities of the conglomerated style of paganism, concert halls, &c., which has been introduced in some of the Philadelphia churches.

Let them also abandon that Romish and Puritan want of charity, which proscribes all those, who desire in correct though simple and beautiful churches, to receive their Bibles and Prayer Books in their natural sense, and who do not feel themselves at liberty to put a more natural gloss on them, so as to square with the Council of Trent, the notions of Luther, Calvin, Wesley, or any other, to whose name an ism has been added.

The Course of Life: a Sketch for Christian Females. By F. M. S., London, 1848.

I propose to send you, Mr. Editor, some extracts from this beautiful book. While they may gratify your readers, and do good, they may create a desire for its re-publication in an American edition.

CUDWORTH.

Childhood. Chapter 1. "The course of the Christian lady is a beautiful progression of moral, mental, and physical life. Her journey may be brief, ending in early morning;—it may suddenly close at noon;—or it may be prolonged to latest eve, through scenes of perplexity and difficulty, of sorrow and suffering. In any case if the pilgrim prove faithful to her high vocation, it will be honorable, happy and useful; blessed by man, crowned of God with immortal glory. This course may begin with the earliest thoughts and feelings of childhood,—with the dawn of reason. How solemnly these words strike on the thoughtful ear. The dawn of reason! This twilight of being is the commencement of eternal day. The provident love of our Heavenly Father prepares for earth's new visitant. He supplies blessings adapted to the weakness, the dangers, and the high destinies of "An heir of glory! a frail child of dust, Helpless immortal, insect infinite."

Before the eyes of the infant stranger behold the light, maternal piety will have secretly and unceasingly implored in its behalf the Divine blessing; nor can these petitions be vain. All covenant mercies unfold to faith and prayer, when from the baptismal font the new name is inscribed in the records of the Church militant. The blood of Christ purchased for that ransomed spirit the full glories of the Church triumphant. The Christian mother's most effective agency is prayer:—"praying always with all prayer—and watching thereunto with thanksgiving." Every instance of providential care should be promptly and thankfully acknowledged; dependence and gratitude especially become the parent, while her little one rests so helplessly in the everlasting arms.

Beautiful in story, and highly useful as an example, is the conduct of the mother, who, when congratulated on the piety and prosperity of her family, and questioned concerning their early training, replied that she knew of nothing peculiar in her method, unless it were this. She had constantly made all her maternal cares, types of the blessings she desired from their Heavenly Father, and mementoes to herself in seeking them. When she washed the bodies of her infant charge, she reverently besought that God would cleanse their souls in the laver of regeneration. When she fed them, she implored for them the true manna. While watching their tottering steps, she begged their heavenly guardian to take charge of them in the slippery paths of youth, and on sending them to school, she entreated the Great Teacher to take them as His disciples. There was the secret! constantly asking, seeking and knocking, she received, she found, and the door of happiness and honor opened to the well directed footsteps of her children. It may also be remarked, that this pious principle would act favorably on the temporal interests of the child. The reference to the anti-types would ennoble the types. The sanctifying influences which connected them with heaven, would cheer and refine all the cares and labors of a mother's love.

Pre-eminent among the precious advantages of childhood, is a readiness of credence,—a believing heart. Knowledge imparted by the simplest testimony, is welcome to his mind as light is to the eyes. Tell him,

"There is beyond the sky
A heaven of joy and love,
And holy children when they die,
Go to that world above."

Tell him, how he also may go there, and though his perceptions are imperfect, as his knowledge is limited, yet he is instantly persuaded of the promise and embraceth it. "Faith in him is peculiarly the substance of things hoped for, the evidence of things not seen."

Those who, in after life, enter the kingdom of God, must place their weary feet in his steps, and imbibe his spirit, even though compelled to cry out with tears, Lord! I believe, help thou mine unbelief.

REPORT OF THE CHURCHMEN'S MISSIONARY ASSOCIATION FOR SEAMEN.

The Board of Managers of the "Churchmen's Missionary Association for Seamen of the Port of Philadelphia," feel a sincere pleasure in now presenting their first Annual Report of their operations for the past year, and their prospects for the future.

The Association commenced its operations in November, 1847, by preparing a constitution, which when submitted to the Bishop of the Diocese, met with his cordial approval, they then issued a circular, giving notice of their intention to erect a Floating Church for Seamen, and followed it soon after by an appeal in behalf of the object. They were highly gratified with the evidence given by the community of an interest in the mission, which argued at the same time a conviction of its importance and necessity. The Clergy generally called attention to the subject in their respective churches, and several of them witnessed their approval by sermons, prepared expressly to show the urgent claims of the mission; and the Bishop's hearty concurrence in our effort was manifested by his admirable sermon, which has since been printed and freely distributed.

Encouraged by the general interest shown towards the mission, the Board began vigorously the work of collecting the necessary funds for raising the proposed Floating Church. Donations have been received from various Churches and Institutions, some of them from the interior, and we are grateful for one from the distant city of St. Louis.

When upwards of $4000 had been subscribed, the Board felt itself authorized to enter into a contract for erecting the Church, which is now in progress, and will be completed some time in December. A charter is about to be obtained for the Association. The Board feel a pleasure in announcing that the Rev. R. S. Trapièr, late of the U. S. Navy, who was selected by the Board, has been duly appointed by the Bishop as the Missionary to the Association.

While we feel highly encouraged in our work, we nevertheless regret to report that the amount subscribed is inadequate to complete the Church, after which the necessary furniture of the interior will demand a still further expenditure. We shall need about $2000 more to complete the whole, so that we shall fall within the limits of the estimate originally stated in our appeal.

Surely the urgent claims of Seamen to the preaching of the gospel both on their own account, and in order to spread that gospel, through the world, are alone sufficient grounds for sustaining the mission, although others equally strong might be urged. We owe a deep debt of gratitude to those by whose means the comforts of life drawn from every part of the globe are heaped upon us in profusion; and the least return we can make them is to strive to drag them from the mire of wickedness into which our neglect has in part plunged them, and to point them to the true polar star that will unerringly guide them through the ocean of life, and smile still brighter upon them at the close of their weary pilgrimage. But if this be the return in one sense demanding a trifling sacrifice on our part, it is the highest return in another point of view. Of what infinite value is it to the poor, reckless sailor, who instead of continually looking forward to the indulgence of his sensual appetites, to the ruin of body and soul, may, when that soul is illumined by the light of religion, look calmly and cheerfully forward to that haven of eternal rest, where neither the storms of ocean nor the passions of men shall ever disturb his everlasting peace.

But if we are bound to teach the mariner the way of salvation on his own account, not the less, we might almost say, so much the more, are we urged to do it in order to extend the blessings of Christianity to the rest of the world. It is the universal opinion of missionaries that nothing is a greater hindrance to the spread of the gospel than the corrupt life of a sailor. Can we wonder that foreign missions effect comparatively so little, when the wicked example and precept of those whom the heathen term Christian seamen, are a constant warning to those heathen of the evils that Christianity may introduce among them? The example and conversation of every Christian is or should be an exhortation to embrace the gospel. Thus the pious seaman, traversing every part of the earth's surface, contiguous to the ocean, would commend the religion of Jesus Christ to the notice and adoption of unchristian nations. What a different result then would flow from sending thousands of pious seamen abroad over the earth! Let Christians but look at this subject carefully, and they will find that the value of this mission cannot be overestimated; they will see that it must be the basis of missionary efforts for diffusing the light of the gospel through a darkened world.

While we are impressed with the value of the mission, we cannot close our eyes to the much that remains to be done, in order to bring it into successful operation; for after our church shall have been completed, still annual expenditures will be necessary to impart efficiency to the mission. Our Missionary, as a "workman worthy of his hire," must be sustained; we shall freely distribute useful books to seamen, in order to water the seed sown in his temporary sojourn among us; we must necessarily be subject to rent or wharfage, and to the maintenance of one to keep a constant and watchful care of our church. These needful expenses must be met by the active and continued charity of Christians. Impulsive contributions, although always acceptable, are too irregular and fluctuating to constitute our sole dependence. According to a provision in our constitution, we hope to obtain from 200 to 300 members, by whose aid the mission will effect great and permanent good.

We would then respectfully urge upon our fellow Christians the propriety, nay the urgent necessity of establishing and sustaining this our undertaking. We urge them to contribute liberally towards it. We urge them to press others around them to follow their example. We earnestly hope that every parish in our community will contribute to our funds at least once in the year. We solicit of our clergy their hearty co-operation in a work, which we believe to be eminently useful, to be unsurpassed, if equalled by any other brought before them. Trusting in the sympathies of our fellow Christians, we shall still press forward in the work, relying upon God, and praying earnestly for His blessing on our undertaking.

MR. EDITOR:—

In your remarks regarding the present custom of reading the Psalter, you observe, you did not inquire what was proper, but rubrical. But do you not think that a custom more than a thousand years old, indeed as old as any of the ancient Liturgies, is as binding as a Rubric? WHEATLY, good authority in such matters, says, "The custom of singing or repeating the Psalms alternately, or verse by verse, seems to be as old as Christianity itself." And again, "This practice," (of singing or reading the Psalms responsively,) "so primitive and devout, our Church, (though there is no particular Rubric to enjoin it,) still continues in her service either by singing, as in our Cathedral worship, or by saying, as in the parochial. For in the former, when one side of the choir sing to the other, they both provoke and relieve each other's devotion: for which reasons in the parochial service, the reading of the Psalms is also divided between the Minister and the people. And, indeed, did not the congregation bear their part, to what end does the Minister exhort them to praise the Lord? or what becomes of their promise, that, their mouths shall show forth His praise?" DEATH OF THE REV. S. L. JOHNSON.

We are grieved to learn that the Diocese of Indiana has met with a severe loss in the death of the Rev. SAMUEL LEE JOHNSON, who died at Indianapolis on Sunday, the 24th of December.

The deceased was formerly a member of this Institution, passed through all its departments with great credit to himself, and was for two years a respected and efficient Tutor in the College. For the last several years he was Rector of the church in Indianapolis and of the Young Ladies' Seminary connected with the parish. He has been called away in the prime of life, from a sphere of great usefulness, and from the midst of a large circle of kindred and friends.

In his death, the Church Militant has been deprived of a most laborious and useful minister, and his venerable parents and other affectionate relatives of a staff and comforter whose place can only be supplied by Him who has triumphed over the grave and taken away the sting of death.

A NEW STORY OF OLD TIMES.

"A dreaming of the past! when will he cease
To think all wisdom buried in the past?
And is there nothing good, nor nothing true
In these our present days, that men must live
Immured like worms in musty tomes of old?"

OLD PLAY.

There is hardly any other thing in the constitution of our nature capable of affording enjoyment so pure and innocent as a reverent love for what is old, and at the same time stamped with the character of goodness. It is an elevated kind of pleasure that one feels who wanders alone through the aisles of some ancient christian temple, meditating upon the prayers and praises that have been echoed and re-echoed by its stately walls. The contrition of the sinful, the holy thoughts and resolutions of the returning penitent, the fervent longings of the faithful for greater progress in the life of holiness—these, and many other thoughts and feelings, unknown to us, but known to God, invest His holy places with almost an awful interest. So, too, there is a peculiar interest in all such passages of Holy Writ as relate to age adorned with holiness. Never can I hear without emotion narratives like that of old Barzillai, who, in declining a flattering offer made to him by King David, excused himself by saying—"I am this day four score years old: and can I discern between good and evil? Can thy servant taste what I eat, or what I drink? Can I hear any more the voice of singing men and singing women? Wherefore, then, should thy servant be a burden unto my lord the King? Thy servant will go a little way over Jordan with the King: and why should the King recompense it me with such a reward? Let thy servant, I pray thee, turn back again, that I may die in mine own city, and be buried by the grave of my father and of my mother!"

It is from the influence of this love for what is old that I have always sought the company of aged people, and have listened with all the admiration of youth to their stories of the manners and doings of the days when they were young, and have well nigh envied them the enjoyment of so many rich recollections of the now almost dreamy past.

It was not very long ago that I found myself sitting by the fireside of the home that was mine in boyhood's joyous hours, listening to the voice of one whom I was long since taught to reverence, as she told a tale of former days. Perhaps it would interest some, at least, of my younger brethren in the Holy church.

THE STORY.

"It was just after the Revolution," said my grandmother, "that what I am about to relate took place. Those were sad times, indeed, for the church in this country. With but few exceptions the clergy had been obliged to return to England, or to seek some other place for the exercise of their ministry; and the few that remained among us were often placed in great peril by the public performance of their sacred duties. So it was very seldom that we heard the sound of the church bell calling us to prayers in the times of peril and reproach. It was only when some earnest missionary, travelling over a great extent of this then thinly settled country, happened to be in the village, that we had the blessed privilege of going into the courts of the Lord's house, and worshipping Him in His holy temple.

"In the intervals between these occasional visits, my grandfather, a venerable old man, even in those distant days, would gather the family together early in the morning of the Lord's Day, and lead us, a patriarchal family, out yonder to the top of that beautiful hill where now stands a fine imitation of a Grecian temple: but it was then a Gothic temple of God's own making, with the trunks of trees for clustered columns, and the leafy branches for the lofty arch; and there, each one of us having his Book of Prayer, he would read such parts as he might of the Church of England's noble service; and the responsive voices of the little congregation would ascend to God like incense from an altar, as they took their part in the solemn chant or litany. Never has that form of prayer seemed to me more imposing, or more suited to its holy purposes, than when that pilgrim band of ours had met upon the wood-crowned hill to worship God. And now and then, as if to join with us in praising a common Maker, there would come from the forest a low, sweet murmuring, and ever and anon some bird would interpose a few clear, flute-like notes, that came like sun-beams breaking through the clouds. Those were hours of sacred joy, and it is still a pleasure to me to recall the holy influences of those sunny days of my childhood—those bright Sunday mornings under the open sky. Except the faint music of the trees, and the inconstant notes of the happy birds, all was still around us. There was no crowd of people to distract the attention, and keep the mind confined to earthly things; but we felt as if we were almost in the very presence of God, enjoying the light of His reconciled countenance. Oh, that such peace and joy may be mine when the days of my pilgrimage are ended!"

It was not an over-long tale; but the words presented to my mind a beautiful picture—a pilgrim family going to worship God, and offer up the incense of prayer and praise upon a natural altar. My fancy pictured with delight the figure of the venerable patriarch, surrounded by his children, and their children. Now I saw them crossing the fields where the flowers were smiling in the sunlight—now, winding through the aisles of the forest—now, ascending to the place already hallowed by many a prayer. Then I heard the words of that solemn service from the lips of the old man—words that now are heard the world around—in the high cathedral, in the humble village church, or in still ruder fane, and in the forest wild—everywhere the same—uniting many hearts in one—making the world a holocaust to God.

And when the picture faded away—perhaps it was wrong—but it left within me a feeling of pride, and I was glad that among my ancestors was that faithful servant of God, remaining constant in fidelity to the Church of Christ, amid the changes and confusion of those troublous times.

And then there came more serious and more suitable thoughts, and I found that in that simple story there was contained a useful lesson. It is this: that we should firmly adhere to the truth at all times, even if that adherence cause us trouble, or unjust reproach. It would have been easier for that aged man to forsake the worship of the Catholic Church, and join the assembly of those who had severed themselves from her communion, and who, to the sin of schism, too often add that of reviling her: but who can tell whether such a weak compliance on his part would not have deprived me of my inheritance? If he had erred a little, his children might have wandered farther, even beyond the fold of Christ; and I might have been this day among those who walk in ways of their own devising, instead of the old and sure paths of the Holy Church. And when I thought of this, I thanked God for that old Churchman's faithfulness, and prayed that we all might fulfil as well the duties that we owe to the mother of our new birth; not only for our own good, but also for the sake of those who shall come after us. The power of influence is like an invisible chain binding a man to his fellow man, and all mankind together. Its power is real, though unseen, and its possession a talent so valuable, that, no doubt, we shall have to render a strict account of it.

I know that many, even of the Church's children, are brought up under such unhappy influences that, perhaps, they may think they discover, in what I have said, a lack of what the world calls "charity." But they who have been rightly instructed in regard to "The Holy Catholic Church," will see that much less has been said than might have been said with truth and charity. So accustomed have we become to the presence of error, that we have almost forgotten that there is such a sin as schism? But such a sin there is. The Bible speaks of it, and the Prayer Book. Would you know what it is, and how it may be avoided? You may learn of him whom God has sent to teach you. Let our actions convict us of mocking God, when, upon our bended knees, we pray him to deliver us "from heresy and schism;" and let us show the truest charity for those who have abandoned the One Fold of the One Shepherd, by praying more earnestly that He would "bring into the way of truth all such as have erred and are deceived."

Edenton, N. C.

LITTLE GRAVES.

Sacred places for pure thoughts and holy meditations, are the little graves in the church-yard. They are the depositories of the mother's sweetest joys—half unfolded buds of innocence, humanity nipped by the first frost of time, ere yet a canker-worm of pollution had nestled among its embryo petals. Callous, indeed, must be the heart of him who can stand by a little graveside, and not have the holiest emotions of his soul awakened to thoughts of that purity and joy which belong alone to God and heaven; for the mute preacher at his feet tells him of a life begun and a life ended without a stain; and surely if this be vouchsafed to mortality, how much purer and holier must be the spiritual land, enlightened by the Sun of Infinite Goodness, whence emanated the soul of that brief young sojourner among us! How swells the heart of the parent, with mournful joy, while standing by the cold earth-bed of lost little ones! Mournful, because a sweet treasure is taken away—joyful, because that precious jewel glitters in the diadem of the Redeemer.

THE TEACHING OF ANIMALS.

"Immediately while he spoke the cock crew." What excellent teachers are dumb creatures! The cock here teaches Peter and puts him in mind of his unwatchfulness! How often hast thou been instructed, oh! my soul, by such creatures, and yet thou hast not been the better for it! The Lamb hath taught thee meekness, yet thou hast been angry and choleric. The serpent hath taught thee wisdom, yet thou hast continued foolish and imprudent. The ox knows his owner, and the ass his master's crib, yet thou hast not considered what vast mercies thy great Master hath poured out upon thee. The stork, the crane, and the swallow, return at their appointed times, yet thou hast not returned to thy God, at a time when He hath earnestly waited for thy conversion. The bee and ant teach thee industry, yet how lazy hast thou been in the work of thy salvation. The dog teaches thee fidelity, yet how unfaithful hast thou been to God, and to thy conscience. The snail teaches thee slowness to wrath, yet how thou hast broken forth into unruly passions. DR. ANTHONY HORNECK

GRISWOLD'S SACRED POETS OF ENGLAND AND AMERICA.—Now ready, in one elegantly printed octavo volume, embellished with fine steel plates, and neatly bound in scarlet and gold, price $3 50.

The Sacred Poets of England and America, for three centuries. Edited by Rev. Rufus W. Griswold.

The present editor has done very little more than rearrange and combine the materials furnished in "Gems of Sacred Poets," published recently by a member of the University of Oxford, and in critical and very interesting "Lives of the English Sacred Poets," by Robert Aris Wilmot, of Trinity College, Cambridge, which appeared under the direction of the Society for Promoting Christian Knowledge. He has, however, added some authors not quoted in either of those works, among whom are Shirley, Baxter, Toplady, Wesley, Williams, Moultrie, and Mrs. Steele, and of our own country, President Dwight, John Quincy Adams, Bishop Doane, Mr. Hillhouse, Wilcox, Crowell, Norton, Whittier, and Cox.

The religious poetry of the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries is eminently worthy of study, and it is little known. There is no poetry so rare as the poetry of devotion. In this collection are many pieces without the highest attributes of poetry; but very few, it is believed, which have not the simplicity, harmony and purity that will secure a welcome from every variety of readers. The importance of having works of this description, to elevate the taste and deepen the religious sentiments, can hardly be too highly estimated.

The Women of the Bible, with articles by eminent clergymen, edited by Rev. Dr. Wainwright, with 18 superb plates, in a new style of binding. Price $7—colored plates $12.

The Christian Year, or Thoughts in Verse, for the Sundays and Holidays throughout the year, by Rev. John Keble, A. M., beautifully illustrated with 16 engravings, designed by Cope, very elegantly bound in various styles.

CONSECRATION.—THE FLOATING CHURCH OF THE REDEEMER was solemnly consecrated by the Bishop of the Diocese, on Thursday morning, January 11th.

This most interesting service attracted a large congregation. The number of clergymen present was a gratifying proof of the general interest which this noble Missionary enterprise has excited.

The following clergymen were present. The Rev. Drs. Clay, Coleman, Dorr, Ducachet, Neville, and Stevens. The Rev. Messrs T. G. Allen, Dupuy, Durborow, J. M. Douglass, R. J. Douglass, R. C. Evans, Fowles, Harris, Howe, Miller, Newton, Odenheimer, Ogilby, Smith, Trapier, and Washburn of Pennsylvania. The Rev. Mr. Mitchell of New Jersey; and the Rev. Messrs Parker, and Southard of New York.

The procession moved from an adjoining counting room, headed by the Bishop, in his robes, and the officiating clergymen, and the Chaplain, in surplices. They entered the church in order, reciting the appointed Psalm.

The Bishop stated that he had received formal assurance that the chapel was free from debt, and after the reading of the request to consecrate, proceeded with the service, in which the Rev. Mr. Trapier, the chaplain, read the Sentence of consecration.

Morning prayer was then read by the Rev. Dr. Dorr, and the Rev. Mr. Parker, chaplain of "the Floating Church of our Saviour," New York.

The Bishop read the Ante-Communion service, and preached, standing by the Lectern, and without notes, an impressive Discourse from the text, Leviticus, xix: 30. "Ye shall keep my Sabbaths, and reverence my Sanctuary: I am the Lord."

The Bishop, in some introductory remarks, most happily alluded to the success which had attended this effort in behalf of Seamen. Only a few months had elapsed, since he was called upon to preside at the first meeting wherein the plan was begun, and to-day we saw the result, in the beautiful church which had been consecrated, and which was dedicated to God, entirely free from all liabilities. They had cause for thankfulness in looking back to the past, and reason to take courage in looking forward to the future.

The Bishop concluded with an earnest appeal to the sailors who might be present, to the employers of sailors, and to those who desired the good of man, to take an interest in this work. He presented it as a subject of especial interest to all who felt concerned in the success of Missions.

At the Bishop's request, the Rev. Mr. Parker, of "the Floating Church of our Saviour," made a most interesting statement of the success which had attended their efforts in New York in behalf of Seamen. He related several incidents to show how constantly opportunities of doing good, were presented to those laboring for the welfare of this class of men.

After a collection amounting to $97, the services were concluded by the Bishop.

We congratulate the Board of Managers upon the success which has crowned their noble efforts in behalf of humanity, a success the more gratifying because it has been deserved, as the result of zeal, devotion, and personal sacrifices.

The enterprising Architect, Mr. C. L. Dennington, also deserves our praise and congratulations for his share in the work. Under disadvantageous circumstances, he has completed this beautiful and appropriate building, and has done it well, in a very short time. A description of the church has already appeared in the Banner. But we must add that all who were present at the consecration service, agreed in the opinion that this building reflected great credit upon the architect, both from the convenience and propriety of its arrangements, and from the beauty of the design, and the manner in which it has been executed.

Complete the sacred structure stands,
And towers, majestic, from the wave:
A floating Church, a Christian ark:
The Sailor's soul from sin to save.

NEW JERSEY.

ST. MATTHEW'S CHURCH, NEWARK.—We recorded, in a late number of the Banner, the ordination of the Rev. David Julius Rosé. In expectation of receiving some particulars with respect to the field of this reverend gentleman's labors, we forbore, at the time, any mention of the interesting circumstances connected with his admission to the ministry of our Church.

It may, perhaps, be remembered that we copied, from the New York Churchman, an account of the German congregation formed at Newark under the name of St. Matthew's. This congregation, for the most part, and its Pastor, Mr. Rosé, were in connection with the Lutherans. Mr. R. having become convinced of the justice of her peculiar claims, as "the pillar and ground of the truth," became a Candidate for Holy Orders in our Church. And to the honor of both pastor and people, a large majority of his congregation followed his example. So that, we are informed, there are more than one hundred families of Germans constituting the parish of which Mr. R. has the spiritual charge. Since becoming a candidate, Mr. R. has been officiating as a Lay Reader. We esteem this as one of the most interesting cases in the records of the Church.

There are, in the city of Newark, five or six thousand native Germans, so that Mr. Rosé has a wide field of usefulness. Many of them, we are happy to be informed, "are continually asking for the offices of the Church."

Mr. Rosé is the first native German in our church, in charge of a native German Parish, and we trust he and his faithful flock may be the first fruits of a glorious harvest, gathered from this interesting people.

DIOCESE OF TENNESSEE.

RAVENS CROFT SEMINARY.—We have received two letters from clergymen, in Tennessee, with respect to this important institution. It demands the hearty and liberal support of all who feel interested in the church in the southwest. We have already commended it earnestly to the attention of our readers; we rejoice to hear of its present measure of prosperity, and we pray that the rich blessing of God, and the bounty of His faithful people, may crown it with abundant success. One of these correspondents thus writes:

"From the interest you take in all the church's nurseries, I know it will gratify you to learn that our own 'Ravenscroft' bids fair to become all that its friends can desire—a theological and collegiate institution, commensurate with the wants of the Diocese, and in a great degree of the whole southwest. Dr. Wheat, its efficient and devoted president, writes me, 'We have succeeded in getting a very fine house for the next two years. It has ample accommodations for our whole corps, President, professors, and pupils. We have selected a site for the college, and shall commence building immediately. Our funds in hand will enable us to make a very respectable beginning. As we shall go in debt for nothing, we shall need all the aid the church can give us.'"

"The Banner of the Cross has kindly noticed, and in terms of commendation, the inceptive steps which have been taken by the church in Tennessee for establishing a literary and theological school. This institution is intended, as you know, to embrace all the departments from the preparatory to the theological, inclusive: thus enabling us to educate our own sons, and at the same time providing us with a training school of the holy ministry of the church. Such a school, you will confess, must be a great want in our Diocese and in the whole region of the southwest. We feel it to be our great reliance, under God, for extending the influence of the church in this region, and for providing adequately a supply of efficient ministers. In this view the Bishop and the committee of the convention have selected an eligible site, well adapted to the designed purposes, and have resolved to proceed, at once to the extent of the means in hand, to erect suitable buildings. It is their purpose not to hazard the success of the undertaking by involving it in debt, and not to erect a huge or unsightly pile of buildings. They propose to erect plain and substantial houses in the rural Gothic or early English style, each of which shall contain accommodations for the family of a professor and for twenty or twenty-five pupils. The whole number of pupils will, on this plan, be divided into separate households, each under its responsible head, where they will receive direct personal supervision and care as to their comfort, health, manners, and moral and religious training.

The committee have determined to erect such buildings—one or more as the Church within the Diocese and without it, shall give them the means. Might we not look for aid to the Church north and east, in such a good work? We ask for no endowments, but simply for means to provide houses. We trust the school would be able to take care of itself, if it were once set up with the required buildings. The little that has been given to the Church in Tennessee has been used to the designed purpose, and none of it wasted or lost. It is on this ground, in part, that we venture to ask for more; at least, we would beg that we may be equal sharers in the noble benefactions of our brethren whom it has pleased God to favor more largely than ourselves. While many thousands of dollars have been freely given to the Church north of the Ohio, but few hundreds have been received by the Church south of that river. There is, then something like justice in the plea we urge in our behalf. There is a work for the Church here. I need not say how vast that work is. We know there are many who count it a blessed privilege to work with their weaker brethren in the holy cause of the Church of Christ, and to such we know we should not appeal in vain.

The Seminary is now in operation under the charge of President Wheat, and Professor MacLeod, occupying a spacious and convenient house hired for that purpose. The patronage is, already, encouraging, and we humbly trust that, under the blessing of the Great Head of the Church, RAVENS CROFT SEMINARY will grow to its completion as an enterprise of the Church in Tennessee. To this end, let it share in the charitable prayers and in the alms of our brethren in Christ.

NEW YORK.

MEETING OF THE NEW YORK ECCLESIOLOGICAL SOCIETY.

Pursuant to notice the members of the Society met in the school room of St. Paul's Chapel, on Monday evening, Jan. 8th, at half-past seven o'clock. The Rev. Dr. Forbes, President of the Society, being absent, the Rev. Dr. McVickar, Senior Vice President, took the Chair and called the Society to order.

The minutes of the last meeting were read, amended and approved.

The Report of the Committee was then read by Mr. S. Cox, Jr., one of the Secretaries, and on motion was accepted.

It appeared from this report that the Rt. Rev. the Bishops of North Carolina, Fredericton, and South Carolina, have been admitted Patrons, and eight ordinary members elected, in the recess of the Society.

The Rev. Dr. Muhlenberg then read an interesting paper on "The means of improvement in Church Music." Church music, he said, might be divided into three branches: Chanting, Metrical psalmody, and Anthems. Chanting was by many supposed to be impracticable but for trained choirs; and here the Rev. Dr. eloquently enlarged upon the many inconveniences and annoyances of choirs, as at present managed; especially as regards the employment of those who are merely professional persons, and are hired to "profane the service of the sanctuary." The beautiful intricacy of the anthem might resemble the richness of Gothic tracery, but it ought not to exclude the massive chorus of the congregation; nor should the choir bid the people be silent, when the Priest had just said to them: "Praise ye the Lord;" nor was it right that the only response to this stirring appeal should be warbled gently from a quartet in the organ loft. He advised meetings of the congregation to be holden for the express purpose of practice, and that this practice should begin with reading. They should become accustomed to the sound of their own voices, and speak out with a full round tone, for it was ridiculous to be talking about an accompaniment of "trumpets and shawms," to praises pronounced only in a smothered whisper. It should not be the ordinary conversational tone, but more elevated, more devotional. The congregation should be practised in reading until they read well together, making the pauses in good time, and beginning and ending together. Their clergyman was their best instructor thus far. They should next proceed to practise this reading on one note, chanting in monotone. This is what is commonly called intoning the service, there being but a slight inflection at the close. Thus much once accomplished it would be easy to master the rest of the cadence to our ordinary chants. In answer to the question "Is this practicable?" he could reply, "It has been done!" It required labor, zeal, and perseverance, as did every thing good; but it was possible. He recommended reviving, to some extent, the office of Parish Clerk, to lead the congregation in singing. But if the laity would not take an interest in the matter, all labors would be as useless as to strike the keyboard of an organ when there was no wind in the bellows to fill the pipes! The Gregorian chants in common use among us were not in their ancient form. They were originally composed on the syllabic basis; i. e. one note was intended to be sung to one syllable,—neither more nor less; an arrangement much better suited to the genius of the Latin than of the English tongue. In English its effect was too grave and severe. He thought the English chant preferable. It was more varied and lively, yet there was nothing light or trivial about it; it was purely ecclesiastical. It could be called our peculiar church song, for it was almost exclusively confined to our church. He did not see why the English Catholic should not have his peculiar music as well as the Roman Catholic. It had sprung from our English Psalter; yet it was as applicable to verse as to prose. The choir, he said, should be placed on the floor, so that they might be in reality a part of the congregation; and the organ should not be at the west end of the nave, but near the chancel, the better to inspire and sustain the voices of the congregation. The entrance to the choir could thus be through the Vestry Room, which would be a good way to prevent the intrusion of improper persons. As to the number of chants to be used, he thought it would be quite sufficient to have three for each Cantic, one of which should be jubilant, one penitential, for days of fasting and humiliation, and one for ordinary days. Too great a variety should be avoided. Antiphonal chanting he strongly recommended, either performed by two parts of the congregation, or by the minister and the people, all always joining in the Gloria Patria. The present mode of reading was in reality only the remnant of the old Antiphonal chanting. In the ancient Antiphonal singing of the Temple Service, each verse was divided, the latter half being the response to the former, thus following the parallelism of thought, which is the leading characteristic of Hebrew poetry. This gave far greater life and animation than our mode, which however has the authority both of the English and Continental usage. He recommended the employment of boys' voices. But the boys should be selected from the parochial schools and religiously trained, so as to avoid the desecration of the service so frequent in English Cathedrals. As to metrical psalmody, the Rev. Dr. thought that some were so zealous for chanting as to be in danger of unduly disparaging psalmody. He enlarged on the charms of rhythm and poetry, the use of which he declared to be Catholic according to St. Vincent's rule of "quod semper, ubique, et ab omnibus." Chanting had more of life and animation, but the other had greater majesty and volume of sound. He eulogised Luther's grand chorales, and their great influence in accomplishing their author's work in the Reformation. There should not be too great a variety sought for, and it would be well if particular tunes could be associated with particular words. He deprecated the use of the light and undignified tunes so popular in our time, but said that the proper remedy was to reform, not to abolish, psalmody; to restore the grand old chorale. Besides, it was impossible to banish it, even if we would. The people would not give it up. The Psalms were doubtless better in prose, and Hymns were the proper things for this branch of Church Music. He thought it a great pity that many of the metrical hymns of the Breviary had not been (like the Veni Creator Spiritus) translated into our Prayer Book as well as its Collects. The Rev. Dr. here broke off his remarks, stating that he had been compelled to neglect some branches of the subject for fear of trespassing too long on the attention of the Society.

A resolution of thanks to Dr. Muhlenberg, for his able and interesting paper, was passed; and, on motion of the Rev. Dr. Vinton, of Brooklyn, he was requested to continue his remarks, on some future occasion.

The elections of members made by the Committee, during the recess of the Society, were unanimously confirmed.

On motion of Mr. R. Ralston Cox, the Rev. Mr. Mahan was appointed to prepare an original paper, on the subject of Sepulchral Monuments, to be read before the next meeting.

The Corresponding Secretary then read a letter from Edmund A. H. Lechmere, Esq., Honorary Secretary of the Oxford Architectural Society, announcing that the New York Ecclesiologist Society had been received into union with them, and had been presented with their publications.

On motion of Mr. W. A. McVickar, it was voted to return thanks to the Oxford Society, and to insert the letter on the minutes of the Society.

On motion of Mr. Frank Wills, the thanks of the Society were voted to those who had made it donations during the past three months.

After some conversational remarks on various minor points, and suggestions from the Chair, as to the necessity, and the best mode, of increasing the subscription list of the New York Ecclesiologist, on motion, the Society adjourned.—Churchman.

ILLINOIS.

We have received a printed letter of "Dr. Totten about JUBILEE COLLEGE." Bishop Chase has addressed some "remarks," from which we take the following.

"To attempt any thing, by way of additional illustration of this important subject, would seem to mar the fair face of the above letter of good Dr. Totten. The reader will recollect the slanders of the enemies of Jubilee College; and here behold them all dispersed by the breath of truth. Even so may it be, with all the machinations of the wicked, who have endeavored or may hereafter endeavor to destroy the Protestant Episcopal Church or prevent its usefulness and progress throughout the far west."

The following extracts will show the value of the property, the names of the Faculty and Superintendent, and the result thus far of this College.

"The property belonging to the College may be safely estimated at a little over sixty thousand dollars, but most of it is now unproductive. It owns 2,500 acres of land in its immediate vicinity, and 1,760 in other parts of the State and in Michigan. This last is intended to be sold, and by the provisions of the charter must be sold, within three years of the present time. Besides this property in land there is a grist and saw mill on the Kickapoo creek, distant about three and a half miles from the College. Besides the college building there are on the premises, two boarding houses, one for the students and the other for the men employed on the farm, five dwelling houses and a store. The remaining possessions of the College are, the goods in the store, the live stock on the farm, and farming utensils.

"The Bishop, the Rev. Samuel Chase, and two sons of the Bishop, are the present faculty of the College. The Bishop receives no salary as President of the College except the provisions for his table. The Rev. Samuel Chase, who is head master in the College, and has the entire care of the boarding house, receives $700 per annum and board for himself and family. The Rev. Dudley Chase hears recitations in Theology, and has a salary of $200. Philander Chase, Jr., the youngest son of the Bishop, a graduate of the Institution, and also a student in theology, has $100 per annum.

"The superintendence of the workmen on the farm and at the mills, and the general care of all the real estate is committed to Mr. Henry I. Chase, another son of the Bishop, who receives $500 for his services but no prerequisites. The Bishop acts as treasurer, and gives general directions in relation to all the concerns of the Institution.

"I believe there is an impression at the east that the Bishop's private affairs are very much mixed up with the affairs of the College, but this is a great mistake. The College property is entirely distinct from his own private estate and is so entered on to books, and recognized in all his business transactions.

"Jubilee College has already done more for the Church than it has credit for. Twelve clergymen have received their education, either wholly or in part, within its walls, and there are now six candidates for orders among its students. These men will be fitted for this western service. They will know what work they are to be called upon to perform, and devote themselves to it with no expectations of being permitted to lead idle or luxurious lives. As a simple missionary establishment the college has done much for the cause of religion in the part of the country where it is located. No less than seven parishes have been founded by the clergy connected with it; three churches have been built, and as many more will probably be erected in the course of the next year. More than two hundred communicants have been collected in these parishes, and the Episcopal Church has become the leading denomination of Christians in this part of the State."

ALABAMA.

We are gratified to learn that since the consecration of Bishop Cobbs in 1844, the church, of which he has the spiritual oversight, has more than doubled. "The Lord God of your fathers make you a thousand times so many as ye are, and bless you as he hath promised you."—Episcopal Recorder.

Selections.

FROM THE CHARGE

Of His Lordship the Bishop of Montreal, to the Clergy of the Diocese of Quebec, delivered at Christ Church, Montreal, at the Triennial Visitation, in 1848.

MY REVEREND BRETHREN.—The last occasion upon which we were permitted to meet in Visitation, was marked, as most among you will remember, by an exceedingly awful public calamity, upon the spot where we were assembled. We stood in the midst of yet smoking ruins,—the second conflagration, which, within a month after the first devastated the ancient metropolis of the Province, having just freshly occurred. Alas! there is a deeper gloom now thrown over our meeting; we meet under the effects brought home to our own body, of a far sadder scourge from the hand of our God. We look for the familiar faces of some of our brethren in the ministry of the Church, who, according to all human calculation would have been among us to-day—but gaps have been made in the circle:—they are gone, and their place is nowhere found upon earth. A recent stroke has added one to the mournful list of the victims of the past year—a stroke the more felt because unexpected, for circumstances which are of public notoriety, have diminished the extent and altered the character of emigration from Ireland, and the amount of sickness and the number of deaths at the Quarantine Station, during the attendance of our lately deceased brother,—so far from resembling the state of things which marked the summer of 1847, was, beyond all precedent, small,—(in fact, only one death among the Protestant patients had occurred at the station when he left it)—added to which, the ample provisions which, in consequence of the severe lesson of a former season, have been made by public authority, to meet the demands of the case, and the admirable regulations which have been established in the hospitals, have sensibly lessened the danger of infection, which I believe to be less, at this moment, than in any former year.*

* This opinion has been since justified by events. No other

Yet, so it has been ordered by the wisdom of God that, although, with the exception of the memorable afflictions of last year, it had never happened that we lost a clergyman in this service, the very first of our faithful volunteers who now undertook it, has already fallen. Precious in the sight of the Lord is the death of his Saints. Honoured be the names among men, and dear be the memories of those devoted servants of God who counted not their lives dear unto them, while ministering to their humbler brethren in scenes of death and horror, and who, melancholy and grievous as has been the loss to their families and friends, have themselves finished their course with joy and are gone to their reward in Christ. To me, I hardly need point out that, as I was to a certain extent concerned in causing this exposure to danger of such among our martyr-clergymen, (in this sense) as contracted the disease at the Quarantine Island, (being one-half of the whole number who have died,) there is here an aggravation of poignancy in the sorrowful sense of our loss. Yet suffer me to mention some comfort which I have derived from the thought, not only that our Clergy, with no suggestion from their Bishop, were found at the post of danger in every other spot where the fever prevailed, and that the case, therefore, was not peculiar, of those to whom I proposed, last year, (of course, without enjoying it,) a share of the Quarantine duty; but also, even including those who served at that station, there was not one victim, who fell simply in the execution of the duty which I had indicated. The established term of duty was only for a week—the two who were taken from us last autumn, both voluntarily out-staid their time—one of them by his own express and earnest desire, had remained six weeks at the Island,—and, in human probability they might, but for their spontaneous extension of their term of service, have been here among us this day. With reference to the present season, you are aware, my brethren, that I made no suggestion whatever to individuals, upon the subject,—the occurrences to which I am here advertising, having caused me to shrink from assuming such a responsibility.

Deeply as we must deplore the loss of so many valuable lives, and severely as it must tell upon the interests committed to us, there can, I think, be but one sentiment, when the case is fairly and fully considered, respecting the plain duty lying upon the Church to supply the service in question. It would have been monstrous, it would have been outrageous, to leave the Protestant sufferers at Grosse Isle, after our Chaplain became disabled, untended by the ministry of the Gospel—and no means existed to supply this want, but in the succession of visits from clergymen at a distance. Upwards of five thousand four hundred bodies were buried in the Island during the single summer of 1847. In such a scene of death and human wretchedness, dreadful beyond conception in some of its details, and unsurpassed in the annals of history, it was not the part of the Church of England to leave her people to die like dogs, nor to deny to the bereaved and desolate survivors, to the helpless orphans and the heart-broken widows, who multiplied from day to day upon the Island, the soothing ministrations and the seasonable care and counsel of her faithful pastors. Among the sick and dying themselves, there were, no doubt, many examples of a condition in which, from the operation of different causes, the ministrations of the Church can be of little avail—but even in these it was a satisfaction to be at hand and to do all of which the case might admit—while in a vast multitude of other instances, the Clergy, I well know, and I may appeal to brethren who are here present,—I might appeal to the testimony of those who are gone and the assurances of the last of whom, to this very effect are, as it were, still sounding in my ears,—the Clergy, I well know, are prepared to say that they found their labours most affectionately appreciated, and, as they had reason to hope, profitably applied—that their presence was hailed, and the return of their visits was longed for, by the languishing sufferers among them, from building to building, and from tent to tent, and from ship to ship, they made their unceasing rounds—and that a gleam of joy,—yes, and not seldom, of holy joy would light up the sunken or all but closing eye, at seeing, charged, perhaps, with the sacred memorials of the sacrifice upon the cross, the messenger and representative of him who, in the days of his flesh, himself took our infirmities and bare our sicknesses; who went about doing good and healing all that were oppressed of the devil; and who in laying down his life for us all, bequeathed to us the lesson, as we are expressly taught, although our deaths cannot make the purchase of souls, that we ought to lay down our lives for the brethren. The case here in our contemplation, has been practically recognized by the Clergy of this Diocese, as constituting such a call:—they have not all taken a share in the task—it was not needed, it was not possible that they should,—nor is any inference to be made on this account, in the way of unfavourable comparison—but, in every place where the call existed, clergymen of the Church have been found to respond to it—and, may God give us all grace, more and more, to appropriate the language of the holy Apostle, in this or in any other case, should it ever arise, seeming to involve a risk of life in the cause of Christ, Yea, and though I be offered upon the service and sacrifice of your faith, I joy and rejoice with you all.

I have been prompted to make these observations, because, among the laity of the Diocese who lament the loss of their Clergy, and who have not personally witnessed the exigencies which called them into scenes of danger, there have been questions raised, here and there, respecting the expediency or even justifiableness of their being so employed; and reference, as I suspect, has, in some instances, been made to a Canon (the 67th) which exempts a clergyman from any compulsory attendance upon persons in his parish, labouring under maladies which are known or probably suspected to be infectious. The Rubrics, however, in the Office of the Visitation of the sick, which I conceive to be decidedly the preferable authority of the two, plainly suppose the attendance of the Clergy, even in the deadliest prevalence of plague. Would it not have been a reproach,—a disgrace would be the more appropriate term,—to the Church of England, to have left all the sick and dying Protestants at the clergyman, no medical gentleman, nor any of the subordinate functionaries and attendants at the island, have contracted fever up to this date (the middle of September). The number of protestant interments during the whole summer has been 18.

Quarantine Island, to the care and instruction of Priests of the Church of Rome, never slackening in their labours, never shrinking from their task, never abating in their zeal for proselytism, and in the case which we are supposing, having all the advantage accruing from a discouraged and exasperated feeling of the Protestant patients, on account of the neglect with which they were treated by their own Church? Would it not have been a reproach, would it not have been a disgrace, would it not have been an indelible, an everlasting stain in the pages of our history in the Colony, if, while physicians and magistrates and nurses and policemen and grave-diggers were found capable of braving the danger, and while mere secular motives prevailed to engage some of these parties in their respective service at the Island, or in other places within the Province where fever-hospitals were established—the Clergy of the Church of England had turned their backs upon the scene of death and sorrow, and had shut their ears against the cry of the sick for their ministry, and the wail of the widow, needing to hear the words of life and peace?

The Clergy who served at the Island had a sufficiently hard service to perform; and in the confusion of last summer, from the overwhelming flood poured in, of misery and disease, and the imperfect provisions which were at command for meeting the emergency,—the sick dying, at one time, by wholesale, from the mere want of attendance, and the entire establishment, notwithstanding an incessant watchfulness, and a wonderful degree of energy and administrative skill exhibited by the chief authority upon the spot itself, being carried on for a long time by strained expedients and inadequate shifts,—it was not easy to provide for the comfort and accommodation of the Clergy, in such a manner as might have been desired. But if any idea has been suffered to go abroad that the illness of the Clergy was liable to aggravation from any oversight in these points, the means are not wanting emphatically to contradict it. The Diocesan Church Society and other authorities concerned did their utmost to provide all that was needful in this behalf. The Society charged itself unhesitatingly with the expenses to be incurred for the object,—as well as with all the expenses to which the Clergy were subjected by their visits to the Island; including, in the case of those in whom the fever appeared after their return home, the charges of their medical advisers; but the Government ultimately took the whole upon itself and the Society was reimbursed.

FALL OF THE ROSBERG.

(From Simond's Switzerland.)

I shall here give some of the most authentic and interesting circumstances of the fall of the Rosberg, taken from the narrative published at the time by Dr. Zay, of Art, an eye witness:

The summer of 1806 had been very rainy; and on the first and second of September it rained incessantly. New crevices were observed in the flank of the mountain; a sort of cracking noise was heard internally; stones started out of the ground; detached fragments of rocks rolled down the mountain. At two o'clock in the afternoon, on the second of September, a large rock became loose, and in falling raised a cloud of black dust. Toward the lower part of the mountain, the ground seemed pressed down from above: and when a stick or a spade was driven in, it moved of itself. A man, who had been digging in his garden, ran away from fright at these extraordinary appearances; soon a fissure, larger than all the others, was observed; insensibly, it increased; springs of water ceased all at once to flow, the pine-trees of the forest absolutely reeled; birds flew away screaming. A few minutes before five o'clock, the symptoms of some mighty catastrophe became still stronger; the whole surface of the mountain seemed to glide down, but so slowly as to afford time to the inhabitants to go away. An old man, who had often predicted some such disaster, was quietly smoking his pipe, when told by a young man running by, that the mountain was in the act of falling; he rose and looked out, but came into his house again, saying that he had time to fill another pipe. The young man, continuing to fly, was thrown down several times, and escaped with difficulty; looking back, he saw the house carried off at once.

Another inhabitant took two of his children and ran away with them, calling to his wife to follow with the third; but she went in for another who still remained (Marianne, aged five); just then Francisca Ulrich, their servant, was crossing the room with this Marianne, whom she held by the hand, and saw her mistress at the instant, as Francisca afterwards said, "the house appeared to be torn from its foundation, (it was of wood,) and spun round and round like a teetotum; I was sometimes on my head, and sometimes on my feet, in total darkness, and violently separated from the child." When the motion stopped, she found herself jammed in on all sides, with her head downwards, much bruised and in extreme pain. She supposed she was buried alive at a great depth; with much difficulty she disengaged her right hand, and wiped the blood from her eyes. Presently she heard the faint moans of Marianne, and called her by her name; the child answered that she was on her back, among stones and bushes, which held her fast, but that her hands were free, and that she saw the light, and then something green; she asked whether people would not come soon to take them out.

Francisca answered that it was the day of judgment, and that no one was left to help them, but that they would be released by death, and be happy in Heaven. They prayed together; at last Francisca's ear was struck by the sound of a bell, which she knew to be that of Stenenburg; then seven o'clock struck in another village, and she began to hope that there were still living beings, and endeavoured to comfort the child; the poor little girl was at first clamorous for her supper, but her cries soon became fainter, and at last quite died away. Francisca, with her head downwards and surrounded with earth, experienced a sense of cold in her feet almost insupportable; after prodigious efforts she succeeded in disengaging her legs, and thinks this saved her life. Many hours had passed in this situation, when she again heard the voice of Marianne, who had been asleep, and now renewed her lamentations. In the meantime the unfortunate father, who with much difficulty had saved himself and two children, wandered about till daylight, when he came among the ruins to look for the rest of his family; he soon discovered his wife, by a foot which appeared above ground; she was dead with a child in her arms. His cries and the noise he made in digging, were heard by Marianne, who called out. She was extricated with a broken thigh, and saying that Francisca was not far off, a further search led to her release also, but in such a state that her life was despaired of. She was blind for some days, and remained subject to convulsive fits of terror. It appeared that the house, or themselves at least, had been carried down about one thousand five hundred feet from where it stood before.

In another place a child two years old was found unhurt, lying on his straw mattress upon the mud, without any vestige of the house from which he had been separated. Such a mass of earth and stones rushed at once into the lake of Sowerly, although five miles distant, that end of it was filled up, and a prodigious wave passing completely over the island of Schwanau, seventy feet above the usual level of the water, overwhelmed the opposite shore, and as it returned swept away into the lake many houses with their inhabitants. The chapel of Olten, built of wood, was found half a league from the place it had previously occupied, and many large blocks of stone completely changed their position."

SAILOR'S GENEROSITY.

The following is a touching instance of the generous feeling by which seamen are animated, and encourages those who are engaged in the good work of elevating the moral and spiritual condition of this class.

"You will be obliged to dismiss that woman, she does her work so badly," said Capt. R. to the steward of the Sailor's Home, one day.

"I suppose I shall," answered the steward. "I took her in from pity."

"From pity? Who is she, and what is she?"

"She is a poor Irish woman, just arrived in this country; her husband died a few months ago, and left her a widow, with six young children. She has left them in Ireland, and come over here to find employment, to earn enough, if possible, to bring them over; such is her story, and she seems honest enough."

"Well, show her how to do her work and keep her awhile, till we know more about her."

She was modest, diffident and retiring, little disposed to be communicative, and with little appearance of energy of character.

"You have left your children in Ireland, I understand?" said the Captain, approaching her.

"I have, all of them, the dear ones."

"How old are they?"

"The oldest little girl was thirteen and a half when I left her in care of them all, and the youngest, sweet one, was a little more than two."

"How long since your husband died, and how have you supported them since?"

"My husband died about four months before I left Ireland, poor man, and left us in a little cottage, and not half of a quarter of an acre of land; and the rent was twenty-five shillings a year. I put the land into potatoes and garden vegetables for the support of the children; but that was little you see, sir, after paying the rent. I thought I should be obliged to take them to the poor house; so I says what I thought to the children; but Johnny says to me—that is the second one, dear boy—'O dear mother, do not send us to the poor house, for ye see they will not let ye come with us, and we shall be separated from you; and the white swelling is there, and many of the children dies; but do, dear mother, leave us here to get along as well as we can, while you go to America; and it may be, mother, with God's blessing, ye may be able to fetch us all over at last, if it be but only one at a time.' And so the child was teasing me day and night to come to America; so I wrote a letter to my two sisters in New York, the one at service, the other married, for the loan of a few pounds to fetch me over; and they sent me six pounds; and I left the younger children asleep when I came away, for I knew, sir, if I parted from them awake, they would cry so after me, it would break my poor heart."

The Irish mother toiled on, after this conversation, for weeks, and even months, doing her work better and better, and remitting every cent of her wages, often in advance, to her children, and receiving in return from them, letters, from which we give a few extracts:

"DEAR MOTHER,—Soon after you left us, the landlord seeing we could not pay the rent, took the best bed, and the bedstead, and the table, and the chairs, and left us only the blankets, and the straw on the ground; but I hope you will return him thanks, and his family, in your next letter, for giving the house gratis to us, this present year. . . . 'Dear Mother,—The price of meal here is one shilling and sixpence; the worst of flour the same; in regard of the prices being so high, that we deferred to pay their demands, for rent, &c., which you had mentioned in your letter, until the next time you write. Catherine bought no shoes since you left home; in like manner, she would want to buy some clothes for the children. Dear mother we must buy the firing, too, for if we do be seen in the mountains, or in any other place, gathering sticks, we will be summoned. Dear mother, I hope you will send for myself, that is Johnny, as soon as you can, if you think I would be of any benefit to you there."

The mother, with her Irish heart almost crushed with the thought, that although nearly a year had passed, not enough had been saved to pay the passage money of the first child, was about resolving to go back and starve with her children in Ireland. But, by a good Providence, she was in the Sailor's Home—her case reached the ears of sailors. The distance from a sailor's ear to his heart is short, from his heart to his pocket shorter. A subscription was started among the boarders, and raised at once to sixty dollars; increased a few days afterwards, by another set of boarders, to one hundred dollars, and by a loan from her relatives and an advance of her wages, to one hundred and forty dollars, sufficient to provision and pay the passage of the whole six.

The second Sabbath in November, in the morning, one of the runners of the house made his appearance before the door with six thinly clad, bare-headed and bare-footed Irish children. The meeting of mother and children was a meeting of Irish hearts: they laughed and cried all at once, and all together. The first burst of joy over, Croton water, hair-brush and comb did all that a mother's love and ingenuity could do to improve the condition and appearance of the young voyagers. At evening, she might be seen in her little room, by a cheerful light, and with a more cheerful heart, gazing into the face of one and then another of her sleeping children, as they lay in pairs in different beds about the room.

"This is the first place I came to in America," said she, "and this is the best place I have found yet, and this is the happiest hour I have seen. By the blessing of God, and the kindness of the sailors, God bless them all their days, we are all here in America." The children want shoes and clothes, and the older ones employment. If we can get the latter, we will soon have all the rest.—Sailor's Magazine

KING JAMES AND THE SEVEN BISHOPS.

From the "Times" Review of Macaulay's History.

Last of all appeared the ever-celebrated ordinance that the famous Declaration of Indulgence, exemplifying the power of the Sovereign to dispense with the statutes of the realm, should be read in all churches.

"The Saturday passed over without any sign of relenting on the part of the government, and the Sunday, (May 20, 1688,) arrived,—a day long remembered. In the city and liberties of London were about a hundred parish churches. In only four of these was the order in Council obeyed. At St. Gregory's the declaration was read by a divine of the name of Martin. As soon as he uttered the first words the whole congregation rose and withdrew. At St. Matthew's, in Friday street, a wretch named Timothy Hall, who had disgraced his gown by acting as broker for the Duchess of Portsmouth in the sale of pardons, and who now had hopes of obtaining the vacant Bishopric of Oxford, was in like manner left alone in his church. At Serjeants'-inn, in Chancery lane, the clerk pretended that he had forgotten to bring a copy, and the Chief Justice of the King's Bench, who had attended in order to see that the royal mandate was obeyed, was forced to content himself with this excuse. Samuel Wesley, the father of John and Charles Wesley, a curate in London, took for his text that day the noble answer of the three Jews to the Chaldean tyrant—'Be it known unto thee, O King, that we will not serve thy gods nor worship the golden image which thou hast set up.' Even in the chapel of St. James' Palace the officiating minister had the courage to disobey the order. The Westminster boys long remembered what took place that day in the Abbey. Sprat, Bishop of Rochester, officiated there as Dean. As soon as he began to read the declaration, murmurs and the noise of people crowding out of the choir drowned his voice. He trembled so violently that men saw the paper shake in his hand. Long before he had finished the place was deserted by all but those whose situation made it necessary for them to remain. Never had the church been so dear to the nation as on that day. The spirit of dissent seemed to be extinct. Baxter from his pulpit pronounced an eulogium on the Bishops and parochial clergy. The Dutch Minister, a few hours later, wrote to inform the States-General that the Anglican Priesthood had risen in the estimation of the public to an incredible degree. The universal cry of the Non-conformists was, that they would rather continue to be under the penal statutes than separate their cause from that of the prelates."

How the seven Bishops petitioned the King, how they were sent to the Tower, and how they were subsequently tried for publishing a false, malicious, and seditious libel, every school-girl knows. As far as legal talent went in this famous cause the crown was overmatched. So low had it been forced to descend for its tools that it could scarcely range a few third-rate lawyers against the whole strength of the profession. For the Bishops there appeared Sawyer and Finch, Maynard and Pemberton, Pollexfen and Treby, Holt and Somers. The hall, the palace yard, and the streets to an immense distance were thronged with people. Thirty-five peers were counted in the crowd. On the bench sat all the four judges,—Allybone, a Papist; Holloway, hitherto a ready instrument of the government; Powell, a man of better promise; and Wright, the Chief Justice, no unworthy successor of Jeffreys, but who was this day overawed by the aspect of his auditory and by an instinctive apprehension that the end of these things was nigh. According to the expression of an eye-witness, he looked askant at the muster of Earls and Barons, "as if every Peer present had a halter in his pocket." At length the trial began, and was conducted with such vehemence, acrimony, and undaunted boldness as have never been since paralleled. The scales of fortune went up and down so suddenly as to keep the anxiety of the audience at its utmost stretch. The defendants were first charged with having written the libel, and this was at length proved. But had they written in the county of Middlesex, as the indictment set forth? They had certainly not, and the case for the prosecution seemed to be breaking down, when the crown lawyers, abandoning the charge of writing, applied themselves to the proof of publication. Even this seemed to be beyond their power, and the Chief Justice was reluctantly proceeding to charge the jury favourably for the defendants, when one of their counsel, Finch, prayed to be heard. His indiscreet interruption threatened to be fatal to his clients, for during the delay thus caused, the renegade Sunderland appeared in court, all pale and trembling, and proved the publication. But the turn thus given to the trial was of unspeakable advantage to the constitutional cause, for the argument was now diverted from the technicalities of law to the real points at issue—the legality of the King's dispensing power, and the right of the subject to petition.

"Somers rose last. He spoke little more than five minutes, but every word was full of weighty matter; and when he sat down his reputation as an orator and as a constitutional lawyer was established. He went through the expressions which were used in the information to describe the offence imputed to the Bishops, and showed that every word, whether adjective or substantive, was altogether inappropriate. The offence imputed was a false, a malicious, a seditious libel. False the paper was not, for every fact which it set forth had been proved from the journals of parliament to be true. Malicious the paper was not, for the defendants had not sought an occasion of strife, but had been placed by the government in such a situation that they must either oppose themselves to the royal will, or violate the most sacred obligations of conscience and honor. Seditious the paper was not, for it had not been scattered by the writers among the rabble, but delivered privately into the hands of the King alone; and a libel it was not, but a decent petition, such as, by the laws of England—nay, by the laws of imperial Rome, by the laws of all civilized states, a subject who thinks himself aggrieved may with propriety present to the Sovereign."

The judges summed up. Wright and Allybone declared, though with some hesitation of expression, that the petition was a libel in the eyes of the law. Holloway evaded the point of the dispensing power, but pronounced against the libel. Powell alone boldly declared the claims and conduct of the King to be irreconcilable with the laws of England. The jury retired at dark. All night long the solicitor for the Bishops, with a body of attendants, watched the door of the room in which they were confined, to preclude any communication or supplies. As day broke a little water for washing was taken in to them, which they lapped up like famished hounds. Nine were for acquittal, three for conviction. This minority soon dwindled to a solitary unit, but the unit was formidable. Michael Arnold, the brewer to the palace, had been heard before the trial wringing his hands and crying, "Whatever I do I must be half-ruined! If I say 'Not guilty,' I shall brew no more for the King, and if I say 'Guilty,' I shall brew no more for anybody else." He now threatened to hold out, but Thomas Austin, a country gentleman of good estate, who had conscientiously taken notes all through the case, after vainly challenging his stubborn fellow-juror to argument, at length exclaimed, "Look at me. I am the largest and strongest of the twelve, and before I find such a petition as this a libel, I will stay here till I am no bigger than a tobacco-pipe."

"At ten, the Court again met; the crowd was greater than ever. The jury appeared in their box, and there was a breathless stillness.

"Sir Samuel Astry spoke. 'Do you find the defendants, or any of them, guilty of the misdemeanour whereof they are impeached, or not guilty?' Sir Roger Langley answered, 'Not Guilty.' As the words passed his lips, Halifax sprang up and waved his hat. At that signal, benches and galleries raised a shout. In a moment ten thousand persons, who crowded the great hall, replied with a still louder shout, which made the old oaken roof crack, and in another moment the innumerable throng without set up a third huzza which was heard at Temple Bar. The boats which covered the Thames gave an answering cheer. A peal of gunpowder was heard on the water, and another, and another, and so in a few moments the glad tidings went flying past the Savoy and the Friars to London bridge, and to the forest of masts below. As the news spread, streets and squares, market-places and coffee-houses, broke forth into acclamations. Yet were the acclamations less strange than the weeping. For the feelings of men had been wound up to such a point that at length the stern English nature, so little used to outward signs of emotion, gave way, and thousands sobbed aloud for very joy. Meanwhile from the outskirts of the multitude horsemen were spurring off to bear along all the great roads intelligence of the victory of our church and nation. Yet not even that astounding explosion could awe the bitter and intrepid spirit of the Solicitor. Striving to make himself heard above the din, he called upon the judges to commit those who had violated by clamour the dignity of a court of justice. One of the rejoicing populace was seized. But the tribunal felt that it would be absurd to punish a single individual for an offence common to hundreds of thousands, and dismissed him with a gentle reprimand."

SATURDAY, JANUARY 20, 1849.

THE EDITOR OF THE BANNER wishes it to be distinctly understood that he has nothing to do with the business arrangements of this paper. Subscriptions, payments, and advertisements, must be directed to the PUBLISHERS. The free list of this paper, it has been found, is too large. The settlement of this matter rests entirely with the PUBLISHERS AND PROPRIETORS.

THE PROPOSED COLLECTION FOR ESTABLISHING THE CHURCH IN CALIFORNIA.

We are happy to find that others have come forward to second the plan, first set forth in this paper, by a correspondent from Maryland, and urged in the few but earnest remarks, prefixed by the Editor of the Banner. It is a subject of deep interest to all who desire from their hearts, to extend the Church, as we regard her Holy, Catholic, and Apostolic character, upon earth. The world, in all its wide field of destitution, offers no more advantageous opportunity. But the effort to be successful, must be prompt. This is not a matter merely to think, and talk, and write about, it is a case which demands ACTION. Let those who feel a real and hearty desire to do good, proceed at once to carry out the plan proposed.

To begin aright, the first thing to be secured is the hearty and united approval of THE BISHOPS, to lead in their respective Dioceses. Without their consent nothing should be attempted, as, of course, nothing can be effected. If the proposed design approves itself to a majority of our Bishops, it will most certainly succeed. And thus, the greatest work which our American branch of the Church has yet undertaken, will surely prosper. The noble example which the Church of England has given, in providing Bishops for the colonies, should animate us. And we are not called upon merely to provide for a colony, but for a most important portion of our own broad country, filling up with our own citizens, and many of them members of our own Church. A daily paper gives us the following, which is only one of many such cases.

FOR CALIFORNIA.—The number of passengers who have already sailed, or are on the point of sailing from Boston to California, is three hundred and seventy. The Boston Journal says there are now between twenty and thirty vessels at Boston for California, most of which will carry out a greater or less number of passengers. Two hundred and ninety-two passengers left New York on Saturday in two ships, and some fifty more are ready to follow. Two hundred left Baltimore last week.—Throughout the West parties are forming to go to the gold land; so that California will soon have a numerous population, who will build up flourishing towns upon the Pacific, and expedite the period when the East Indies and China trade will take this course.

The importance of this field, and the results to follow from its proper occupation by the Church, are so well declared in the article we copy from "the Calendar," that we need add nothing more on this subject.

We cannot let the following sneer of "the Pittsburgh Catholic" pass without notice.

MISSIONARIES FOR CALIFORNIA.—We learn from the Christian Advocate of the 18th inst., that the Presbyterians and Baptists are sending Missionaries to this benighted land. The Methodists are looking out, but have not yet made an appointment. Just now there seems to be a great deal of pious solicitude for California. We do not wonder why.

The fear of exciting such ill-natured thoughts may deter some from engaging in this good work, lest it may be thought that they want to send missionaries to share the gold of California! The Pittsburgh Catholic may well entertain such fears, as it is well known what has been the past history and character of their missions and missionary establishments in California. They did not seek gold indeed, because they did not know it was to be found! In reading the accounts of these "Missions," by those who have visited them, we are strongly reminded of the dialogue between Samuel and Saul in 1 Sam. xv. "And Samuel came to Saul; and Saul said unto him, blessed be thou of the Lord; I have performed the commandment of the Lord."

And Samuel said, "What meaneth then this bleating of the sheep in mine ear, and the lowing of the oxen which I hear?"

And Saul said, "They have brought them from the Amalekites."

If these "Missions," instead of bestowing their chief attention upon farms and oxen, and merchandize, had fulfilled the high object of elevating the moral and spiritual condition of the natives, there would not have been so much occasion for the proposed efforts.

It is not our part to answer for "the Presbyterians," "Baptists," and "Methodists," but in reply to this imputation, so far as we are concerned, these efforts in behalf of California were begun, and two missionaries appointed by our Church before the golden attractions were developed. And what if they were not? We care not what has drawn this immense tide of population thither, it is the rapid growth of this country, and the fearful rapidity with which it is becoming peopled, before any suitable provision can be made for its spiritual wants, which calls upon the Church of God for speedy action, suited to the demands of the case. An empire is about to rise almost in a day, and our Church has but a solitary missionary there, and one more appointed.

The great distance of this country from the United States makes it necessary that a Bishop should be on the spot, to order the Church, and to provide at once for the training of men of the soil, and ordaining them for immediate work.

We are happy to inform our readers that one of our Bishops, and one who does not easily let a good cause fall to the ground, has entered into this important matter. This will be seen from the following article in the last "Missionary." We know also that this article was prepared, though not published, before the notice appeared in the Banner. This adds to the force of these separate articles, that the subject was suggested to different minds, without consultation, at one and the same time.

BISHOPS FOR CALIFORNIA AND AFRICA.

No one will fail to read the admirable letter of the Bishop of Gibraltar to the Archbishop of Canterbury. The copy received from the Right Reverend Author—well remembered at Fulham, and at the office of the venerable Society, before his consecration—was sent at once to the printer. It applies, with scarcely an exception, to American as well as to English Churchmen. Let us take it in the spirit, if not in the letter. Why should not our Whitsun-day services commemorate the Tercentenary of the Prayer Book? Why should not our altars unite our alms and our prayers—like Cornelius of old—as a memorial before God? Why should not the American Church combine, on that day, for the endowment of a MISSIONARY BISHOP FOR CALIFORNIA, and a MISSIONARY BISHOP FOR AFRICA? The provision might be so arranged, that in the event of the Church, in California, or in Africa, assuming the support of its own Episcopate, the investment should be available to the support of some other Missionary Bishop, at the discretion of the House of Bishops. The surplus, from the Offertory, if any, over and above the sufficient endowment, to be equally divided between the Domestic and Foreign Committees. The deficiency, if any, to be made up by accruing interest on the amount received, which the respective Treasurers should invest for the purpose; and by the alms of the faithful.

The excellent lady, from whom the following letter was received, will be glad to know, that the foregoing had been written, before her burning words were read. They cannot fail to reach and warm all hearts. Her good judgment will lead her to the conclusion, that the meeting of the next General Convention, in October, 1850, will be as soon as an enterprise so great could well be brought to bear. But, let the lady speak:

"While the thirst for gold is creating such an excitement and inducing so many to leave their altars and fire-sides, and fly to California, in search of perishing riches, have you thought of the great importance of establishing there a pure and uncorrupted branch of the Holy Catholic Church, and taking possession of the land, by sending out an efficient Mission, with a Bishop at its head; before the errors of Romanism, and the delusions of the sects, shall have overrun the country, and filled it with so wild a crop of poisonous weeds, as will choke the good seed, which the tardy husbandman may, at last, be sent forth to scatter? This field seems to be clearly our own. And as it is so much easier to prevent, than to cure, an evil; should it not be an object, first, to possess ourselves of a post, which is so important? Although we are more alive to these things than formerly, I am yet sometimes amazed to see what a paralysis is upon us. Surely, the blessed Church of our love might learn most useful lessons, in zeal and activity, from Romanism, on one hand, and from Methodism on the other.

"Forgive me for occupying your time. But it seems to me most desirable to turn your energies into this channel. If we wait for the meeting of the General Convention, or of other dilatory bodies, how can it be otherwise than that error will overrun the land, before Truth has girded herself for the journey. If a few devoted men, endowed with full authority, could be sent there, how much might be accomplished, in diffusing the knowledge of the truth; in introducing the elements of true religion among those who are in so great danger of being corrupted by riches, and perishing for lack of knowledge; and by establishing institutions for Education, of the importance of which, in your own diocese, you have shown yourself so wisely and so well aware. Will you not, if you have not already done so, turn your thoughts to this subject; and use every effort to plant the Banner of the Cross upon that shore? For the love of Christ, let the pure gold of His word be scattered through the land, whose bosom pours forth streams of wealth so corrupting and corruptible, that, if there is no one to cast the healing branch into the waters, the treasure, which, if blessed, would prove so rich a blessing, may be turned into a bitter curse.

"I am told that the Roman Missions in California have expired; and that one Clergyman of our Church has gone there. But what can one accomplish? I am aware, too, that the Treasury of the Board of Missions is very low. But we know that there is a great deal of wealth among the members of our Church; and, if for such an object the rock is smitten, will not the waters gush out? Now, pray do not smile at my earnestness. It does seem to me that the subject is worthy of it. Let me hope that, you will think so too; and will act, while I can only talk—woman's one privilege!"

To this we have only to add the following able article from the last Calendar.

CALIFORNIA MISSION. Rev. R. W. Clarkson

MR. EDITOR:

In the "Banner of the Cross," published December 23d, I observed a communication from a Reverend gentleman of Maryland, respecting the 300th anniversary of the public use of the English Service Book. The writer sympathizes with the views of the Bishop of Gibraltar, and desires to transplant the idea of that prelate from English to American soil. The Bishop recommends that this three hundredth anniversary which falls on Whitsunday, May 27th, should be signalized by some extraordinary effort to extend the blessings of the Christian Church in the dependencies of Great Britain. Our writer proposes that on Whitsunday, five months hence, the alms of all members of the Holy Catholic Church in America, "from Saint Croix to the Rio Grande," should be asked and contributed to endow the Episcopate and Presbytery in California. This is to be done in remembrance of the same act of God, viz: the restoration in England of the pure and undefiled worship of the Primitive Church, of which blessings we ourselves are partakers.

The object proposed is holy, and the plan magnificent. It ought to be supported by every one who daily and devoutly prays, "Thy Kingdom come." Christ will conquer sin and the Devil, and His Blessed Kingdom will come; but the means must be used. All God's promises are conditional; we must do our part. That part is to supply means and men.—He will give the bountiful harvest.—When all has been done which must be done, then, and not till then, shall the kingdoms of the world become the kingdoms of Christ.

I had been thinking and talking as much as my limited circle of acquaintance would permit, upon this very subject of a mission to California, when I was cheered to find that one person in a distant diocese has the same thought with myself. One person; nay, I am persuaded that thousands have similar thoughts—that they are equally persuaded of the vast importance of this same object.—Would that we all could come together and consult. Would that as if by one voice we could say, "It shall be done." I second, therefore, the proposal of the writer in the "Banner," and desire that every Christian who loves the Redeemer's Kingdom; the Church which He has purchased with His own blood, would converse with his friends and communicate his sentiments through the paper of his diocese.

The precise object of this collection on Whitsunday, is to support a Bishop and as many presbyters as the money will admit, to carry and perpetuate "the Church and the Bible," among the millions who will soon people California. The authorities who should be urged to take the first step, are, of course, the Right Reverend Fathers, each in his own diocese. The money ought to be funded and held in trust for this special object, by the proper authorities of the Board of Domestic Missions, subject to the order of the proposed Bishop. By these steps, a sure support will be given to the Gospel, and eternal blessings follow their accomplishment.

The mind is almost overwhelmed in tracing the benefits which would accrue from the speedy action proposed upon this subject. The population will before many years, approach to that of our own nation—while California will be vastly richer, and therefore more powerful than we are at this moment. Such an empire in itself as that country will be, centering the trade of the two continents, must exert an incalculable influence upon the world. Every merchant will know her ports; her steamers will traverse the Straits which divide the two islands of Japan, containing 12,000,000 of people—and can we doubt that the ports of that empire will finally be opened by the golden key? Thence they will seek China whose 300,000,000 will as readily respond to the magic touch of the golden wand, Cochin-China, Siam, Malacca, will in turn become most intimately connected with California.

But what has this to do with the Episcopate and Whitsunday? Much every way—for we may be assured that the religion of California will be the religion of Japan and China; for missionaries will go from that country as readily as merchants. Thus it would appear that California is the nation which God will raise up, to turn nearly one half of earth's inhabitants from Pagan darkness to Gospel light. And this may be, nay must be the direct result of the Whitsunday collection of alms.

While we are talking, others are doing. Already some presbyterian missionaries have sailed. Nay, the Free Masons (!) have just deputed a dignitary of their society to extend its numbers in California. Should we stand by and not lift a finger, to see heresy and schism, and infidelity, and secret societies, taking the very ground which ought to be occupied by the Divine society, the Kingdom of Christ? Let us arise, brethren, and shake off the fetters which enchain the Church. Look at Wisconsin, and see what perseverance has there effected in seven years, under every discouragement; and allowing for different circumstances, what might not seven years bring forth in California?

But if that country is to be Christianized, it must be begun with wisdom. A broad and firm foundation must be laid. The Church must be sent in completeness; that is, a Bishop and his clergy. Not solitary presbyters with no Bishop to rule them; who would labor without effect because without a responsible Head. To send presbyters alone—as a specimen of the Church, would be like the man who showed a single brick as a sample of the house he wished to sell; or, like an animal whose body and limbs are perfect, but whose head has been omitted. If any thing shall be effected, it must be by following the apostolic rule, and sending an apostle. Then with apostolic preaching and living, we might hope for apostolic results. Only remember the proverb "What is worth doing, is worth doing well."

It may be supposed that little good can now be effected among people so intent upon worldly riches. Of course in the gold region, missionaries would be useless, but ere long other than gold hunters will people the long valley of California, and for their sakes we ought to begin speedily. A University and Mission schools, which shall hereafter become colleges, should be a primary object, and thus education and religion would go hand in hand. They who go would preach the Gospel, and also begin to raise up those who shall labor when we are at rest; in their turn to perpetuate the Church, whose foundation is the Apostles and Prophets, Jesus Christ himself being the Chief Corner Stone.

BLOOD'S DESPATCH.—Any one who has been in Great Britain can appreciate the advantage and convenience of cheap postage. This subject is now attracting great attention in this country, and we hope the measures now in progress, to reduce the present rates, may be successful.

Among the improvements, in this respect, our City Despatches are worthy of notice. Blood's Despatch now delivers pre-paid letters, in any part of the city, for one cent each. Boxes are to be found in every quarter, and those who have used this means of conveying letters, can attest the promptness and accuracy with which the trust is executed.

CORRECTION.—In the last paragraph of M. P., in the last Banner, more should be non, non-natural being intended.

"Christ took away sin from us, but left us our share of sufferings; and the Cross, which was first printed upon us, in the waters of Baptism, must for ever be borne by us in penance, in mortification, in self-denial, and in martyrdom, and toleration, according as God shall require of us by the changes of the world and the condition of the Church."—Bishop Taylor.

CHANGES AND EXCHANGES.—The new year has made few changes among our Church Journals. Of course we do not speak of those private fluctuations regulated by the ominous word, "stop." We note, however, a few which meet the public eye.

THE CALENDAR, before a very attractive looking paper, has grown in size and added to its comeliness. Those who are won by its fair appearance will not, we are sure, be disappointed.

THE MISSIONARY, always a messenger of good tidings, distributed gratuitously to all the clergy of the Diocese, and to all the teachers and pupils of the Institutions, for whose benefit it has been revived, has been reduced in size, but its spirit is as large as ever. A great deal may be said, in a small compass, when it is spoken, as the Missionary ever speaks, to the point.

THE CHURCH TIMES has changed its form, and somewhat lessened its external proportions, but its spirit and principles are unchanged.

THE GOSPEL MESSENGER, though we are sure its course will be unchanged, illustrates sadly "the changes and chances of this mortal life," in the death of the venerable Editor, who so long and faithfully conducted it.

The new volume, which commences with the next number, is to "appear in a new dress and type." The paper is to be conducted by a Presbyter of the Diocese, and is warmly commended by the Bishop "to the Clergy and Laity of the Diocese of Western New York."

We cannot close this brief notice, without thanking the Editors of THE EPISCOPAL RECORDER for their notice of the improvement in the appearance of the Banner. At the same time we must honestly assure them that the change in the heading of our paper had no deeper reasons with us than as a matter of taste. And we also think it but fair to remind our friends, that "the picture," which has been most objected to, was adopted when the present Editor took charge of the paper. And though we ourselves objected to "the spear," we still think an open spear better than a concealed dagger.

CHARGE OF THE BISHOP OF MONTREAL.—We give, among our selections, an extract from this interesting charge. We desire especially to direct attention to the faithfulness of the clergy in visiting those affected with a pestilential disease. Several devoted men fell victims to their zeal. Their memories should be honored, and if they are forgotten on earth, their names are written where eternity shall not efface the record. Their example, and the earnest words of the Bishop, should strengthen our hearts to like faithfulness, if the Providence of God calls upon us for its exercise.

"THE DISTINGUISHING GOODNESS OF GOD TO THE AMERICAN PEOPLE." A Discourse delivered in Trinity Church, on Thursday, November 23d, 1848, the day of Annual Thanksgiving appointed by the Governor of the Commonwealth. By GEORGE UFFOLD, D. D., the Rector. Published by Request.

We have read with real pleasure, and, we trust, with a heart stirred to new thankfulness by its eloquent exhibitions of God's gracious dealings, this discourse. The great danger of Thanksgiving sermons is, that they may run into the style of Fourth of July orations, and become mere effusions of national vanity, the effervescence of frothy declamation, rather than the outpourings of hearts melted by the sense of God's "goodness and wonderful works to the children of men."

This discourse keeps distinctly before the mind its high and noble end, to direct the thoughts of God's people to "the great and glorious source of our manifold and abounding blessings."

While it gives a glowing picture of the good things with which the year has been crowned to this country, it warns each Christian citizen against the impiety and danger of saying in his heart, "My power and the might of mine hand hath gotten me this wealth."

The text is from Psalm cxlvii. 20: "He hath not dealt so with any nation." This declaration, as applied to this country, is illustrated, and its truth set forth by proofs classed under the following heads:

- I. In the brief but eventful history of this nation.
- II. "In our numerical increase, in the rapid settlement of the country, in the filling up of our vast domain with an intelligent, enterprising, and industrious population, in a space of time unexampled in the history of the human race."
- III. In the stability and general efficiency of our civil polity.
- IV. "In our national mercies comprised within the circle of the past year."
- V. "In the continuance among us of the light of Divine truth, and the institutions and ordinances of our holy religion."

As a fair specimen of the style of this able discourse, we give the following extract from the 2d head relating to the wonderful increase of this nation:

"'Tis more like a vision of romance, than an actual occurrence, so speedy has been the transition from feebleness to strength, from the germinating plant putting forth its young and tender shoots, to the gigantic monarch of the forest, with roots fixed broad and firm in the soil, and throwing its branches far and wide over half a continent. Within the memory of many who now hear me, we have grown up from dependent colonies of Britain, overborne by a distant and selfish government, and crippled in all our energies by an unwise and oppressive exercise of power, into an independent nation, numbering over twenty millions of freemen. Less than three quarters of a century ago, in 1783, that domination finally ceased, in the withdrawal of the armies of England from their last resting-place, the city of New York, and we were left free, but exhausted, to commence our national career. And what astounding changes have we witnessed between that day and this? Then, New York, the commercial emporium of the Union now, with its half a million of inhabitants, was not as large and populous as our own flourishing city is at the present time; and this city, then, was a mere military frontier post, with some scattered log huts outside the fort, tenanted by a few hardy pioneers of the wilderness. The only cultivated portion of our immense domain, was the narrow strip of land bordering on the Atlantic, which, in its widest and most settled part, extended back less than two hundred miles from the coast. West of the Alleghenies, with the exception of some scattered military and trading posts, was one unbroken forest, the habitation of savage tribes and beasts of prey. The valley of the Mississippi, so called, embracing now twelve States of the confederacy, and numbering several millions of inhabitants, this garden of our continent, teeming with cultivation, bustling in every quarter with agricultural, manufacturing, and commercial enterprise, crowded with populous cities, and with villages fast rising into cities, and intersected by navigable rivers, canals, and railroads, and at length, by thousands of miles of telegraphic wires, communicating intelligence from place to place with the rapidity of lightning—this great and fertile valley was then a vast barbaric solitude. The great lakes, too, now traversed by a commercial navy more numerous than the entire shipping of the republic at the period referred to, and their long line of coast studded with flourishing cities, then, save when they bore on their waves the frail bark of the hunter or the savage, reposed in their solitary grandeur. What a wonderful transition! It seems like a dream, yet it is not a dream, but a sober reality! By natural increase, and by extensive accessions from the old world, these astounding results have been all accomplished within little more than sixty years.

But what has produced this change? What has so facilitated this natural increase? What has drawn hither such multitudes from the older countries of the world? What has effected this rapid settlement and extensive cultivation, and made the unbroken, boundless wilderness of sixty years ago to bloom and blossom as the rose? Will it be attributed to natural causes? Will it be said it is the extraordinary fertility of our soil, our diversified and genial climate, our inexhaustible resources, the security of life, liberty, and property afforded by our political institutions, the openings and encouragements to enterprise and industry so indiscriminately presented—our agricultural, manufacturing and commercial advantages, our internal tranquility, and for the most part our external peace? These are, indeed, among the obvious causes—the causes which appear on the surface. But we must go deeper than this for the true and efficient cause; and we find it in the beneficent, the overruling, the protecting, the furthering providence of God. The agencies of growth and prosperity adverted to, the peculiar advantages of soil and climate, and political and social condition, are all from Him—the gifts and orderings of the Most High. He hath multiplied the nation by natural increase. He hath influenced the emigration from older and foreign lands, which is so fast filling up the waste places of our own land. He hath made the wilderness a fruitful field, and caused the desert to smile in the beauty and luxuriance of cultivation, and rejoiced in all the occupations, arts, comforts, and refinements of civilized life. It is of God's distinguishing goodness, my brethren—let it be deeply impressed on every heart—that we possess such elements of national wealth and greatness, are rising so rapidly in numbers, and in power, and are occupying a position of such importance and influence as a free and sovereign people. Therefore, "Not unto us, O Lord! not unto us, but unto thy name be all the glory and all the praise!"

THE CLERGY OF AMERICA: Anecdotes illustrative of the Character of Ministers of Religion in the United States. By Joseph Belcher, D. D., Philadelphia; J. B. Lippincott & Co., 1849.

We have no doubt this book, to many readers, will be an interesting one. Its narratives are rather too much of the gossiping order for our taste. Some of the anecdotes are dreadfully wanting in point, or perhaps we are wanting in acuteness to discover it. The clergy of our Church seem to furnish a very slender proportion of the mass here collected. The Author seems partial only to our Bishops. We only recognise among our clergy "A pious Bishop," (not named, but evidently regarded as a remarkable case,) Bishops, Chase, Griswold, and McIlvaine. The Author arms himself against all the shafts of criticism by the following consoling reflection in the Preface: "At all events, here is a volume perfectly unique—unlike every thing else in the language." It is not every Author who has the wisdom to form so correct a judgment of his own work. We give the following as one of the best illustrations in the book, and hope it may be as "a word to the wise:"

A SHREWD MINISTER.

A minister had travelled far to preach to a congregation. After the sermon, he waited very patiently, expecting some of the brethren to invite him home to dinner. In this he was disappointed. One and another departed, until the house was almost empty. Summoning resolution, however, he walked up to an elderly-looking gentleman, and gravely said,

"Will you go home with me to dinner to-day, brother?"

"Where do you live?" "About twenty miles from this, sir."

"No," said the man, colouring, "but you must go with me."

"Thank you; I will, cheerfully."

After that time, the minister was no more troubled about his dinner.

THE LATE REV. S. L. JOHNSON.

Though this departed Brother was personally unknown to us, we are not a stranger to his worth and faithfulness, in his high calling. We leave it for those who knew him well, to attest his worth, praying that God may comfort those whom He has called to mourn.

At a meeting of the Wardens and Vestrymen of Christ Church, Indianapolis, held on the evening of the 27th of December, 1848, convened in consequence of the decease of the Pastor of the parish at 9 o'clock Sunday morning, December, 24th, 1848, the following were the proceedings

Dr. George W. Mears, senior warden, being in the chair, and the object of the meeting stated, the following was read, and unanimously concurred in.

"Forasmuch as it hath pleased Almighty God in his wise providence, to remove from our midst our very worthy and well beloved pastor, the Rev. Samuel Lee Johnson, late missionary and Rector of Christ Church, Indianapolis, the undersigned Wardens and Vestrymen of said parish, while they bow with humble submission to the Divine will, in sending upon them and the Church this heavy affliction, yet mourn with unfeigned sorrow the loss of one whose talents, zeal, and piety, so eminently qualified him for great usefulness, and who by the affability and generosity of his character, had secured the love and veneration of all who knew him.

To the sadly bereaved family, and other relatives of the deceased, we tender our most affectionate sympathies, in view of the afflicting dispensation which has deprived them of so dear an object of regard; and with the members of our congregation we feel painfully the stroke, which has thus severed the endearing ties between Pastor and people. And we can but commend all bereaved to seek their consolation of Almighty God, with whom do live the spirits of those who depart hence in the Lord, and Who made our deceased brother to lie down in green pasture, and led him beside the still waters.

As a testimonial of esteem for the deceased, the members of the vestry will wear crape for the space of thirty days, and would recommend to all the communicants of the parish to wear some suitable badge of mourning for the like period.

On motion, a copy of these proceedings was ordered to be sent to the widow of the deceased, to the Bishop, and also to the Banner of the Cross. Whereupon the Vestry adjourned sine die.

Foreign Intelligence.

We copy, with regret, the following from "The Guardian." We trust that the health of Dr. Hook may, ere this, be completely restored, and that his valuable life may long be preserved to the Church in whose service he has devoted all his energies.

The Rev. Dr. Hook, of Leeds, is so seriously indisposed that his physician forbids him attempting to preach at Snenton on Tuesday next.—Nottingham Paper of Saturday.

We learn, from "the English Churchman," that a clergyman of a District church in Plymouth having displeased some persons by his mode of celebrating divine service, and the matter being referred to the Bishop of the Diocese, (Exeter,) his judgment of course, did not satisfy the complainants. Whereupon, "a public meeting of laymen, gathered from the surrounding neighbourhood, was held at the Royal Hotel, Plymouth, on the evening of Tuesday week—to take into consideration the propriety of memorializing his Grace the Archbishop of Canterbury, in reference to the present alarming state of the Church of England, and of this Diocese in particular, and to adopt such other measures as may be then determined on."

The cause of this particular movement we find in "the Guardian." And, whatever may be thought of the prudence of the offending Minister, we must express our admiration of the wise and moderate counsel of the Bishop.

The Western Luminary states that there has been a good deal of agitation at Plymouth in consequence of the mode in which the Rev. G. R. Prynn, the minister of the new district church of St. Peter's, Eldad, performed the service on the first occasion of the building being opened to the public for divine worship, according to the rites and ceremonies of the Church of England.

The Bishop of Exeter has, in consequence, addressed the following letter to the Incumbent of St. Peter's:—

"Bishopstowe, December 2, 1848.

"Dear Sir—In order that you may already understand the full meaning, which I wished my words to you this day to convey, I think it best to state it to you in writing. I have read the paper which contains the communications made by you to certain individuals of your district, in answer to a remonstrance from them on the manner in which Divine service was performed by you, on Sunday morning last, when the licensed building was opened for the purpose. On the first particulars—the use of the surplice in the pulpit in the morning—I have no hesitation in saying that I esteem it the proper vestment, and that the changing your dress twice (as it will be necessary for you to change it twice in order that you may perform the rest of the service), is offensive to every reasonable person, and has something in it really like Popish form, which preaching in the surplice has not. At the same time, bearing in mind the success which has attended the efforts of mischievous persons elsewhere to rouse the feelings of the ignorant on this subject, and as there is no express law of the Church on the point, I do not advise you to persist in the use of the surplice. To the second particular I have nothing to say. Whether the Litany shall be chaunted, or simply said, is a matter left to your own discretion by the Church; and if you are satisfied that the larger portion of your congregation would wish to avoid chaunting, I do not forbid you to yield to that wish, if it can be done without encouraging a sinful spirit of wilfulness—prescribing to their minister in matters, on the fitness of which he is to judge. With respect to the third particular—their requiring you to say a short prayer before the sermon—I cannot advise you to submit to such dictation. It is true that, in modern times, it is customary to say such a prayer; but it is a very modern custom, for there was an express royal order by one of the Kings George, forbidding it as contrary to law, and requiring the observance of the 55th Canon. I am glad to find that this manifest innovation is in many places changed for the proper usage; and I will not encourage a lawless and presumptuous attempt, on the part of a small portion—and surely not the most exemplary or religious portion—of the laity, to force a clergyman to a violation of laws, both of Church and State. I am, dear sir, your faithful friend and brother,

H. EXETER.

"Rev. G. Prynn.
"P. S. It is painful to see there are any persons in your district who show themselves insensible, as they are doing, to the value of that great blessing which it has pleased God, in His mercy, to give them, in now having a Church instead of a Conventicle. The Church must not only be a Church in name, but in truth. Your prayers will not be wanting to your active endeavours to bring back a long misled people to the service of Almighty God in His Church.

"May His grace be with you and with them. May He give you a right judgment in all things. Especially may He give you the spirit of firmness and constancy in things which you deem necessary; tempered by a discreet regard to the feelings of others in matters on which the law of the Church leaves you at liberty, and by an ardent desire and longing for the edification of those whose souls are committed to your care. Lastly, may the spirit of Christian love reign in the hearts of yourself and your people—so that whatever of misunderstanding may have marked the outset of your connection, the end may be to you all, peace on earth and glory in Heaven."

The meeting was accordingly held, and after some intemperate speeches, an equally intemperate memorial was adopted.

The Guardian thus describes this meeting:—

A "Church Meeting" in the populous and thriving town of Plymouth is advertised to be held in defence of the principles of the Protestant Constitution in Church and State. This is the promise: a very serious and grave one indeed. You enter, and the scene is, indeed, agreeably disappointing. Imagine a number of substantial gentlemen, accustomed to a certain quantity of good cheer and port every day of their lives, and some of them presenting features of local importance, one or two magistrates, one or two admirals, one or two captains assembled all in a room in a state of great excitement, high theological erudition, and furious hostility to the Bishop of Exeter. Imagine them distinguishing between douleia and latreia, quoting "Thomas Aquinas the great Schoolman, called by his disciples the Angelical Doctor, with whose name we must all be acquainted,"—quoting St. Augustin, and talking about canons, dogmas, homilies, liturgies, forms, rites, ceremonies, rubrics, surplices—all ending in one and the same great theme of disgust, and you have a rough general outline of the "Church Meeting" at Plymouth. The speakers in succession hate ceremonial observances and the Bishop of Exeter, bowings and genuflexions and the Bishop of Exeter, antiquated rubrics, forms, rites, services, surplices, together with every thing else priestly and ecclesiastical—and the Bishop of Exeter. We are reminded of the scenes of talking mobs in Shakspeare, where first citizen, second citizen, third citizen, express themselves with more feeling than argument or knowledge against some object of popular displeasure:—

"1st Citizen—Agreed, then, my friends; we'll have no more dogmas—we cannot abide them.

"All—Agreed. Agreed.

"2d Citizen—What is a dogma, friend?

"3d Citizen—Friend, you might have known that; it's the Bishop of Exeter, to be sure.

"4th Citizen—He's an odious ceremony is that man.

"5th Citizen—The worst genuflexion that ever lived.

"6th Citizen—My wife dreamed the other night that he was the Pope's toe.

"7th Citizen—I dare say he is. They say he had something to do with the Council of Trent.

"8th Citizen—Ah—he's got his finger in every pie.

"1st Citizen—Well, now my friends, there's St. Augustine. He's speaking about Latria; and he says quite clearly that the surplice ought not to be worn in the pulpit. I know this positively, because I saw a book of St. Augustine's yesterday.

"All—He says he saw a book of St. Augustine's yesterday.

"1st Citizen—That's proved then.

"All—Proved. Proved. Away with it. We'll have no Bishop of Exeter in the pulpit."

The Rev. Mr. Maskell, whose visitation sermon gave so much offence, renewed his resignation of the office of Chaplain to the Bishop of Exeter, and the Bishop has accepted it.

To the same paper we are indebted for the following summary of GENERAL INTELLIGENCE.

Thursday, December 28, 1848.

On Sunday last, the garrison of Paris and the National Guard of that capital, and its banlieu, were reviewed by Louis NAPOLEON, amidst the greatest excitement. The morning was cold and cloudy, but at twelve o'clock, "the Sun of Austerlitz," as the Bonapartists would say, blazed forth to the delight of all. The new President was received with the greatest enthusiasm, and all passed off without any disturbance, though there must have been at least 100,000 soldiers on the ground. Louis Napoleon is a man of talent, and of considerable information; whether he has ability to govern a great nation remains to be seen. Every one admits that he has begun well.

In Germany, matters still continue unsettled. Instead of an Emperor, it is proposed to have a Triumvirate, with or without Austria. There will be as much difficulty in choosing the Triumvirs as in electing an Emperor. German unity seems likely to be a dream.

The King of Bavaria has suddenly dismissed his Liberal Ministry, and formed a new Cabinet with members of the ancien regime. This Change has caused immense sensation at Munich, and is no doubt connected with the question of the German Constitution.

The Pope is still at Gaeta. He has consented to return to Rome, on condition that the committee he has appointed be recognized, the Ministry resign, the Civic Guard be dissolved and re-organized, and the liberty of the press suspended. The Romans will not agree to this, of course. It is strongly reported that the Pope will go to France. We cannot think his Holiness will do anything so impolitic. The King of Naples is beginning to be alarmed at the presence of the Pope in his dominions.

The King of Sardinia has appointed a Liberal Ministry, who seem bent on going to war. The Chamber of Deputies at Turin have voted a monthly subsidy to the city of Venice during the war. Genoa is in a very disturbed state. The Tuscan Government is almost subverted. Sicily and Naples no nearer a settlement than ever. In short the whole of Italy is in a feverish and disturbed state, and seems to be on the eve of a Republican outbreak.

An important meeting of the Romish Clergy has been held at Mayence. M. Dollinger said that the question was no longer between Catholicism and Protestantism, but between Christianity and anti-Christianity. This is the truth, both as regards Germany and Italy. An immense irreligious movement seems likely to take place on the Continent, similar to the Infidel movement in France at the first Revolution. The attacks made upon Christianity will then oblige all good men to be on one side.

The Cortes have met in Spain, and are busy preparing an address, in answer to the Queen's speech. We wonder what they will say to that part of it which refers to the breach with England. Several Carlists have surrendered in the province of Tarragona. The belligerents will not be able to do much during the winter. The Spring will show which side is to win.

We are happy to say the condition of the cotton manufacturers, in Lancashire, is improving. The mills are in full employment, and the loom, shuttle, and forge are in active requisition. The workmen, consequently, are quite peaceable. The Ten Hours Bill is working well. Altogether the prospects of that part of the country are much more cheering than they were some time ago.

To which are added from the Postscript, the following gratifying account of the favorable beginning of the new Presidency in France:—

The commencement of the Presidency of the Republic is not only hailed with satisfaction throughout France, but is distinguished by the revival of trade to an extent that exceeds the hopes formed by the most sanguine. This regards not Paris only. In all the great manufacturing and commercial towns and districts, including Lyons, Havre, Lille, St. Quentin, Elbouf, and Rouen, trade has resumed its former activity. Even from Calais, where the manufacture of tulle (cotton lace) ceased altogether on the occurrence of the revolution, letters announce the resumption of work at the factories. Fortunate as is this coincidence, it imposes on the new Government a necessity for vigour, energy, and activity, in conceiving and in carrying out measures calculated to render the improvement permanent.

"I have seen a young and healthful person warm and ruddy under a poor and thin garment, when at the same time an old rich person hath been cold and paralytic under a load of sables, and the skins of foxes. It is the body that makes the clothes warm, not the clothes the body; and the spirit of a man makes felicity and content, not any spoils of a rich fortune wrapped about a sickly and an uneasy soul."—Bishop Taylor.

THE CONTEST.

BY MRS. JOSEPH C. NEAL.

"I fear the strife," said Bertram sadly; "it has been so wild already, how shall I bear on to the end? I shall never reach the goal."

Grace drew near. "I am with you," said he.

Allegory of the Combatants.

With free and fearless spirit bowed
His proud, high daring gone,
The boy leaned sadly on his sword
By fiercest combat worn.
The glow had faded from his cheek,—
His eyes had now grown dim,—
A deadly faintness filled his heart
And trembled in each limb.

Yet none so eager for the fray,
And high had flashed that sword,
As first he sprang into the lists
When summoned by his Lord.
Disdaining aid, he boldly dared
To brave the fight alone,
But conflict after conflict passed
He had more humble grown.

And but for Grace, to whom for aid
In hottest fight he turned—
The boy had fainted on the field
Before the ill discerned,—
For dimly through the o'erhanging mist
He saw temptations rise,
And scarcely dared to lift his gaze,
Up to the far off skies.

Ah, 'tis a lesson known to each
How soon the heart will quail,
Before the outward strife of sin,
The boldest brow must pale;
And when we turn aside for rest
The guile of inward foes
Forbids,—until Death enters in—
The spirit's calm repose.

And warrior like, we too have staked
Our freedom on the strife,
Casting aside all earthly joys
To win eternal life;
And still temptations throng around,—
O'er us the foe shall gain
A partial victory while we stand
Upon Life's battle plain.

And then; when all seems lost, there comes
A message full of hope,
And nerved by this, once more we dare
With enemies to cope.
"Be not dismayed, for as thy day
Thy strength shall ever be,
And though the strife prove long, my Grace Sufficient is for thee."

"WORDS OF WARNING AND CONSOLATION," spoken at the funeral of MISS MARIA W. HARRIS, in Calvary Church, Memphis, December 7th, 1848, by D. C. PAGE, Rector.

There are two aspects, beloved brethren, under which the occasion of our present meeting calls for our attention. First, Within a little time, a very little time, has death knocked once and again at the same gate. Yes! within less than a twelve-month's space, we were called to follow to the grave the mortal remains of our sister, and now, we have assembled to pay the last obsequies to another. What an emphatic and impressive comment upon the instability of the nearest and dearest of all earthly relations! Upon none of us may it be lost! We have now perhaps our friends around us; there may be no visible breach in some dear domestic circle; and yet in a few little months it may be, one cherished object may be taken from us, and then another, and another, and desolate places may be there, where now, all is life and gaiety, and fond imaginings and brilliant hopes. How adapted are not such considerations to make us sit loose to the world; to cause us to live in the habitual contemplation of its chances and changes; to feel that our days upon earth are a shadow, that we are strangers and sojourners as all our fathers were. With what a loud and piercing voice moreover, does not this dispensation call upon those who are left behind, to lay to heart the lesson of their mortality, and to place themselves in the wakeful attitude of men who are waiting for their Lord, that, when he cometh and knocketh, they may open to him immediately.

But another aspect under which this solemn event presents itself, is, that we ought not, so I feel at least my brethren, to mourn for her that is dead. Were I addressing you as a mere man of the world, speak I should on this wise. Sad, sad is the occasion on which we have now met. Death when he comes at that distasteful period of life, when infirmities and decrepitude bow man down to the earth, or a series of bitter disappointments and unmitigated calamities, make him feel existence a burden too heavy to be borne, brings little of sorrow in his train. But if he come at that stage of our earthly being, when the loves and the joys of life are warmest and brightest, when flowers of enchanting beauty spring up all over our radiant and onward path, and the ties that bind us to the world, most of all others refuse to be severed, what unsurpassed and unalleviated bitterness is there not in the mourner's tears.

But it is not as a man of the world, that I appear before you to-day. No! I come to you as one of the pastors of Christ's flock; and in view of what my eyes have seen, and my ears heard, of her who is now before us in the sleep of death, I would say, beware how you plant the cypress upon that grave, let not a broken shaft be her monument. No! bring flowers, and strew them there; write upon her sepulchral urn the inscription, "She is not dead but sleepeth;" sculpture there the image of a bright angel, pointing upward to immortality. Let fall some natural tears indeed, it were right you should do so, it were not right to repress them, but as you retire from the place of graves, let your countenances brighten into smiles of grateful joy, for so great a gift as the gift of a triumphant faith, to her who has left you. She is not dead but sleepeth, that precious form all wasted by disease, and which is now to be delivered to yonder opening grave, is a redeemed body, and shall be made like to the glorious body of the Son of God, according to the mighty working whereby he is able to subdue all things to himself, while her ransomed spirit purified and glad beyond all mortal imaginings, is now with Christ in paradise. Yes! how much have you not to console you, ye loving and sorrowing ones, that are gathered round her bier. Can you ever forget the heavenly radiance which lit up her worn and pallid features on that memorable morning, of which we who were privileged to be with her, will carry the impression to our last hours. I care not now coldly to try the question whether she really saw a vision of angels.* Her spirit saw them, for it was bathed in the joy of angels, and those beautiful white robes which she imagined she saw, and which drew from her such rapturous exclamations, were indistinct, but it may be true revealing of that "raiment pure and white," of that celestial beauty, with which her Redeemer was robing her blissful spirit for its flight to paradise.

But not to dwell upon this, brethren, who of us that were privileged to hear her words of solemn admonition, or of grateful acknowledgment to the friends that stood round her dying couch can ever forget them, so happily appropriate to the circumstances of each, so fraught with venerable wisdom, and touching pathos, and simple eloquence, and divine sanctity. For what too, "out of the abundance of her heart," she uttered concerning her own views and feelings, O ye afflicted ones, how sweet is not to you the memory of these her words. "My God, I thank thee, that thou didst withdraw me from the temptations of the world, at the very time when I felt the desire to withstand them. I have been an unprofitable servant, but Jesus died for me. I feel him to be present with me, peace, peace, all is peace within."

Brethren, let us dwell upon the beautiful example of our departed sister, upon her unconquerable patience under suffering, her meek and filial resignation to her heavenly Father's will, her grateful sensibility to the kindness of her friends, her chastened cheerfulness; her clear and scriptural views of herself at once, and of that remedial scheme in which she placed all her hopes; her devout prayers, her edifying receptions of the blessed Sacrament, of the body and blood of Christ. Let us often think of this, and by God's blessing it will shed a mild and holy light upon our path of life; it will keep up in our hearts a deeper feeling of our consecration to our Saviour and our God; of our sacred nearness with the unseen, the Eternal, it will free us from everything selfish and sordid, ungentle and unkind; from all that is allied to the grossness of earth, and alien from the purity of heaven.

"'Tis sweet as year by year we lose
Friends out of sight, in faith to muse,
How grows in Paradise our store."

Then pass ye mourners cheerly on,
Through prayer unto the tomb;
Still as ye watch life's falling leaf,
Gathering from every loss and grief,
Hope of new spring, and endless home.

Then cheerly to your work again,
With hearts new braced and set;
To run untired love's blessed race;
As meet for those, who face to face,
Over the grave their Lord have met.

CHANTING THE PSALTER.

MR. EDITOR:—

I should not have troubled you again on this subject; being content to leave the matter as left in my last communication with Sacerdos' answer attached, to your readers; but as I owe an apology to Sacerdos from the mistake I made in overlooking the rubric which relates to the reading of the creed in the English prayer book, I could not do less than acknowledge the correctness of his quotation, and ask to be excused for my blindness. And while thus doing an act of justice to Sacerdos, permit me to say a few words in reply to some of his last remarks.

* The views of our departed young friend, of the plan of redemption, were strikingly scriptural and sober, whatever disease therefore may have had to do with the scene above alluded to, fanatical revery had not the most remote connection with it.

Sacerdos says "that Principle is wrong in supposing that these alterations (made by the reviewers,) were intended to reprobate Chanting the Psalter, we refer him to the words of one of those reviewers, the venerable Bishop White, quoted at large in a late number of the Banner."

Does Sacerdos and W. M. read the extract referred to aright? Sacerdos refers to it to show that the reviewers did not reprobate Chanting the Psalter, and W. M. to show that "Bishop White then certainly thought singing the Psalter more rubrical than our present mode of saying it!"

I understand the extract to show that Bishop White wished the rubrics so framed as "to give to the officiating minister the liberty to select psalms at his discretion;" the Bishop then goes on to give his reasons for thus wishing, and concludes, (or the extract concludes, the book is not within my reach:) "Another consequence would be, that the number and length of the psalms depending on the choice of the minister, there would be great encouragement to the introduction of the practice of singing this part of the service, instead of repeating the verses by the minister and the clerk alternately."

Can any thing be found in the wishes of the Bishop, as expressed in the extract, to warrant the conclusion of W. M., or to sustain the views of Sacerdos? Certainly not; Bishop White offered a proposition that would, if adopted, bring about what Sacerdos labors to make us think does now exist. But "he thought" the course he proposed would afford "great encouragement to the introduction of the practice of singing * * instead (of the present of repeating the verses by the minister and the clerks (people) alternately.)" Was this proposition adopted? Not at all, (excepting Thanksgiving Day, as shown in my last communication.) This can be ascertained to a certainty by examining the first part of the extract. The Bishop says, "for the author's part he disliked the course taken." W. M. says this was the appointment of the selections, but can we not with equal justice suppose he disliked the striking out the "said or sung," from the rubric which relates to the Psalter? I think the last part of the extract italicised by W. M., warrants this conclusion. And the whole extract shows that the Bishop did not agree with his fellow reviewers when they adopted the present directions for using the Psalter: his words are "he disliked the course taken."

In conclusion, Mr. Editor, permit me to say: that in the absence of evidence to the contrary, I am forced to believe that the compilers of the English prayer book, and the reviewers of the same for this country—used language in the construction of their rubrics, which will bear the interpretation of common sense, and the Lexicographers of the English language.

Common sense and every day practice, assures us that it requires a talent to read, and an additional talent to sing what we read; so if one rubric directs certain portions of the daily service to be read, it requires another rubric to allow the same to be sung, as the example of the creeds in the English service, quoted by Sacerdos fully shows.

Therefore to sing what is only directed to be read, or said, is certainly un-rubrical, and should not be practised by any good churchman, who loves uniformity in the worship of God, and has a conscientious regard for

PRINCIPLE.

Obituary.

DIED, in Gatesville, N. C., at the residence of her husband, Willis F. Riddick, Esq., on Thursday morning, 21st Dec., 1848, MRS. SARAH ANN RIDDICK, at the age of 18 years and 23 days.

Also, at the same place, on the 16th Dec., 1848, EMILY MARIA, infant daughter of the above, aged 2 months and 26 days.

Mrs. Riddick was the daughter of Thos. B. and Emily Eliza Hunter. She was taken away in the flower of her youth; and has left behind her a gentle and kindly remembrance of goodness, affection, and innocence, in the hearts of the living.

Although she desired to live, and saw much to live for, a presentiment of death seemed to press upon her mind for some time before it visited her. This, no doubt, proceeded from that diseased condition of her system which led her physicians to apprehend the sorrowful result, which at last took place:—sorrowful indeed, to those who loved her and whose days were blessed and comforted by her presence and companionship. To her, we have a "reasonable and religious hope," that this event has been a transition from a state, at best, of change and imperfection, to one of stability and joy. She obtained a good report here for the virtues that should adorn a woman and a wife. Her tender age drew many hearts to her, and her dispositions and actions confirmed their kind inclination. For in all her behaviour there was shown a remarkable offensiveness, a carefulness "to hurt nobody, by word or deed."

And this habit was not the result of human prudence, but the effect, we believe, of the grace of God, and flowing from a religious principle. It was from within, and not from without. Her heart seemed to be the home of loving thoughts, devising liberal things, and approving that which is good. In her religious duties she exhibited a deep interest, and for some months before her death she had resolved to complete her union with the Church on the earliest opportunity.

A wise and merciful God had not left her without a preparatory chastening: her young infant was removed first, as a gentle admonition to her, that she might be ready and the more willing to follow the loved and innocent.

May her devoted, but bereaved husband, kind friends, and all who remain, accept and obey the lessons of Almighty Providence, so that when they are called to put off the garment of the flesh, they may be meet to be received into the mansions of eternal felicity, through the merits of the Saviour. S.

"Most of the graces of Christianity are suffering graces, and God hath predestinated us to sufferings, and we are baptized into suffering, and our very communions are symbols of our duty, by being the sacrament of Christ's death and passion."—Bishop Taylor.

Died,

On Friday, the 5th inst., ANNA JAY, wife of Rev. Lewis P. W. Balch, Rector of St. Bartholomew's, and daughter of William Jay.

GRISWOLD'S SACRED POETS OF ENGLAND AND AMERICA.—Now ready, in one elegantly printed octavo volume, embellished with fine steel plates, and neatly bound in scarlet and gold, price $3 50.

The Sacred Poets of England and America, for three centuries. Edited by Rev. Rufus W. Griswold.
The present editor has done very little more than rearrange and combine the materials furnished in "Gems of Sacred Poets," published recently by a member of the University of Oxford, and in critical and very interesting "Lives of the English Sacred Poets," by Robert Aris Wilmot, of Trinity College, Cambridge, which appeared under the direction of the Society for Promoting Christian Knowledge. He has, however, added some authors not quoted in either of those works, among whom are Shirley, Baxter, Toplady, Wesley, Williams, Moultrie, and Mrs. Steele, and of our own country, President Dwight, John Quincy Adams, Bishop Doane, Mr. Hillhouse, Wilcox, Crowell, Norton, Whittier, and Coxe.

The religious poetry of the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries is eminently worthy of study, and it is little known. There is no poetry so rare as the poetry of devotion. In this collection are many pieces without the highest attributes of poetry; but very few, it is believed, which have not the simplicity, harmony and purity that will secure a welcome from every variety of readers. The importance of having works of this description, to elevate the taste and deepen the religious sentiments, can hardly be too highly estimated.

The Women of the Bible, with articles by eminent clergymen, edited by Rev. Dr. Wainwright, with 18 superb plates, in a new style of binding. Price $7—colored plates $12.

The Christian Year, or Thoughts in Verse, for the Sundays and Holidays throughout the year, by Rev. John Keble, A. M., beautifully illustrated with 16 engravings, designed by Cope, very elegantly bound in various styles.

NEW YORK.

EPISCOPAL ACTS BY THE BISHOP OF MARYLAND, ACTING BY REQUEST OF THE STANDING COMMITTEE OF THE DIOCESE.—Second Sunday after Epiphany. In the church of the Holy Apostles, city of New York, confirmed forty-nine persons, on which occasion the Bishop preached, addressed the candidates, and administered the Holy Communion.

We take this occasion to speak of the flourishing condition of this parish. It is but a few months since the church was consecrated; and although located in a growing portion of the upper part of our city, the population is as yet quite sparse. The congregation is constantly increasing, and the large number admitted to the Holy Rite of Confirmation on the above occasion is evidence of the unremitting exertions of the Rector in behalf of his flock. The church yet requires pecuniary aid to free it from debt, and we trust the efforts of its friends will not be wanting in its behalf. Among the number who received the impress of Apostolic hands, was a very aged and infirm colored man, who had been confined to his room for several years.—Church.

MARYLAND.

CONFIRMATION.—On the first Sunday after the Epiphany, in the Church of the Epiphany, Washington, six persons were confirmed.

CLERICAL CHANGES.—The Rev. Jacob B. Morse has been received into the Diocese of Maryland, by Letters Dimissory from the Standing Committee of the Diocese of New York, acting as the ecclesiastical authority during the suspension of the Bishop. Mr. Morse takes up his residence in Baltimore, with a view to the establishment of a new congregation in that city.

The Rev. Wm. Henry Rees has taken Letters Dimissory to the Rt. Rev. the Bishop of Connecticut, having accepted a call to Milford, Ct.

A PASTORAL LETTER

To the Clergy and Laity of the Diocese of Maryland.

DEAR BRETHREN:—The occurrence of a case of Asiatic Cholera within the Diocese appears to me a fit occasion to provoke you to joint prayer, both public and private, that we may be delivered from so great a calamity as the visitation of the pestilence, or if in the will of God we be called to suffer, may find grace and heavenly consolation in the endurance of our chastisement.

In order thereto, I set forth the following prayers for public use as directed in the titles; and add two others which are humbly but earnestly commended to my brethren, of all orders and degrees, for use, as they may see fit and have opportunity, in their private devotions.

Should the pestilence be permitted to prevail among us, I recommend to my reverend brethren, the clergy of parishes and congregations in cities, towns and villages, to open their churches for the Daily Morning and Evening Prayer, and to celebrate the Holy Communion weekly, at the least. Would that this could be always done! But when the Lord's messenger is among us, placing death and eternity as it were before our very eyes, it is the least that we can do. Its obvious fitness must be felt by all.

Let us not forget, meanwhile, that prayer, to be acceptable, must be the prayer of faith! and that where faith is, there will be repentance, amendment of life, and fruitfulness in all good works. Let all unnecessary expense be retrenched, that the savings may be given to the poor, the suffering and the destitute. Let our alms go up before God, together with our prayers, and the tears of humble contrition for our sins, and hearty, undoubting faith in the blessed Atonement and Intercession of our only Mediator and Lord, Jesus Christ, render both availing. In Him alone we can hope to find access to the throne of grace and mercy; through Him, if we believe in Him and love Him, we know we shall obtain it.

May He, who liveth and was dead, and is alive for evermore, Whose are the keys of hell and death, bless, preserve and keep you, now and forever!

Your faithful and affectionate brother and servant in Christ,
WILLIAM ROLLINSON WHITTINGHAM,
Bishop of Maryland.

January 15th, 1849.

¶ A PRAYER

To be used before the two final prayers of Morning and Evening Service.

Most gracious Father and God, who hast promised forgiveness of sins to all those who with hearty repentance and true faith turn to Thee, look down, we beseech Thee, from heaven Thy dwelling place, upon us Thy unworthy servants, who under an awful apprehension of Thy judgments, and a deep conviction of our sinfulness, prostrate ourselves before Thee. Have pity, O Lord, have pity upon us, and withdraw from us the grievous sickness with which we are visited for our sins. We confess, with shame and contrition, that in the pride and hardness of our hearts, we have shown ourselves unthankful for Thy mercies, and have followed our own inclinations instead of Thy holy laws; yet, O merciful Father, cast us not away in displeasure, but give us time for consideration and repentance, so that receiving Thy fatherly correction with meekness, and turning from our evil ways we may be preserved by Thy mighty protection, both in body and soul, through the merits of our only Mediator and Advocate, Jesus Christ. Amen.

¶ A PRAYER

To be added to the foregoing wherever the disease has appeared.

O Almighty God, who, by the many instances of mortality which encompass us on every side, and by the warning, now especially urged upon us, of our exposure to the sudden stroke of death, dost call upon us seriously to consider the shortness of our time here upon earth, and remindest us that in the midst of life we are in death, so teach us to number our days, that we may apply our hearts unto wisdom. Give us grace to turn unto Thee with timely repentance, and thus to obtain, through the merits of our adorable Redeemer, that pardon to-day, for which to-morrow it may be too late to seek; that so being strengthened by Thy good Spirit against the terrors of death, and daily advancing in faith and godliness, we may at all times be ready to give up our souls into Thy hands, O gracious Father, in the hope of a blessed immortality, through the mediation and by the merits of Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

¶ With the following:

O Father of mercies, and God of all comfort, our only help in time of need, look down from heaven, we humbly beseech Thee, behold, visit, and relieve, all who are suffering under the grievous sickness which Thou hast brought upon us, [and especially Thy sick servants for whom our prayers are desired.] Look upon them with the eyes of Thy mercy; comfort them with a sense of Thy goodness; preserve them from the temptations of the enemy; give them patience under their affliction; and, in Thy good time, restore them to health, and enable them to lead the residue of their life in Thy fear, and to Thy glory: Or else give them grace so to take Thy visitation, that, after this painful life is ended, they may dwell with Thee in life everlasting, through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

¶ A COLLECT

To be added to the Collect for the day.

O God, who at the prayer of David Thy servant didst stay the hand of the destroying angel, when it was lifted up against Jerusalem, and on the repentance of Nineveh, didst spare that sinful city, vouchsafe, in like manner, to bow down Thine ear to our prayer, and to accept our repentance. Withdraw Thy chastisements from us, O Lord, and whilst Thou preservest our bodies from disease, so cleanse our hearts from all sinful affections, that, evermore striving to please Thee in newness of life, we may by Thee be defended from all evils, for the sake of Thy ever blessed Son Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

PRAYERS

Commended for use in private devotion.

O Lord, our God, we have rebelled against Thee, and have fallen by our iniquity; but, for Thy mercies' sake, take Thou away all our iniquity, and receive us graciously. Spare us, good Lord, spare us, and give not up Thy servants to the destroyer. Be merciful, O Lord, be merciful; cease from Thine anger, we beseech Thee; repent, Lord, of the evil, and let it not be. We have followed after lying vanities, and have forsaken our own mercy, and have most justly deserved that we should be cast out of the sight of Thine eyes; but Thou retainest not Thine anger for ever, because Thou delightest in mercy. Who is a God like unto Thee, that pardonest iniquity, and passest by the transgression of Thy people? Turn again, then, and have compassion upon us: do Thou subdue all our iniquities, and cast our sins into the depths of the sea. Yea, perform all Thy truth and Thy goodness upon Thy servants. Do Thou, by the blood of Thy covenant, by the fountain opened for sin and for uncleanness, wash us thoroughly from our wickedness, and save us, as brands plucked from the burning. Take away all Thy displeasure, and turn Thyself from Thy wrathful indignation. Turn us, O God our Saviour, and let Thine anger cease from us. Wilt Thou be displeased at us forever? Wilt Thou not turn again, and quicken us, that Thy servants may rejoice in Thee? O show us Thy mercy, good Lord, and grant us Thy salvation. Destroy us not, neither cut us off in our sins: for Thou art the God of them that return; show forth Thy infinite loving-kindness upon Thine unworthy servants, who do put their trust in Thee. So shalt thou save us in the multitude of Thy mercies. So shall our mouth be filled with Thy praise, and we be telling of Thy glory and great goodness henceforth, world without end; through Jesus Christ, our only Saviour and Redeemer. Amen.

O Lord God, who rejectest none that, trusting in Thy goodness, and believing in Thy promises, come to Thee for succour and help; behold, we beseech Thee, with the eyes of compassion and mercy, Thy poor, sinful, and miserable people, who now are bowed down under the scourge of Thine angry hand. Our streets are full of grief, our houses of mourning, and all our joy is turned into heaviness, by reason of the plague of pestilence, gone out to destroy and consume at Thy command. We confess, O Lord, that it is but the just punishment of our ingratitude and desperate rebellion against our Creator; daily abusing Thy blessings and transgressing Thy commandments; not leaving our evil ways for fear of Thy threats, nor being allured to goodness by the hope of Thy promises. We have heard by Thy messengers, and read in Thy sacred word, how Thou hast of old threatened with Thy fearful judgments such as forget Thee, and keep not Thy commandments; yet have we turned a deaf ear to Thy gracious admonitions, and gone on adding sin to sin, and multiplying our iniquities. And now, O Lord, we reap the just reward of our impiety, and are righteously plagued for our disobedience. We confess that Thou art just in all Thou doest, and, acknowledging our misdeeds, implore Thee with penitent and contrite hearts, to have mercy and spare, deliver and restore us.

O Lord, incline Thine ear and hear; open Thine eyes and behold our desolations; and upon our repentance and humiliation, remove this judgment from us; and command the destroying angel to stay his hand, and cease from smiting us. Behold, we humble ourselves under Thy mighty hand; we bewail and lament our sins; we look only unto Thee for pardon for the past, and succour for the time to come. O deliver us, and be merciful unto us, even for Jesus Christ's sake, the righteous; to Whom, with Thee, and the blessed Spirit, be ascribed all salvation, power and glory, now and ever. Amen.

The Board of Missions in the Diocese of Maine, held its meeting on the 3d and 4th of the present month in Christ's church, Gardiner. There were present of the clergy, beside the Bishop, Messrs. Pratt, Burgess, Gardiner and Murray. Services commenced on Tuesday eve, the Rev. Mr. Burgess read the service and the Rev. Mr. Murray preached. Wednesday morning, prayers were read by the Rev. Mr. Pratt, and a sermon preached by the Rev. Mr. Burgess. In the afternoon, a meeting of parents, teachers and children, was held and addresses to these several classes were made by the bishop and Messrs. Gardiner, Murray and Pratt. In the evening, after prayers by Rev. Mr. Murray, the Rev. Mr. Pratt preached. Thursday morning was devoted to the business of the Board. In the afternoon, a Missionary meeting was held, at which addresses were made by the Bishop, Rev. Messrs. Burgess and Pratt and Dr. Vinton, of Boston, who was providentially with us during the day. In the evening, prayers were read by the Bishop and a sermon was preached by the Bishop.

We have thus given an outline of the services which were held upon the occasion. In addition we may remark, that the meeting was of an interesting and encouraging character. Reports were received from the various Missionary stations, from which it appeared that they were all in a prosperous condition. And indeed it may safely be said, that the prospects of the Episcopal Church in the Diocese of Maine, were never more hopeful than at this moment. Our Bishop is indefatigable in his efforts to supply the waste places, by sending to them the gospel, inseparably blended as it is with the offices of the Church. The only let or hindrance we now meet, is in the lack of means; fields are open and white to the harvest. Men may be had, but they must be supported. The Lord of the harvest has enlisted the sympathies of some in the Church, and they have given us the means of enlarging the field of our operations. May others arise like minded.—Christian Witness.

Clerical Changes.

The Rev. Joseph M. Waite, having resigned the charge of the Mission Chapel, Cincinnati, Ohio, has accepted a unanimous call to St. James's church, Wooster, in the same State, and will enter upon his duties immediately.

The Rev. Dr. Brooke has received and accepted a unanimous re-call of the Vestry of this church and expects to resume the duties of the rectorship on Easter Sunday next, in connection with the Rev. Alfred Blake as assistant minister.

The Rev. George Dennison has resigned the Rectorship of Trinity Parish, Delaware, Ohio, and has been elected Professor of Mathematics in Kenyon College.

Selections.

We give the following additional extract from the Charge of the Bishop of Montreal. The opinions herein expressed may have more weight with some from the fact that the respected author is known as the advocate of moderate views in Church matters.

With reference, indeed, to points upon which men differ within the Church itself, there are some, and these I shall first touch upon, which are considered, by common understanding, as open questions, in relation to which the Bishop, consequently, cannot assume a dictatorial tone nor insist upon this course or upon that: but upon which, I do not know that it is interdicted to him to state his own opinion upon an occasion like the present, however it may happen to conflict with that of persons entitled to his utmost respect—but at least he may offer advice upon the manner in which those who think with him, should sustain the side which they have embraced. In fact, he, perhaps, owes it to his Clergy, while he continues to preserve a marked line of proceeding in any question which divides the Church, to put them in possession of his reasons for doing so, and they, correspondingly, owe the same kind of explanations to their people.

I think, then, that with reference, for example, to the Bible Society,—that dazzling institution which undeniably has effected extensive good,—we should take care to counteract any such impressions as that if we decline to support this Society, it is because we are determined to keep up old prejudices and party spirit; because we are indifferent, if not hostile to the free circulation of the word of God; because we want to substitute human authority for divine; or because we are afraid of the effect of an unfettered recourse, to the Scriptures, upon the set of principles to which we are attached. We ought not, in the jealousy which we should manifest over every thing which can affect the estimation, and, consequently the profitability of our ministry, to be content with feeling that we have good grounds for what we do, and so let men think and say what they choose: we ought to make it understood, (that is, so far as it is left in our power to do so, for we know, unhappily, that there are parties who do not choose to understand us, and will not let us be understood any where, if they can help it.)—we ought to make it understood that, whether we are right or wrong in declining to support the Bible Society, we do not decline upon any such grounds whatever, as these. To me, I do confess that it has always appeared a great fallacy to say that the Bible Society rests simply upon the common acknowledgment of the Bible. It appears to me rather to rest upon an assumption that God has provided nothing else but the Bible for the work of religion upon earth; that there is the Bible, and every man is to make what he can of it, and that is the way in which the Christian Faith is to be propagated over the world. Whereas in the Bible itself, we find that there are sacraments ordained and a ministry constituted, and here the questions present themselves in limine, who is to dispense those sacraments? and where and what is that ministry? If it be really not agreeable, if it be most plainly in opposition to what we find in the Bible, that there should be an infinite diversity of Christian teaching, and an unrestricted multiplication of sects, and a still accumulating creation ad libitum of new ministries, without any necessity of tracing up their title to a distinct and authenticated source:—if, as we believe, there be no authority, which can be produced from the Bible to shew that, provided men agree (supposing that, argumenti gratia, to be possible,) upon a certain well understood standard of essentials, all these divisions and subdivisions and varieties and irregular formations, in some of which the sacraments are dropped out or altered in their application,—are to be regarded as collectively making up the proper idea and exhibition of the Christian Church—then I apprehend that we may warrantably stand aloof from any amalgamation with so heterogeneous a mass, and may be permitted calmly and charitably to state that, by taking our place, as one among many, in the aggregation of sects, we should conceive the act to imply (and surely it is difficult to escape from such a view of the question,) a recognition of what we believe that the Bible does not teach, and to be equivalent to giving in our adhesion to a system of operations different from that by which the Apostles planted the Faith among the nations. We conceive that we should commit ourselves to a vast deal more than merely assisting in the circulation of the Scriptures,—for, if this were all, we would be behind none in our desire to promote the work. While we unreservedly and cordially subscribe to the language of our own Articles, Homilies, and Ordination service, respecting the sufficiency of holy Scripture alone, for the basis of all saving truth, we conceive it to be a wholly untenable ground to take up, that no human help for understanding the Scriptures, is appointed or needed—an idea often expressed by those who are themselves specially anxious to give a strong extraneous bias to the readers of Scripture, but expressed just in such a manner, that men, to be commonly consistent, ought to give to their unlettered brethren the Bible in the original tongues, and to tell them that they want no Church nor Ministry to translate it, for they have the promise that they shall be all taught of God, and they must not lean upon man. In fact, it is not unfrequently seen that, under the colour of standing fast in the liberty wherewith Christ has made us free and calling no man father or master on earth, appeals are too unscrupulously made to the lurking old Adam in the bosom of man, and his natural pride and impatience of restraint are the more dangerously fostered, because the occasion is ministered to him, of clothing them with the semblance of a certain spiritual enlargement and elevation of mind, and a conscientious and manly assertion of his christian birthright.

These remarks apply generally to all those mixed operations in Religion or religious education, in which the Church loses her distinctive place and character, and by so many degrees, sinks in one great element of her efficiency in the world, while other parties who have nothing to lose of the same kind, are naturally rejoiced to bring her down to their own level, and perfectly appreciate their advantage in doing so. They apply also to all those occasions of daily occurrence, in which men flatter one another with the persuasion that they really are liberal and enlightened, if they attach no importance to differences in Religion, and can fluently run off certain phrases respecting denominational preferences and sectarian views, under which term they would, by a singular inversion, comprehend the consistent preservation of Church-principles and the conscientious and well-examined maintenance, with no breach whatever of charitable feeling, of the line of distinction between the Church and Sectarianism properly so called.† I am happy to believe that it is not necessary for me to spend much labour in insisting or enlarging upon notions at once so shallow and so perilous as those which I am here combating: but as they prevail very extensively in the world and are perfectly accommodated to the spirit of the world and are echoed right and left by the daily press,—with no small share of odium thrown upon those who entertain contrary sentiments, we have here a duty to perform in endeavouring to correct this tendency in that portion of the public mind which is accessible to our influence, and seeking to infuse sounder principles, and habits of thinking of less hurtful consequence. Many most sincere Christians are led into errors upon these points in which they stand upon common ground with the worldling and the sceptic who are indifferent to all religion, and who, while the God of this world hath blinded their eyes and hidden from them the light of the Gospel, look down from an imaginary elevation, upon the proceedings of those who earnestly contend for the faith once delivered to the Saints, as upon a

* What the early Church thought respecting the necessity of a regularly warranted title to the Ministry, (although even the Schismatics and heretics of that day never dreamt of such a deviation from original order as that of dispensing with Episcopal Church Government,) appears, among numberless other instances, from the following words of the martyr Bishop, Cyprian:—Hi sunt qui se ultro apud temerarios convenas, sine divina dispositione, praeferunt, qui se praepositos sine ulla ordinationis lege constituent, qui, nemine episcopatum dante, episcopi sibi nomen assumunt.

† Tous de méprisables pharisiens says another martyr Bishop nearer to the Apostles, (Ignat: ad Smyrnaeos) and he only echoes the language of St. Paul and of the Lord himself. I have in different former publications, endeavoured to indicate the mischiefs done to the cause of the Gospel, by the divided and disjointed state of the Protestant world, but so far as what I have said is at all known or remembered, it will be observed that I have always acknowledged the faults of our own party, and have been willing that we should bear our just share of the blame.

In going back to the fathers and applying their testimonies to things around us, it is sad indeed to observe with what close and remarkable exactness the following passage from Lactantius, exposing the discordance to be witnessed among the ancient philosophers, as contrasted with the unity, in its own proper subsistence, of the Faith which they opposed, will now serve to describe the separations among Christians themselves, in their effect upon the cause of Christ in the world: Sed cum inter se magna concertatione dissident, secumque ipsi plerumque discordant, apparet eorum iter nequaquam esse directum: siquidem sibi quique proprias vias impulerunt, confusionemque magnam querentibus veritatem reliquerunt. Alas! that any enemy of the Faith, Mahometan or Pagan, Jew or Sceptic, should be able to turn against us a passage like this and to say—Suo sibi hunc jugulo gladio!

squabble of mere party zealots. Few, very few men know how to preserve a clear and discriminative line in reasoning and in forming their conclusions upon questions, great or small, which are agitated in the world; and thus many are seen to confound the principles of toleration with the want of all principle attaching to latitudinarianism; many are led to think that because persecution and compulsion in Religion are equally unchristian and unwise, therefore, (although some will impose one limitation and some another upon such a principle,) all forms which religious faith may assume, are equally to be esteemed, encouraged and supported. Whereas, in point of fact, an idea like this, if properly examined, will be found only to begin and end in infidelity. There is something plausible, something soothing to our self-love, something which flatters the mind of man with a false idea of its own expansiveness and superiority, in the sentiment which we find embodied in the standard poetry of our language, and which corresponds very closely with language often used by zealous believers, with little suspicion of its real ultimate tendency, to express their views of liberality and love,—

His can't be wrong whose life is in the right.”

a statement of the case, which, in a sense somewhat different from that intended by the poet, is correct; because a truly christian life would be the evidence of a true faith and is not to be found apart from it among men—but, according to the notion meant to be conveyed,* it is only by a few steps removed from the language of the same poet, in his well-known universal prayer,—

“Father of all, in every age
And every clime adored,
By saint, by savage, or by sage,
Jehovah, Jove or Lord.”

And what christian can fail immediately to perceive the character of infidelity stamped upon these lines, in which the idea of a real revelation from God as distinguished from the inventions of men in Religion, is plainly, although inferentially, excluded, and the filthy abominations and revolting cruelties of heathen superstition, whether among the great and polished nations of historical renown, or the various shades of barbarism and semi-barbarism which develop themselves in different branches of the human family, are placed upon a par with the grace and truth which came by Jesus Christ.

What the world calls liberality, therefore, is something which, as the commissioned guardians of God's eternal truth, and the appointed dispensers of those remedies which he has provided against the curse and venom of sin, we should at least be cautious in adopting. We ought to consider, if we open one barrier after another, what we are doing, and where, in other hands, to which it must pass, it is likely to stop. We must evidently draw a line somewhere, even with reference to those who profess and call themselves Christians, in our recognition of what is safe and solid in Christianity, and if we conscientiously see reason to narrow the circle more than our dispositions would prompt us to desire, we must not be afraid of the charge which will be thrown against us, of intolerance and exclusiveness. If we conscientiously see reason to narrow it more than is judged necessary by others who are our own brethren in the ministry, we must be content to bear the pain caused to our feelings by that difference—but we shall do well, if we cannot convince them that we are right, at least to satisfy them that we act from honest and not unexamined conviction ourselves.

The same remark is appropriate in the question respecting Temperance Societies. Very hard things are sometimes said of our Clergy because, in the vast majority of instances, they do not unite with these associations; and these hard things are not likely to be softened by our seeming quietly to acquiesce in the imputation, as if we could not rebut it, that we do not choose to take our part in the movement, because we do not choose to forego our own indulgence. Still less are they likely to be softened by our railing against the Temperance Societies, or denying that they have effected any good, or venting mere sarcasm and ridicule against these institutions, of which very excellent men among our own clergy, and more of the same stamp among the Episcopal Clergy of the United States are members and champions. I believe there may be cases in which, upon the Apostolic principle that it is good neither to eat flesh nor to drink wine, nor anything whereby thy brother stumbleth, or is offended, or is made weak, it may be right for the Clergy, if no obstacle be found in the effect upon their health, to adopt the rule of the Temperance Societies in their own personal practice which, of course, does not imply that they must join in membership. But there are other cases in which, upon the very same principle, and in the right and commendable exercise of the wisdom of the Serpent they will avoid, by any needless austerity and rigour, to damage the influence which they possess for good; and, with a single eye to the glory of God, the good of the Church, and the good of souls, will rather expose themselves to be, in some quarters, called wine-bibbers, with their divine master, than to be branded in other quarters as fanatics, for following, in this point the discipline of the Baptists. In taking such a course, however, upon these or other grounds, they ought to be prepared to justify it;

* I am well aware that the celebrated Bishop Warburton, both in the notes of his edition of the works of Pope and in a series of letters (which last, however, I have never seen,) published expressly for the object of defending the Essay on Man, has undertaken to vindicate his friend from the imputation of disparaging Revelation in these two lines. But what it is intended here to shew, is that these latitudinarian views in Religion, tend to infidelity, and that the sentiment of this distich is only a stepping stone to the sentiment of the Universal Prayer.

It is rather a singular account of the Essay on Man, which is found in a biographical notice of Warburton—“It is universally believed that the author had, in the composition of it, adopted the philosophy of Lord Bolingbroke, whom, on this occasion, he had followed as his guide, without understanding the tendency of his principles.”

THE BLESSED END OF A HOLY LIFE.

We take the following extract from the conclusion of the Life of Herbert, as abridged in the Evergreen from "Walton's Lives."

"He was most happy in his wife's unforced compliance with his acts of charity; and he paid into her hand a tenth penny of the money which he received for tithe, that she might dispose of it among the poor of the parish. He gave her also, for the same purpose, a tenth of the corn that came yearly to his barn. And this was usually laid out by her in blankets and shoes for such poor people as she knew to stand in most need of them. This as to her charity. And for his own, he set no limits to it, nor ever turned his face from any that he saw in want, but relieved them, especially his poor neighbors; to the meanest of whose houses he would go, and inform himself of their wants, and relieve them cheerfully if they were in distress; and would always praise God as much for being willing as for being able to do it. And when he was advised to be more frugal, as he might have children, his answer was, 'he would not see the danger of want so far off; for since Scripture commends charity so far as to tell us that it is the top of Christian virtues, the covering of sins, the fulfilling of the law, the life of faith, and that charity hath a promise of the blessings of this life, and of a reward in the life to come; and since all my tithes and church-dues are a gift of God; may God make me so far trust His promise as to return them to Him; and by his grace I will do so, distributing them to any of my poorer members in distress, or do but bear the image of Jesus my Master.'

In the practice of these excellencies he continued in the active part of his life, till a consumption so weakened him as to confine him to his house, or to the chapel, in which he continued to read prayers constantly twice every day, though he was very weak. In one of which times of his reading, his wife observed him to read in pain, and told him so, and that it wasted his spirits and weakened them; and he confessed it, but said his life could not be better spent than in the service of his Master Jesus, who had done and suffered so much for him. 'But,' said he, 'I will not be wilful; for though my spirit be willing, yet I find my flesh is weak; and therefore Mr. Bostock shall read prayers for me to-morrow, and I will now be only a hearer of them, till this mortal shall put on immortality.' And Mr. Bostock, who was curate to the church of Fulstun, about a mile from Bemerton, undertook and continued this happy employment till Mr. Herbert's decease.

About a month before his death, his friend, Mr. Nicholas Ferrar, sent Mr. Edward Duncon to see Mr. Herbert, and to assure him that he wanted not his daily prayers for his recovery. Mr. Duncon found him weak, and lying on his bed, or on a pallet; but on seeing Mr. Duncon, he raised himself vigorously, saluted him, and with some earnestness inquired after the health of his brother Ferrar; and after some discourse of Mr. Ferrar's holy life, and the manner of his constant serving God, he said to Mr. Duncon, 'Sir, I see by your dress that you are a priest, and I desire you to pray with me.' Mr. Duncon asked him what prayers; to which Mr. Herbert replied, 'O sir, the prayers of my mother the Church of England; no other prayers are equal to them: but at this time I beg of you to pray only the litany, for I am weak and faint.' His discourse was so pious, and his manner so gentle and meek, that they remained fresh in Mr. Duncon's memory for forty years.

Mr. Duncon saw him again on the fifth day from the above, and found him much weaker than he left him, and therefore their discourse could not be long; but at Mr. Duncon's parting with him, Mr. Herbert said, 'Sir, I pray you give my brother Ferrar an account of the decaying condition of my body, and tell him I beg him to continue his daily prayers for me; and that, by God's grace, I am now become so like him as to be pleased with what pleaseth Him; and tell him that I do not repine, but am pleased with my want of health; and tell him, that my heart is fixed on that place where true joys are to be found, and that I long to be there, and do wait my appointed change with hope and patience.' Having said this, he did, with such sweet humility as seemed to exalt him, bow down to Mr. Duncon, and, with a thoughtful and contented look, say to him, 'Sir, I pray deliver this little book to my dear brother Ferrar; tell him he shall find in it a picture of the many spiritual conflicts that have passed betwixt God and my soul, before I could subject my will to the will of Jesus my Master, in whose service I have now found perfect freedom. Desire him to read it; and then, if he can think it may turn to the advantage of any poor dejected soul, let it be made public; if not, let him burn it; for I and it are less than the least of God's mercies.' Thus meanly did he think of that excellent book "The Temple," of which Mr. Ferrar would say, there was in it the picture of a divine soul in every page, and that the whole book was such a harmony of holy passions as would enrich the world with pleasure and piety.

At the time of Mr. Duncon's leaving Mr. Herbert, which was about three weeks before his death, an old and dear friend, Mr. Woodnot, came from London to Bemerton, and never left him till he had seen him draw his last breath, and closed his eyes on his death-bed. In this time of his decay, he was often visited and prayed for by all the clergy who lived near him, and especially by his friends the bishop and prebendaries of the cathedral church in Salisbury; but by none more devoutly than his wife, his three nieces, and Mr. Woodnot, who were sad witnesses of his daily decay; to whom he would often speak to this purpose: 'I now look back upon the pleasures of my life past, and see that the content I have taken in beauty, wit, music, and pleasant conversation, are now passed by me like a dream, or as a shadow which returns not, and are all now become dead to me, or I to them; and I see that, as my father and generation hath done before me, so I also shall now suddenly, with Job, make my bed in the dark; and I praise God I am prepared for it; and I praise Him that I am not to learn patience, now I stand in such need of it, and that I have practised mortification, and endeavored to die daily, that I might not die eternally. And my hope is, that I will shortly leave this valley of tears, and be free from all fevers and pain, and which will be a more happy condition. I shall be free from sin, and all the temptations and anxieties which attend it; and this being past, I shall dwell in the new Jerusalem; dwell there with men made perfect; dwell where these eyes shall see my Master and Saviour Jesus, and with Him see my dear mother, and all my relations and friends. But I must die, or not come to that happy place. And this is my content, that I am going daily towards it, and that every day I have lived has taken a part of my appointed time from me, and that I shall live the less time for having lived this and the day past.' These and the like expressions, which he often uttered, may be said to be his enjoyment of heaven before he enjoyed it. The Sunday before his death he rose suddenly from his bed or couch, called for one of his instruments, took it in his hand, and said:

'My God! my God!
My music shall find thee,
And every string
Shall have His attribute to sing.'

And having tuned it, he played and sung,

'The Sundays of man's life,
Threaded together on Time's string,
Make bracelets to adorn the wife
Of the eternal, glorious King.
On Sundays heaven's door stands ope.
Blessings are plentiful and rife,
More plentiful than hope.'

Thus he continued meditating, and praying, and rejoicing, till the day of his death; and on that day said to Mr. Woodnot, 'My dear friend, I am sorry I have nothing to present to my merciful God but sin and misery; but the first is pardoned, and a few hours will now put a period to the latter; for I shall suddenly go hence, and be no more seen.' Upon this Mr. Woodnot reminded him of his rebuilding Layton church, and his many acts of mercy. To which he answered, 'They are good works, if sprinkled with the blood of Christ, and not otherwise.' After this he became more restless, and his soul seemed weary of his earthly tabernacle; and this uneasiness became so visible, that his wife, his three nieces, and Mr. Woodnot, stood constantly about his bed, beholding him with sorrow, and an unwillingness to leave the sight of him, whom they could not hope to see much longer. As they stood thus beholding him, his wife observed him to breathe faintly, and with much trouble. He then fell into a sudden agony, which so surprised her, that she asked him how he did; to which his answer was, that he had passed a conflict with his last enemy, and had overcome by the merits of his Master Jesus. After which answer he looked up, and saw his wife and nieces weeping extremely; and charged them, if they loved him, to withdraw into the next room, and there pray every one alone for him; for nothing but their lamentations could make his death uncomfortable. Their sighs and tears would not suffer them to make any reply; but they yielded him a sad obedience, leaving only with him Mr. Woodnot and Mr. Bostock; and having given to the former, whom he had appointed executor for the good of his wife and nieces, his last will with his own hand, Mr. Herbert obtained the promise of his friend to be careful of his charges; and then he said, 'I am now ready to die.' After which words he said, 'Lord, forsake me not, now my strength faileth me, but grant me mercy for the merits of my Jesus; and now, Lord, Lord, now receive my soul.' And with these words he breathed forth his divine soul without any apparent disturbance, Mr. Woodnot and Mr. Bostock attending his last breath, and closing his eyes.

According to his own desire, the choristers and singing-men of Salisbury, with whom he had so often delighted to unite his voice in the cathedral worship, chanted the burial service of the Church over his mortal remains, which were consigned to their resting-place, at Bemerton, March 3, 1632.

Thus lived and thus died George Herbert: like a saint, unspotted of the world, full of alms-deeds, full of humility, and all the examples of a virtuous life; a peer to the primitive saints, and more than a pattern to his own age.

'All must to their cold graves:
But the religious actions of the just Smell sweet in death, and blossom in the dust.'

Mr. George Herbert's actions have done so to this, and will doubtless do so to succeeding generations; and if God be so pleased, may we be so happy as to die like him." Amen.

From Late English Papers.

A movement has been commenced in the Norwich diocese in furtherance of Church education. It is proposed to establish a training college for schoolmistresses, and another for masters also, if funds can be raised. The Bishop heads the movement, and promises a donation of 250*l.*, on condition that the necessary 6000*l.* be raised in the diocese in the course of the next six months. Lord Bayning has put down his name for 100*l.* donation, and increases his annual subscription from 5*l.* to 20*l.* The Bishop of Norwich and others have also furnished munificent contributions.

Archdeacon Bentinck, a prebend of Westminster, it is said, is about, at his own cost of 7,000*l.*, to erect a new church on the north side of Vauxhall-bridge, on a plot of ground which has been presented by Mr. Cubitt.

The Tempo of Naples contains the following letter of the Pope to Cardinal Patrizi:—

"If there was ever need to address God with fervent prayers, it is at this moment. Sins, blasphemies, sacrilegious acts of all kinds, and contempt of the most holy things, force us to have recourse to the Divine mercy. Cause, therefore, Mgr. Cardinal, prayers to be offered up—for prayers are always good—prayers for us, poor pilgrims, now become a cause of dispute. To that end we give you full powers. Receive from us our apostolic benediction, which I give with eyes bathed in tears to you, to all good men, and in particular to all who pray for me."

and men ought to know what their grounds are. Men who do not know it, ought to know that there are a great number of holy and exemplary persons who decline connection with the Temperance Societies, and that both clergymen and laymen, far from being chargeable, on this account, with a tenacity of personal comfort and indulgence, a charge which is the precise echo of that which is brought against the marriage of the Clergy, by the champions of Rome, may have strictly conscientious scruples respecting, not only the expediency, but the very lawfulness of these Societies. They may conceive that what they have to teach mankind by precept and example, is to know in all points, how to use this world as not abusing it, how to practise discretion and self-control without renouncing the objects which afford exercise to those qualities; how to partake of the good creatures and gifts of God, of which wine having the power of intoxication is manifestly represented in the bible as one, without passing the bounds befitting a follower of Christ. They may conceive that it is wrong and of hurtful consequence, as a general principle, to impose upon men the necessity of forswearing what, if formed in the school of Christ, they ought to know how to make use of, and apply it to its proper purpose, in moderation; such moderation being a pervading maxim of the life of faith. They may urge that the love of money is said to be the fruit of all evil; yet we do not teach men that the use of money must be extirpated, we teach them to use it rightly and beneficially. They may view with distrust and alarm which ought not to be lightly treated, the inroads of a system which, professing to effect a vast moral renovation among mankind, and, in a manner, to regenerate them by masses, without making the Gospel its instrument either directly and exclusively or by necessary concomitancy, opens a door to more extensive and more serious consequences than can, at the moment, be discerned. They may entertain very decided objections, which cannot be justly resolved into mere prejudiced or interested opposition, to the exaction of pledges to man, to a particular effect, which effect if it be really nothing more than the observance of Temperance, has been long before comprehended in the pledges given to God himself by every baptized person, who by subsequent acts has recognized his baptism; or, if it be something more than the temperance respecting which St. Paul reasoned before Felix, then outgoes the demands of the Gospel and seems to exalt another standard above it. They may judge that the first display of his miraculous power which the Lord Jesus was pleased to make upon earth, appears to be set in a questionable light by the language held at Temperance meetings, and in Temperance publications. They may be strongly inclined to associate with tendencies to error in religion, quite unsuspected by men who, from the best motives are eager advocates of what is called the Temperance movement and the Temperance cause, proceedings which have something evidently in common with those of certain authors of schism and propagators of false opinions in the early Church who fulfilled the prophetic descriptions at which I have already glanced, and of whom the following account is given by the learned and accurate Bingham, in his Antiquities of the Christian church:—

"Many Hereticks, such as the Manichees, Priscillianists and others, pretended to be more spiritual and refined, because they abstained from wine and flesh as things unlawful and unclean; and upon this score censured the Church as impure and carnal, for allowing men in the just and moderate use of them. If any Clergymen, therefore, so far complied with Hereticks, as either in their judgment to approve their errors, or in their practice by an Universal Abstinence,"—(observe the expression)—"to give suspicion of their siding with them, they made themselves obnoxious to the highest censures. The Apostolical Canons order, that if any Bishop, Presbyter, or Deacon, or any other Clerk, abstain from marriage, flesh, or wine, not for exercise but abhorrence; forgetting that God made all things very good, and created man male and female, and speaking evil of the workmanship of God; unless he correct his error, he shall be deposed, and cast out of the Church."

I shall simply add, upon the subject of Temperance Societies, that if, upon grounds like these, we feel it our duty to stand apart from them, we must remember that we stand apart from a movement which, as there is reason to believe, sweeps in many religious teachers by the mere force of its popularity; which is caught at, among them, as an engine of influence to further particular interests and designs; and which is applauded and countenanced by many laymen, who are sufficiently removed from all intention of joining these Societies themselves, or practising their rules; and that we are consequently called upon in a powerful manner to live down, according to a common expression, any obloquy or misconception to which we may be exposed by the course which we have taken. We have here an additional incentive to that ceaseless circumspection which should prompt us, in our love to the cause committed us, to take heed that the adversary shall have no evil thing to say of us; and to watchfulness over ourselves, in constant recourse, by prayer, to the succours of the Divine Spirit, which is necessary to our exhibiting the devotedness to our work, the holiness of life, the humility of temper, and the religious subjection of the flesh to the spirit, which should eminently characterize the man of God, and without which he cannot be worthy of the name; without which he will only hurt the Church, by any high-toned assertion of her principles.

"So have I seen the sun with a little ray of distant light, challenge all the power of darkness, and without noise and violence climbing up the hill, hath made night so retire, that its memory was lost in the joys and sprightfulness of the morning: And Christianity, without violence, or armies, without resistance and self-preservation, without strength of human eloquence, without challenging of privileges or fighting against tyranny, without alteration of government and scandal of princes, with its humility and nakedness, with toleration and patience, with obedience and charity, with praying and dying—did insensibly turn the world into Christian, and persecution into victory?"—Bishop Taylor.

Mr. Baptist Noel's "Essay on Church and State" has just issued from the press. The following preface contains a portion of the reverend writer's apology for withdrawing from the ministry:—

"As in the following work I have frankly attacked the union between the Church and State, I feel constrained to bear my humble testimony to the piety and worth of many who uphold it. I have stated, without reserve, the influence of the system upon prelates; but how many instances occur in which men, raised to the most ensnaring honours, have successfully resisted their temptations? Of those prelates with whom I have the honour to be acquainted, some I admire for their simplicity, benevolence, and liberality; and others still more for eminent piety. Most wisely in many instances, and most conscientiously I doubt not in all, have the present Government administered their ecclesiastical patronage. Still more anxious am I to do justice to my beloved and honoured brethren, the Evangelical ministers of the Establishment. Having acted with them for many years, I can speak of their principles with confidence. Numbers of them, whose names I should rejoice to mention here with honour, are as sincere in adhering to the Establishment as I wish to be in quitting it. Of many of them I am convinced that they surpass me in devotedness to Christ. Worthy successors of Romaine and John Venn, of Newton, Cecil and Thomas Scott, of Robinson and Simeon, I hope that, remaining conscientiously in the Establishment, they will have the respect and affection of all good men. May they enjoy increasing comfort and usefulness to the end of their ministry! While I condemn State prelacy, I honour each pious prelate; while I mourn the relations of godly pastors to the State, I no less rejoice in their godliness. The reasons for separation appear to me clear; but I do not expect others to think as I do. In claiming my own liberty of judgment, I learn to respect theirs. To remain in the Establishment with my views would be criminal—with theirs it is a duty. If by any of my expressions I have unnecessarily wounded the feelings of my Christian brother, I ask him to forgive me. If I have unconsciously fallen into any exaggeration, I deeply deplore it. Throughout the work I have made a clear distinction between Evangelical and un-Evangelical clergymen—between those who preach the gospel and those who do not preach it. No spurious liberality—no fear of censure—should obliterate the distinction; yet many, doubtless, who are not ranked among the Evangelical party—who do not support their institutions, and who do not usually act with them—may be converted and faithful ministers of Christ. Lastly, I must express my regret that I have not done more for the welfare of a friendly, considerate, and willing Church, to which I have been for twenty-two years a pastor, and with whom I hoped to have spent the remainder of my days. Serner duties which the study of the Word of God has forced upon my attention have to be fulfilled. But I cannot quit them without earnest prayer that my successor may receive much grace to build them up in piety, nor without my grateful thanks for their abundant and unvarying kindness.

"Hornsey, December 14."

ITALY.

The events taking place at Rome continue to be looked to with great interest. The Government appears to be getting every day more embarrassed, and it is thought that in a short time the Pope will be allowed to return to his capital on any conditions he may choose to dictate.

Signor Zucchini, the Senator of Bologna, who was one of the three personages nominated by the Chambers as a member of the Provisional Junta of Government, has refused to accept the office. The Senator of Rome has accepted, and the answer of the Gonfalonier of Bologna has not yet been received.

The Epoca, of Rome, of the 15th, says that the Pope sent a message to the Government, in which he lays down, as conditions, before returning to Rome, that the present ministry shall be dismissed, the Chambers dissolved, the liberty of the press suspended, the National Guard dissolved, and the suppression of clubs.

The Univers publishes the following letter of the Prince to the Apostolic Nuncio:—

"Monseigneur—I cannot allow you for a moment to give credit to the rumours which tend to render me an accomplice of the conduct practised at Rome by the Prince de Canino. For a long time past I have had no kind of connection with the eldest son of Lucien Bonaparte, and I deplore with all my soul that he has not felt that the maintenance of the temporal sovereignty of the Venerable head of the Church was as intimately connected with the cause of Catholicism as with the liberty and independence of Italy. Receive,

"LOUIS NAPOLEON BONAPARTE."

ROME, Dec. 18.—In consequence of the refusal of the Senator Zucchini, the Chamber of Deputies have elected Galetti as the third member of the Government Junta. On the 17th there was a great demonstration to induce the ministry to convoke immediately the Italian Constituent, and the ministers promised an answer at eight o'clock to-day, and this morning at that hour the generale was beaten, and the Civic Guard occupied the city, and especially the Place of the Chamber of Deputies, which had the appearance of a field of battle. At the opening of the sitting the ministry announced its resignation as not having the power to meet the exigencies of the times. The ministry afterwards published a proclamation recommending order and obedience to the laws.

The following remarks upon the flight of the Pope are made by "the English Churchman":—

The Pope still continues at Gaeta. The Roman Chambers have nominated a Regency with a Cardinal at its head. This looks as if they wished to have the Pope back again. It is evident that the Romans do not like him to reside within the Neapolitan territory. The misfortune is, that, even if the Pope does return to Rome, the respectable part of the community can place no further confidence in him;—he has fled once, what is to hinder him from flying again? Had he remained at Rome, and fought the battle out there with the Republican faction, he would have succeeded in the end; no doubt he would have had to submit to many indignities for a while, but at last all moderate men would have come round to his side. This has been the case in Prussia, and it would have been the same at Rome. Now we fear there is no chance of it. We must persist in considering the flight of the Pope from Rome as a most ill-judged and fatal measure. His spiritual power, in all probability, will not be affected, for it rests upon other foundations; but what will become of the Church property if the Republicans get the upper hand?

The Banner of the Cross.

GOSPEL TRUTH, AND PRIMITIVE ECCLESIASTICAL ORDER.

SATURDAY, JANUARY 27, 1849.

NEWSPAPER PICTURES.—We expected that some of the friends of the Banner might not relish, at first, the change which was made in the heading of this paper.

The alteration was not made upon the solitary judgment of the Editor. The advice of a few judicious and deeply interested friends was asked, and they agreed in the conclusion that the present heading was to be preferred.

But neither the Editor, nor his kind advisers, ever supposed any disapprobation of the change would involve a deeper question than one of taste. So little consequence was attached to this matter, that the Editor only made a brief, and somewhat unguarded, allusion to it in the first number. It would not now be referred to, had we not been informed that this change was supposed to be associated with principle! As if, in removing the Flag which has been pictured at the head of the Banner, we had removed one of its old landmarks; and, in taking down this, we had lowered our Standard before the vain breath of popular prejudice.

The reason, too which we assigned for the change, has been misinterpreted. Some of our readers seem to have lost sight of the fact that we were speaking only of a newspaper. We had not the remotest reference to the use of pictures and emblems in proper places. We expressed no want of regard for that holy sign, which has been well called "the true sign of our holy Faith;" when we removed its pictured image from the pages of a newspaper, wherein it may be trampled under foot, and wherein it was not, and can never be, represented in a manner suited to its holy character. We furnished no text for the Discourse of a Cotemporary about "the multiplication of crosses on Churches and in Churches, not to speak of other places." The turn which was thus given to our act and our words, may have been honestly meant, but it was not the fair and honest interpretation of what we have said and done in this matter. And those who have been alarmed by this suspicious praise, have been disturbed by groundless fears. We repeat it, we spoke only in reference to a NEWSPAPER. We accept no praise from those who dislike this holy sign in any place, we deserve no censure from those who reverence this emblem and would make it conspicuous in every holy place.

We think pictures of any kind out of place in a paper which would claim the dignified position of a Church Journal, and which should seek to commend itself, by the reality of solid worth, and not by catch-penny illustrations and pictures which take the popular eye. Our only aim, we re-assert the declaration made in the first number of this volume, is "to make this paper more and more worthy to be called the Banner of the Cross." Its motto forbids us to "glory save in the Cross." It is pledged to set forth 'GOSPEL TRUTH AND PRIMITIVE ECCLESIASTICAL ORDER,' the glorious system of which THE CROSS is the Sun, the centre of Light. In carrying out this high purpose, we must often err, and in what of our works do we not "offend all?" As we have striven, so shall we continue striving, to speak "the Truth, and the whole Truth, and nothing but the Truth," to proclaim in full, as occasion demands, the glorious principles of "the One Catholic and Apostolic Church," and to do all in charity, for "charity rejoiceth in the Truth." If we walk not in these old paths it is because we fail to see them, not because we fear to follow where they lead. They who forsake "the good way" to secure the favor, or shun the censure, of man, shall obtain, we are sure, neither Divine nor human approval.

BISHOP DOANE.

Tuesday afternoon.

We regret to inform the many, who are anxious on this subject, that the Bishop has had a relapse and is now in a very critical situation. There is a very slight improvement in his symptoms.

Wednesday morning.

Dr. Mütter, who has been up all night with the Bishop, reports him a little better, but still dangerously ill.

CHARITY PUBLICATION SOCIETIES.

We briefly noticed, as a new publication, a pamphlet bearing the following title:—"An Appeal to the Christian Public, on the Evil and Impolicy of the Church engaging in Merchandise; and setting forth the wrong done to Booksellers, and the Extravagance, Inutility, and Evil-working of Charity Publication Societies."

Our reason for not giving to this able pamphlet, upon a most important subject, a more extended notice at the time of its reception, was stated. It was a republication of a series of articles, with some additional matter, which had first appeared in our columns. We always think that an Author, especially one so well qualified, can speak for himself better than we can speak for him. And having given nearly the whole pamphlet to our readers, we supposed they were capable of forming a judgment of the merits of the case, if they were sufficiently interested in the matter to read the communications of "P. P." Besides, the practical effects of the evils of these cumbrous Charity Machines are much better known to the Author of the pamphlet than to the Editor of the Banner, who enjoys the negative bliss of comparative ignorance. We say this much to show that it was from no design to slight this pamphlet, or to avoid the responsibility of expressing an opinion, so far as we had one to express, upon the subject it discusses, that we noticed it so briefly. We held ourselves in reserve to speak if an occasion presented itself demanding such notice. This occasion, as we expected it would, has now offered, and we therefore speak.

In noticing this pamphlet, "the Episcopal Recorder" is pleased to hint that we have shown ourselves inimical "to the great cause of christian benevolence," by allowing these articles a place in our columns. The following are the words of our cotemporary:

"Had we not seen the staple of this pamphlet in several recent numbers of 'The Banner of the Cross,' we should have supposed that it was the production of an enemy to the great cause of christian benevolence; but having found its way first to the public through an organ professedly religious, we are bound to take for granted that it is otherwise."

We pass by the fact that the Editors are "professedly" ignorant of the name of the author of this pamphlet, with the simple remark, that it is as well known here as if it had been emblazoned on every page. He has taken no pains to conceal it.

As to the character given to the Banner, "an organ professedly religious," we feel almost tempted to reply in the words of the old colored man, a servant, we think, of General Washington. When asked by some one, "what religion he was of," he replied, "Oh master, I'm of no religion at all, I belongs to the old Church of England." So all the Banner professes is, to be an organ of THE CHURCH.

We also take this opportunity of stating our reasons for admitting these articles into the Banner, which were mainly directed against evils existing in the surrounding denominations. In the first place, not a few, professedly churchmen, prefer these institutions to those of their own Church, and give their money and their support to them. Again, seeing the growth and extension of these, others are disposed to adopt the means employed by them and introduce their system of operations into the Church. We considered the able articles of "P. P." as wise and timely warnings, and we fully agree with him in his views "on the evil and impolicy of the church engaging in merchandize." We must honestly confess we are not so much concerned about "the wrong done to booksellers," as we think they are able to take care of themselves.

We cannot, in this article, enter into a particular review of the many important points, striking facts, and conclusive arguments, advanced by the writer of this pamphlet. We can only at present, attempt to vindicate both him and the Banner against the unjust charge of uniting in hostility to "the great cause of christian benevolence."

This assertion is plainly a petitio principii, a mere begging of the question, the favorite logic of those who would overwhelm argument by appealing to unthinking prejudice. Show that the statements made are false, disprove the arguments by something more than mere assertion, and then it will be time to make such a sweeping declaration. The authorities quoted by the Recorder, are, with two exceptions, of no weight, and none of them bear upon the point at issue. "P. P." does not condemn these societies as the collectors of charity for distributing the Word of God and religious works among the needy and ignorant. And it is in this aspect alone that Wilberforce and Bishop Henshaw commend them. "P. P." condemns them as PUBLICATION SOCIETIES, as bringing their merchandize, covered with the cloak of charity, into the church, as transacting mere worldly business under the name of Christianity, as making the church a partner in great publication concerns, and perhaps exciting the anger of Him who drove with a scourge all them that sold and bought in the temple, saying, "My house shall be called the house of prayer."

The object desired by him is thus stated in the postscript:

"Not a cent more should ever be given to Charity Publication Societies. They should all wind up, and dispose of their property to the best advantage; and the whole amount of their capital should be converted into a fund for the purchase and circulation of religious books, the publishing of them being left to individual enterprise. Books would then be as cheap, if not cheaper, than the Societies make them. Societies might be formed for the execution of these objects. But Charity should invest nothing in producing books. She should not touch the springs and rewards of productive labour. Labour is a fruit of a spoiled Eden, forbidden still to the touch or taste of Charity."

And that he is not in this an enemy to the great cause of Christian benevolence, or rather not designedly so, the following expression of his desire will show:

"This plan, or something like it, adopted, and millions of Charity would be saved to the church, which she could expend for more appropriate and needful objects; say in the support of Missions in poor and destitute places. Planting a living preacher in such places, building him a church, and leaving with him some of the best books, Charity might go on and have no need to return again, resting assured that things would be well done without her further help. This would be doing our work according to the gospel, each and all acting in a proper sphere."

In other words, he wishes charity to be given for charitable objects, and not to destroy the business of honest, hard working men. He desires not to see the gifts of the liberal expended in supporting a retinue of needless editors, clerks, agents, secretaries, &c., &c., which should be given to sustain starving missionaries; he would restrict the promise, even as the Lord also ordained, "that they who preach the Gospel, should live of the Gospel."

We cannot conclude without adding, that we do not subscribe to all the particular conclusions of this Pamphlet. We do not think that "the Episcopal Sunday School Union" is justly exposed to the objections here urged. It does not engage "in merchandize"—it is not guilty of "extravagance"—it keeps close to its proper office—and it asks little from the charity of the Church, and what it obtains is bestowed in charity.

But if our readers feel interested in the subject, let them not trust to any partial reviews or criticism, but let them get the Pamphlet, and read and judge for themselves.

We noticed, last week, the improvement made in the new volume of THE CALENDAR. In publishing the following more particular description, from the last number of this Church paper, we most heartily reciprocate the feelings of good will expressed toward the Banner.

We hope that this important Diocese will no longer expose itself to the charge, for which it now has less excuse than ever, and that it will no longer be "found difficult if not impossible to sustain a Church Journal in Connecticut."

NEW VOLUME OF THE CALENDAR.

Our readers have now seen a specimen of the enlarged Calendar. Two columns have been added in width, besides increasing its length proportionally; thus giving a very large amount of reading matter and general news beyond what it formerly contained. The Publisher has been influenced to make this improvement at a considerable outlay of capital in the beginning, and at an increased weekly expenditure, not because the paper is prosperous at present, but because he wishes to make it so. It has always been found difficult, if not impossible, to sustain a Church Journal in Connecticut, because of the large numbers who could not afford to subscribe for two papers, and who in deciding between a religious and a secular paper, would always prefer the latter. At the same time they have always represented to the agents who have called upon them that they would prefer to either, a paper which would give them a good summary of both Ecclesiastical and General intelligence. One paper would then answer every purpose for themselves and their families. It is just such a paper as this that the Publisher of the Calendar now proposes to offer to the churchmen of Connecticut. He hopes and believes that they will sympathize with and sustain his effort. No pains will be spared on his part to make the paper in its printing, and all other respects, such as they can welcome to their firesides and homes. He begs both clergy and laity to exert themselves so to increase the list of subscribers as to justify the expense he is about to incur. To all the present subscribers a much more valuable paper will be offered without any increase of price. May he not therefore hope that they will exert themselves to extend its circulation among their neighbors and friends.

In the New Orleans "Picayune," of Dec. 10th, sent us by some unknown friend, we find "A discourse, delivered in the First Congregational Church, New Orleans, November 26, 1848, by Theodore Clapp." The author of this discourse is one of the most popular preachers in New Orleans, and has a wide influence. The following brief extract will serve to contrast his views with those of the Bishop of Montreal's charge, [see first Selection] and show that there is much need of the timely cautions of the latter. We have here a new revelation, a new church, a new gospel, all the brand new productions of this age of progress and development!

"It is supposed by many that the Sons of Temperance have no higher object in contemplation than the physical or temporal salvation of the inebriate. This supposition is entirely erroneous. These societies are labouring in the most efficient manner to advance the intellectual, moral and religious improvement, not of their own members only, but of all others without distinction that are within the reach of their influence. They have embodied in their organization, or system of action, what seem to me to be the true ideas, the essential elements of a Christian Church. A splendid edifice where people meet on the Sabbath to display their finery, amid the pomp and pride of imposing rites, and to enjoy the charms of music and eloquence, is not necessary to the existence of what is called a Church in the New Testament. The smallest company banded together for self-improvement and for suppressing, as far as lies in their power, all the forms of suffering and guilt by which they are surrounded, should be welcomed and encouraged as brethren by all those who profess to be the disciples and followers of the Great Master.

New Publications.

PROPOSED FRENCH RELIGIOUS AND LITERARY JOURNAL.—We cannot better comply with the request to notice this intended publication, than by giving the Prospectus. There are large numbers in this country to whom a paper in the French language will commend itself. And if rightly conducted we are sure this Journal may be an instrument of much good.

A copy of the Prospectus in French and English will be left at the office of the Banner, where those who desire to subscribe may leave their names.

Prospectus of "L'Annaliste Religieux et Littéraire."

THE REV. C. H. WILLIAMSON, Rector of the Church Du Saint Sauveur, in New York, announces his intention of publishing a Monthly Religious Journal in French.

The late extraordinary political events of Europe, combined with the advantages which this country presents to emigrants, have recently caused a great addition to the French population, not only in this city, but in other parts of the United States. There has, however, been no corresponding increase of papers or publications adapted to their wants or circumstances.

There is not at present a French religious newspaper published in the United States, and this seems to be a favorable time to supply the deficiency.

Besides copious extracts from French religious publications, L'Annaliste will contain, in a condensed form, the domestic religious intelligence of the day, with such literary and scientific selections as may interest the young; it being the intention of the editor to make his paper a welcome visitor, not only in the families of our French population, but also in those of our native citizens where the French language is understood.

The first number of the paper, which may be considered a fair specimen of its future style and character, will be widely distributed; after which it will be furnished to subscribers only.

To insure for the paper a very general circulation, the price is fixed at the low rate of $1 a year. Such terms as these will oblige the proprietor, in all cases, to require payment in advance—without which it must be apparent that the paper cannot be sustained.

One page will be devoted to advertisements, which will be inserted at the rate of $1 for sixteen lines.

The office of the paper will be at the Mission Station of the Rev. C. H. WILLIAMSON, No. 68 Duane street, where all communications must be addressed, post-paid.

The first number will be issued on the first Saturday in March.

THE NEW YORK ECCLESIOLOGIST.—Published by the New York Ecclesiological Society. Nos. II. III. January, 1849. H. M. Onderdonk, 161 Fulton street, N. Y.

Owing to some delay we have received this number at too late an hour to examine it, with sufficient care, for a notice this week. The list of articles shows a judicious selection of subjects, from which we may expect much valuable information. As we really desire the success of this periodical, and believe that, if wisely and prudently conducted, it may be the instrument of much good, we regret to observe, in one article, views set forth and expressions used whose only effect will be to excite needless prejudice and hinder the beneficial effect of the whole effort.

THE EVERGREEN, OR CHURCH OFFERING FOR ALL SEASONS.—New York, 161 Fulton street.

We have not yet received the January number of this excellent periodical. The past irregularity in its issue has been "occasioned by the removal of the Magazine to the city of New York." It is to be conducted with new vigor, and neither effort nor expense spared to make it worthy of patronage. We wish it, and doubt not it will deserve, all success.

INGRATITUDE OF REPUBLICS.—France has certainly given the most remarkable proof, in modern times, of the justice of this charge against popular governments. Such a matter may not come within the peculiar province of a Journal "professedly religious," but we have always felt a deep interest in the two noble names justly associated in the following notice from a correspondent in "the Courier and Enquirer." Whatever may have been their faults, these men have shown themselves above the influence of sordid and selfish motives. They have sacrificed personal interest to advance the cause of humanity, and, in our esteem, they deserve to be honored by those who regard true patriotism as a religious virtue. Their present fate is a lesson to those who make man their idol, and would sacrifice their very souls to win his fickle and treacherous favor.

"It is not a little remarkable, that during the progress of the brilliant, changeful, hot-bed, phantasmagoric life, which the French nation has led during the last eight months, the only two men who have really and clearly, on two several occasions, snatched the country from ruin, are now in comparative disgrace. I speak of LAMARTINE and of CAVAIGNAC; they have both, like CURTIUS, thrown themselves into the chasm of revolution and been swallowed up.

The good service of the first was rendered, when he snatched the red flag from the hands of the mob, and seduced them by his beguiling eloquence into a shout for the tri-color.

The service of CAVAIGNAC was rendered in crushing that most bloody endeavor of June to put down the tri-color and put back the red. History will do them justice. It may not, indeed, award to the poet the name of a great and practical statesman; but it will say of him that had he been only a little less eloquent, or only a little less humane, the country would have elapsed into the frightful atrocities of '93.

And of CAVAIGNAC, it will surely be no small honor to record, as truth must do—that after having reduced 50,000 insurgents to submission, he conducted the government of the nation through a stormy half year without a single outbreak, without arrogating to himself any princely honors, without building up the fortunes of his friends: and, at the end, gave up the power with dignity, and quietude, in obedience to the wishes of the nation.

They are the two names, LAMARTINE and CAVAIGNAC, which will stand out biggest on the page of time which will cover the eight last months: months which have been long as ages, and which have had weeks for years."

The following appears to be a sensible view of the worth of those acquisitions which have dazzled so many with their false and deceitful glitter.

COLONEL BENTON ON CALIFORNIA GOLD.

There are few men in the country whose opinions in regard to the character of the Western region of this country, and especially of New Mexico and California, are entitled to more weight than that of Colonel BENTON. We, therefore, make from his speech in the Senate, on Monday, on the bill for ascertaining land titles, &c., in California, the following extracts concerning the gold washings recently discovered in that country:

These washings are called in Spanish placer, from the Latin placere, to please; because it is a pleasing thing to find the shining gold under one's feet. But it is a transient pleasure. There is no fee simple in it; there is not even a life estate in it; not even a lease for a year, a month, a week, or a day. The pleasure is soon gone. Exhausted placers now exist in New Mexico, formerly yielding much, now some twenty-five or fifty cents a day, and only pursued by the poorest Mexicans. Regular mining has been followed there, and is now yielding considerable quantities. These washings of California are marvelously rich; for we have to believe what is certified to us by so many witnesses; but they are not the richest that ever were seen. Far from it. Those of Brazil, in the mountains back of Rio Janeiro, in the time of Lord Anson's voyage, say one hundred years ago, were far richer; and yet they have been exhausted so long that all memory of them is lost, and their history only lives in old books. Two millions sterling—ten millions of dollars—were annually sent to Europe, for years, from these washings. They were worked by slaves, who, to secure their fidelity and industry, were usually allowed by their masters all the proceeds of the day above a given amount; and in that way many slaves became rich, purchased their freedom, and then bought slaves of their own, lived in splendor and opulence, and laid the foundation of families. Yet these washings are exhausted, time out of mind; and so will be those of California; and the sooner the better.

I am a friend to a gold currency, but not to gold mining. That is a pursuit which the experience of nations shows to be both impoverishing and demoralizing to a nation. I regret that we have these mines in California; but they are there, and I am for getting rid of them as soon as possible.—Courier and Enquirer.

WHY MEN ARE PRONE TO CENSURE OTHERS.

That divine Spaniard, in his pleasant, but useful fictions of the life of Gusman, makes his Rogue wittily discourse of the unconscionableness of the Genowayes, and their prying into, and censuring of other men's lives; that when they are young, and go first to school, they play away, and lose their consciences, which their master finding, he lays them up carefully in a chest; but because he hath the keeping of so many, and they mixed one with another, he gives to his scholars, when they go away, such consciences as first come to hand, which they take to be their own—but are, indeed, somebody's else; whence it comes to pass, that no man bearing his own conscience in his own bosom, every man looks and pryes into that of another man's. The truth of this story may be questioned, but the moral is true without all question, and we have need sometimes of such pleasant passages to tell us the truth, that we may understand ourselves the better. There's hardly the man to be found, that is not curious in other men's faults, blind in his own, partial to himself, never without matter against others, still complaining of the badness of the times, the decay of trade, the ripeness of sin, but will not be persuaded that he is any way the occasion of the same.—Burton's Anatomie of Melancholy. 1630.

THE GREEKS AT THE FEAST.

BY THE REV. EDWARD C. JONES.

"Sir, we would see Jesus."

They wandered through the massive gates,
And gazed upon the motley throng,
They heard the white-robed band pour out,
The flood of solemn, ancient song.

The turbaned Rabbi and the Scribe,
In brodered robes and fringes gay,
Pressed on with eager glance to join,
The rites of that thrice festal day.

But they—the Grecian Pilgrims—saw,
No magic show to bind them there,
Though incense with a perfumed cloud,
Was filling fast the House of Prayer.

The Sanhedrim enthroned in state,
To these poor wanderers all were nought,
For, Jesus in that clustered throng,
For Him, the Christ, alone they sought.

Sir, we would see him—for our ears
Have heard his godlike acts of love,
Sir, we would see him—for his heart,
Attunes itself to heaven above.

Thus, Saviour, when thy courts we tread,
'Tis only Thee we long to view,
Thee in the sacramental grace,
Thee in the blest baptismal dew;

Thee in the read and spoken word,
Thee in the Church's ancient hymn,
Thee would we see, our risen Lord,
Now throned above the Seraphim.

And, oh, when faith is merged in sight,
And death's mysterious shadows flee,
Thee first in that unfading world,
The just made perfect long to see.

The rainbow round the throne grows dim,
The pearly gates attract no more,
For heart and eye with Christ are filled,
And Faith can have no richer store.

CHURCHES IN PHILADELPHIA.

MR. EDITOR:

In conversation with a lady of our communion a few evenings since, she stated that it had lately agreeably surprised her to learn that we had no less than twenty-three Churches in this city. I replied that I believed the true number was nearer thirty; and while returning home, ran over the following list in my mind, according to what I supposed to be their seniority. It may be that I have forgotten some, and misplaced others; and I will thank you, or some of your correspondents, to correct any errors.

A comparison of the Church in Philadelphia now, with what it was fifteen or twenty years ago, will help to sustain the assertion of an able correspondent of your cotemporary, The Churchman, that "there is no Church except the Protestant Episcopal that has increased so fast as the population of our country;" and that while others "are losing in their relative proportion to the number of our population," "the Church increases about four times as fast as the population of the country."

RUBRICAL ECCLESIOLOGY.

MR. EDITOR:—

The "IDEAL OF A CHRISTIAN PARISH" which the Liturgical studies of "SACERDOS" are exhuming from the Rubrics of the Book of Common Prayer, has about it certain features which to my mind are as far off as possible from being either Rubrical or Ecclesiastical. They are these:

I. "The sermon is to be delivered from the place where the priest reads the gospel, and gives the notices of the holy days, &c.; he being already turned to the people, and the Rubric directing—"Then shall follow the Sermon."

How "SACERDOS" has managed to extract this from the words "then shall follow the sermon," I really do not know. The Rubric they are from, so far as it at all bears upon the subject, reads thus: "Then (next in order,) shall follow the sermon; after which, the minister, when there is a communion, shall RETURN to the LORD'S TABLE and begin the Offertory;" of course implying that he has preached somewhere else. Either this or he must somehow or other contrive to return to a place he has not left. Now "SACERDOS" does not expressly say where the gospel must be read. The Rubrics, however, do not leave the matter doubtful. It is plain that it cannot be read from the desk, for then the minister would have to perform the impossible feat of returning where he had not been before: that is to say, "to the Lord's table." The Rubric, therefore, which is thought by some to sanction this mal-practice, tends directly to stultify another Rubric, and so must be looked upon as null and void. The gospel, therefore, must be read at the "right side of the Lord's table," and nowhere else. Of this there can be no doubt. But is "SACERDOS" right in saying that the sermon must also be delivered here? I think not, for the following reasons: 1st. As already shewn, it would be unrubrical. 2d. It would be an unauthorized liberty and, therefore, uneclesiastical. 3d. It would turn the Lord's altar into a pulpit, and therefore be irreverent. 4th. In a church having aisles, and a chancel of the right depth, it would require the preacher to be placed so as not to be seen by many of the people, and therefore be inexpedient. 5th. It would oblige him to rest his manuscript upon the altar, hold it in his hand, or to preach without one. To clergymen who are near-sighted, and cannot extemporize, or memorize, well, it would therefore be exceedingly inconvenient. I could easily name other objections against it, but this quintuple ground of its being unrubrical, uneclesiastical, irreverent, inexpedient and inconvenient, will perhaps be enough. How far "SACERDOS" is right in making the word "THEN" mean in the same place, and not simply NEXT IN ORDER, the dictionaries of our language must decide.

We may next be told that the Article "the," when it occurs in the Rubrics, means an Altar-Cloth or a Church-Steeple.

II. "From 'The Form of the Solemnization of Matrimony' we learn amongst other matters that there is to be some place (just outside the altar rails perhaps,) 'in the Body of the church,' as the Rubric says, where the marriage is to be solemnized."

This would cut the chancel short off at the altar rail, and make the enclosed altar space immediately adjoin the body of the church; which would be uneclesiastical in the extreme. By far the largest part of the church ought always to intervene between the rail and nave. The rule is to make this part roomy enough to hold all the communicants of the parish, in a kneeling posture, at one time. The English Rubric presupposes this arrangement. In any properly constructed church, therefore, to solemnize matrimony "just outside the altar rails" would be to violate the rubric which requires it to be solemnized somewhere "in the body of the church." "SACERDOS" must have two "IDEALS" of a perfect christian parish running in his head, which, without meaning to do so, he occasionally jumbles together; for in another part of his article he admits that a church to be rubrical must have a chancel "distinct from the body of the church;" and an altar, "railed off from the rest of the chancel." How can this be reconciled with his suggesting that "the body of the church" lies "just outside the altar rails?" It may not be amiss to add that the proper place for solemnizing matrimony is just under the chancel arch; the priest standing just within, and the parties just without, the chancel limits. They are required to be placed "in the body of the church," the PRIEST is NOT. In churches, however, of the prevailing PAGANORIMAMIZE style, where the "body of the church" and the "altar space" do adjoin, the marriage will of course have to take place just where "SACERDOS" says. (I thank your excellent correspondent M. P. for the hint.)

III. "The minister is not to quit the chancel from the beginning to the end of the Holy Communion office;—the notices for the ante-communion, the sermon, and the post-communion, making no provision for such absence, but rather implying the contrary."

This is assertion merely. The Rubrics do provide for the "RETURN" of the priest "to the Lord's table," after the sermon, without specifying whether the place he is to return from is within or without the chancel. It may, therefore, so far as the Rubrics stand in the way, be either the one or the other. It must, however, be at least far enough off from where the gospel is read to give meaning to the words, "the minister shall RETURN to the Lord's table." If this place be the pulpit, I need not say that if the principles of ecclesiastical science, which are pre-eminently those of correct christian taste, are at all consulted, the chancel will not be lumbered with it.

Again; the Rubrics do make provision for the priest's "absence" from the chancel during "the holy communion office." One of them says expressly: "The table, at communion time, having a fine white linen cloth, shall stand IN THE BODY OF THE CHURCH or in the chancel," so that the priest is not compelled by the Rubrics to go into it at all. This permission indeed, like that of leaving the words "He descended into hell" out of the creed; and of omitting "the sign of the cross" in baptism; both is, and ought to be, practically a dead letter. But so long as it is in the Prayer Book, it cannot be said that the Communion Rubrics make no provision for the priest's "absence" from the chancel "from the beginning to the end of the holy communion office." When Liturgical matters are concerned, we cannot be too accurate in what we say.

IV. "There is to be an aisle leading up to the chancel. The consecration of a church service directs that 'the Bishop and Clergy shall go up the aisle of the church to the Communion Table, repeating the 24th Psalm alternately.'"

Now an aisle in a well proportioned church cannot lead up to the communion table, so long as the communion table is in either of the two only places in which the Rubrics allow it to be put; that is to say, "in the chancel," or "in the body (nave) of the church." The aisles are, so to speak, distinct buildings from the nave and church; and do not, like the nave, terminate in the chancel at all. For these, therefore, to lead up to it is impossible. I cannot but think that the spirit of the Rubric would be much better kept up by taking "the aisle" in this place to mean the nave-aisle of the church. Such, at least, is the practical construction the framers of this office have always put upon it. They therefore do not speak of it as AN aisle, but by way of pre-eminence as, "THE aisle of the church." The aisles (being in fact the lateral wings of the church itself, and not mere passages or thoroughfares through it, as they are commonly thought,) ought never to be confounded with the aisle or nave-aisles which are by most persons miscalled middle and side aisles. The Rubric before us has unfortunately either adopted, or given rise to, this popular mistake. It would therefore be straining matters rather far to say that it provides for aisles, properly such, in a parish church. What it really does provide for is an alley running longitudinally through the middle of the nave. This is of course the only direct way of access through the chancel to the communion table. In such matters, even when we mean right, we should always guard as much as may be against a loose use of terms. Our language may be accurate without being at all technical or pedantic. There is no office for the consecration of a church or chapel in the English Book of Common Prayer.

V. "The Holy Table is to be out from the wall; so that the priest in consecrating the Holy Eucharist may stand before it; that is, to the East." And again:

"The people are to kneel facing the altar; and the pews and seats constructed so as to afford the people an uninterrupted view of the Act of Consecration;—the priest being required by the Rubric to stand that he may 'break the bread before the people.'"

The pews or seats ought to be so arranged that those in them may face the chancel. This is but decent. But when the chancel is of proper depth, no arrangement of this kind could secure an uninterrupted view of what was going on at the altar to the people in the aisles; unless the breadth of the chancel was equal to that of the whole church; that is to say, of nave and aisles together, which would be very uncouth, making the interior of the church a mere quadrangle. Even then, the column shafts, if there were any, would cut off the view of some. But, apart from all this, unless the priest can somehow or other contrive to make his body transparent, when standing before the Elements, the Rubric, as "SACERDOS" understands it, cannot possibly be complied with. The difficulties in the way are briefly these:—1st. The priest cannot go behind the altar (recollect "SACERDOS" has placed it out from the wall,) to consecrate the Elements; for the rubric says, he must stand before it. 2d. He cannot stand before it; because he would thus "interrupt the view of the people." 3d. He cannot step aside to the north or south end, for he must face "the east." This is indeed a dilemma, par excellence, for it has three horns to it, instead of the usual complement of two, each of which is a dilemma of itself. I can make nothing out of it. It is plain that the Rubric, as interpreted by "SACERDOS," cannot be obeyed. No good can come of thus making our Rubrics out worse than they are. The meaning of the phrase, "TO BREAK THE BREAD BEFORE THE PEOPLE," is to my mind exceedingly plain. It simply provides that the act of consecrating the Holy Eucharist shall take place openly in the church, a congregation being present to receive it; in order, without doubt, to guard against the practice of having private masses for the dead. Now it is perfectly reconcilable with this simple view of the subject, that the priest should stand (which he undoubtedly should do,) with his face towards the altar during the whole time of consecration. But if it is required that all the people present may actually SEE (they might be better employed,) the bread broken, and the hand imposed, he will evidently have to stand somewhere else. In the one case the Rubric may be kept; in the other, manage as we may, it must be broken.

As I have before remarked, the English Prayer Book supposes "all the communicants to be conveniently placed for the receiving of the holy sacrament" before the act of consecration even can begin—This convenient placing no doubt means that they are to be at this time upon their knees within the chancel, (when this is large enough,) each waiting in his place to receive the elements from the hand of the priest; he passing amongst them and distributing to them in turn. There is nothing whatever in our own Prayer Book, in the way of our adopting a similar practice in our churches; the Rubrics not fixing the time when the people shall approach the altar. The Rubrics, therefore, of the communion service can have no necessary connection whatever with the arrangement of the seats in the nave and aisles; for during the whole act of consecration they may rubrically be left empty. "SACERDOS" has surely overstrained matters in making the Rubrics, in this thing, at least, an ecclesiastical guide.

But, lest I tire your readers, Mr. Editor, I will now bring my article to a close, trusting I have shown "SACERDOS" that some of the ideas he modestly supposes himself to have gleaned from the Prayer Book, have in fact a better right (Suum cuique) to be considered original ecclesiastical conceptions of his own. Much of his "Ideal of a Christian Parish" Church is undoubtedly good; but much of it, again, I must frankly say, had much better be kept in the "IDEAL" state than embodied in oak and stone. His article, however, is an excellent one in the main. I think too he will see all the correct features of his "Ideal" faithfully carried out according to the letter and true spirit of the Rubrics, in the beautiful little "Church of St. James the Less" which is a rubrical study of itself, so perfectly does it correspond in its architecture and in all its interior arrangements with the requisitions of the Prayer Book. The bishop's chair; litany desk; credence table; chancel distinct from the body of the church, with its altar space railed off; font near the entrance; sedilia within the rail for the officiating priest and his actual assistants; orientation; absence of galleries; seats facing the altar, in both aisle and nave; church-like music; and many other good things, either called for or permitted by the Rubrics, may all be found there. Such structures are the best commentators upon some of our Rubrics; and most eloquently and convincingly do they speak. "I WISH THEM GOOD LUCK IN THE NAME OF THE LORD."

SIR:—In the communication from "PRINCIPLE," published in your paper for to-day, an appeal is made to "common sense and the Lexicographers of the English language," as if these two great sources of authority obliged us to such an interpretation of our rubrics, as would forbid the Chanting of the Psalter.

"It is a bad rule that does not work both ways." Let us see whether common sense and English Lexicography have nothing at all to say on the opposite side of the question, that is, in favor of Chanting the Psalter.

I have consulted six Lexicographers—English and American—as to the meaning of the word "Psalms." The result may be stated thus:—

RICHARDSON.—"A song or hymn sung to stringed instruments; a sacred or holy song."

JOHNSON.—"A holy song."

WALKER.—"A holy song."

REID.—"A holy song." (Professor Reid's American edition.)

WORCESTER.—"A sacred song."

WEBSTER.—"A sacred song or hymn; a song composed on a divine subject, and in praise of God."

A "Psalms," then, is a song. Now it would seem plain, even to that sort of "common sense" (so called,) which is nothing but party prejudice or vulgar ignorance, that the proper way of performing songs is to sing them! A song would hardly be counted a song if it were not sung. Is it considered necessary to announce that an opera, or an oratorio, will be sung, or is that taken for granted?

I suppose "PRINCIPLE" will not deny that for thousands of years—in the Mosaic and in the Christian Church—the PSALMS have been sung. I suppose he will not deny that, if the American Church forbids the singing of the Psalms, she not only stands alone in the matter, but directly contradicts the practice of the whole Church, now and throughout all past time. Is it likely that the American Church does this? Is it to be believed without direct proof in the way of a formal and positive prohibition? I am sure the "common sense" of the Church, and the "common sense" of mankind, will answer "No!"

I shall not put the question of Chanting the Psalter in any other light than this: for I do not wish to interfere with the argument from liturgical and rubrical authorities which has been presented by "W. M." But as the communication now published by "PRINCIPLE" does not, in any part, even approach the character of an answer to "W. M.," and as it produces a new argument, from common sense and Lexicography, I have thought it might be well to show "PRINCIPLE" that, on his own ground, the burden of proof lies entirely against him. This is a point of the utmost importance, and, I think, decisive of the controversy. It is not incumbent upon American Christians to show their right to enjoy a liberty which had in its favor the prescription of all time throughout the whole Church. It is for "PRINCIPLE" to show a sufficient and lawful prohibition of such liberty. This I do not believe "PRINCIPLE" himself thinks he can do. Nay! I think he must admit that (in the absence of a prohibition,) the proper way to use the PSALMS is to sing them, however, circumstances may sometimes compel the adoption of an inferior mode.

I am, sir,

Your obedient servant,

R. R. COX

THE POSITION OF THE ALTAR AND OF THE CONSECRATING PRIEST.

MR. EDITOR:

I wish to offer a few remarks on the above subject, in reference to an assertion made by "Sacerdos" in his communication in the Banner of the 13th inst. Let me premise, however, that his article, on the whole, gave me much pleasure, as being in accordance with my own thoughts and conclusions on most of the particulars therein referred to. The whole of our Liturgy is, or ought to be, endeared to us by its antiquity, as well as its intrinsic beauty: for the greater part of the Liturgy proper, i. e., the communion office, is made up of prayers, responses and hymns, taken almost word for word from the most ancient liturgies on record; the "sursum corda," "Lift up your hearts," with its response, and the Trisagion or Tersanctus, are found in all the apostolic and primitive Liturgies, I believe, without exception; while the celestial hymn, "Gloria in excelsis Deo," has been chanted in full-voiced chorus throughout Christendom, ever since that night on the plains of Bethlehem, when it was first sung by Angels' voices in celebration of the Incarnation of the Son of God. What a bond of communion is this, between us and the blessed spirits of holy saints and martyrs of the church in all ages from the very first—that we retain not only their true doctrine, but their almost inspired forms of worship, and that through all the changes which have come over the world, and all the troubles which have beset the Church, we yet, week by week, and day by day, glorify God and lift up our souls to Him, in the very words which they were wont to use. Can we then be too careful to preserve, as far as possible, not only the words themselves, but also the accompanying postures which were appointed and used by the early Christians. For how much of the significance of our public worship depends upon the position and manner of the officiating Priest on the one hand, and of the people on the other, and what a testimony may be borne by these attendant circumstances, in themselves indeed unimportant, to high doctrines of the faith. For instance, when it comes to pass, as it has at the present day, that many doubt and deny the sacrificial character of the Holy Eucharist, there remains this constant witness against them, that the Church has directed the Priest, in this service, to stand, where in other services he is to kneel.

But concurring, as I am sure I do most heartily, with Sacerdos in all these general principles, there are one or two particulars on which I regret that I must differ from him, and that on the very ground which he takes as his foundation, viz. the authority of apostolic Liturgies and catholic tradition. He says, "the Holy Table is to be out from the wall, so that the Priest, in consecrating the Eucharist, may stand 'before it,' that is, to the east (the east being the controlling point in the ecclesiastical compass,) in order that he may 'break the bread before the people.'" Now I apprehend, Mr. Editor, that this assertion is directly opposed to the uniform practice of the primitive church, of the Church of England in all ages, and of our own church, and therefore, the burden of proof lying on the side of him who makes it. Sacerdos must not think it hard if his readers suspend their assent until he brings forward his proof. I say it is contrary to the practice of our own church, for however various the position of our altars, I believe it is almost universally the same in this respect, that they always stand immediately against some object on the side furthest from the body of the church, (whether it be east wall, Reading Desk, or pulpit,) which would effectually prevent the consecrating Priest from standing on that side. And the practice of the Church of England, unless I am greatly mistaken, is uniform in this particular, that the altar stands directly against the east wall of the chancel, (except in Cathedral Churches, where there may be a chapel to the east of the chancel,) which of course prevents the Priest from standing to the east of it, as he should according to the interpretation given by Sacerdos of the phrase "before the altar," of which more presently. As regards the practice of the primitive church, there can be no doubt that the altar uniformly stood out from the east wall, as is the case also, I believe, in most of the churches on the continent at this day; but it must be borne in mind that these were all apsidal chancels, i. e. Chancels terminating in an Apse or semi-circle, on the chord of which the altar stood, the Bishop's Throne occupying the centre of the apse, with the seats of the Presbyters on either side of it, all to the east of the altar. But this case is entirely distinct from that of rectangular chancels, which are almost peculiar to England, and in respect to which the practice has been equally uniform, (with the exception mentioned above,) that the altar should stand directly against the east wall. And even those altars, in Cathedral Churches, which stand out from the wall, have a canopy surmounting them, with a Reredos guarding the eastern side of them, so that even in this case, the consecrating Priest cannot stand on that side. And there is good reason to believe that this was the case also in the primitive church, canopies being indeed expressly mentioned by Bingham, though he says nothing of the Reredos.

But granting thus much, as we must, to Sacerdos, that the Altar in most of the ancient churches stood out from the wall, as it stands also in most of the modern continental churches, it yet remains for him to show that anciently the consecrating Priest stood on the eastern side of it, (as we know he does not in the modern continental churches,) and therefore that the phrase "before the altar" is to be interpreted to mean what it is the custom of this age to call "behind it." And it is so called, be it observed, (by implication at least,) by those who adhere most firmly to the rule of Orientation, viz. the Editors of the (English) Ecclesiologist; for what is the "Reredos," but that which is at the back, i. e., the eastern side of the altar? And what are the "Frontal" and "Super-frontal," but parts of the altar-cloth hanging down the front, i. e., the western side of the altar? Now it must be observed, that in the discussion of this question—the position of the consecrating Priest—the practice of the primitive church is one thing, and the interpretation of the Rubric of the Church of England and our own church, is another; not but that I believe that the general interpretation of the Rubric concurs with the primitive practice, for as far as I have been able to examine, they do concur; but the connexion between the two questions must depend upon the further question, whether the Church of England intended to continue, or to change, the primitive practice; if the former, as I hold to be the case, then the Rubric must be interpreted by that practice; if the latter, it must be interpreted independently of it, and by the subsequent practice of the Church of England. In either case, I apprehend that the full discussion of the question would involve more labor and research than I can give to it at present; I will therefore spare yourself and your readers any further remarks upon it, trusting that some abler pen than mine, may be found to continue it, if occasion be, and standing, as I have a right, on the ground of the established usage of Western Christendom. I trust that Sacerdos will not find fault with me for declining to give to what I consider his innovation upon primitive practice, that assent which I most heartily grant to his revival of it; and hope that he will bear in mind that change in established custom is ever to be deprecated, and therefore should not be recommended without full and sufficient reason. I remain, Mr. Editor,

Respectfully yours,

S. X.

GOLD.

The gold mania, not inaptly denominated the "yellow fever," is still raging throughout the length and breadth of our land. The public appetite is constantly supplied by rich morsels of news from the gold region of the Pacific (?) coast; and many are disposed to heed such advice who have never before borne a very pliable character. It is currently reported by one high in authority, at Washington, that a revelation of the truth would depopulate our cities. In this pursuit man is apt to forget his high destiny, and will discover, perhaps, when too late, its unsatisfying nature. He who said "the silver and the gold are mine," requires them to be spent in His service, and to prevent an ardent desire therefor, asserts, "what shall it profit a man if he gain the whole world and lose his own soul." These truths may be neglected in the midst of excitement, but happy for us if "Sickness and death shall both agree,

To bring us, Lord, at last to Thee."

Well may we reflect upon the words of the holy George Herbert—

"Thou hast hid metals; man may take them thence,
But at his peril; when he digs the place,
He makes a grave; as if the thing had sense,
And threatened man, that he should fill the place."

Those should distrust themselves who thus seek gain that they may dispense. This artifice of our spiritual adversary is well calculated to delude. But illustration is better than argument, and it shall suffice. A wanderer from our mother-land, to improve his circumstances, "settled" in one of the most fertile counties in lower Virginia, purchased a small farm, and by the "sweat of his brow" acquired a comfortable subsistence. A member of the church, it was his privilege "gladly to give of the little" of his worldly goods. On one occasion he contributed to a benevolent object (much to the surprise of the applicant) fifty dollars. By the death of a relative in England, he became possessed of a large fortune—and was soon after applied to in behalf of the same object. After much hesitation he presented the applicant with one dollar, which elicited expressions of remonstrance. "The truth is simply this, my friend," said the donor, "when I had but little I had the disposition to give much, but now that I have much, I am disposed to give but little."

Truly may it be said

"A little that a righteous man hath is better than the riches of many wicked."

PRESENTATION OF PLATE.

Emmanuel Church, New Castle, Delaware.

An interesting ceremony took place in the Sunday School room of this Church, on Saturday last, the Festival of the Epiphany.

In accordance with a resolution of the Vestry, some handsome silver plate, designed as a testimonial of gratitude from the congregation, was presented by the Rector of the parish, to a Lady, who has, for more than twenty years, acted voluntarily as Organist and Directress of the Music. It consisted of a large and richly ornamented pitcher, of antique form, and bearing on its front a full and appropriate inscription; and also of a stand, or waiter, of the same material, on which was engraved a beautiful and accurate picture of the old and venerable Parish Church. Both articles were very much admired, and the latter, in particular, was regarded as very beautiful.

The presentation was made in the presence of the congregation, and was accompanied by a few highly appropriate remarks from the Rector, expressive of his own feelings of interest in the occasion, and his grateful estimation of those services, which, he believed, under Providence, had greatly contributed to the welfare and prosperity of the Church. His remarks were replied to, in a very handsome manner, by the Senior Warden of the Church, in behalf of the Lady to whom this testimonial of gratitude was presented.

"May she live long, to preside, as she has hitherto done, over the music department of our Church, and continue, by her well known skill and good taste, to elicit from our organ that 'concord of sweet sounds,' which has so often enlivened our devotions, and accompanied our praises to heaven."

New Castle, January 9, 1849.

The twenty-eighth report of the English Church Commissioners states that thirty churches have been completed within the past year.

The Times says that within the past year 13,000 persons have been buried within the precincts of London. The annual mortality of the metropolis is about 50,000. It opposes very warmly the practice of interment within the city, and quotes from a parliamentary report most revolting accounts of the method of disposing of the dead in one of these burial grounds.

Obituary.

DIED, on Wednesday, 10th inst., in Mauch Chunk, Mrs. ELIZABETH KENT, wife of Wm. H. Sayre, Esq.

The deceased was one distinguished for every amiable, beautiful, and lovely trait of character, whose excellent disposition endeared her to all who knew her, whose memory will be enshrined in the hearts of her family and friends. Strongly was she attached to her Church.

"Beyond her highest joy,
She prized its heavenly ways,
Its sweet communion, solemn vows,
Its hymns of love and praise."

It was her heart's delight to meet with our little congregation, of which she was one of the first members, who for years worshipped in a school room, and her severest trial, during her long and lingering illness, was to be debarred this privilege, in her estimation a blessed privilege. We mourn her departure from our midst as a heavy affliction. As a loss we cannot well bear, but "we sorrow not as those without hope;" we are consoled with the thought, that while her body is mouldering and decaying, "earth returning to earth, ashes to ashes, dust to dust," that her soul is resting in the bosom of Paradise, and that at the last day, her body, at the voice of the Son of God, shall come forth "fashioned like unto His own glorious body according to the mighty working whereby He is able to subdue all things unto Himself."

ZION CHURCH, PHILADELPHIA COUNTY.

At a meeting of sundry Episcopalians, favourable to the organization of a Protestant Episcopal Church, in the county of Philadelphia, held in the new edifice, rented for Episcopal worship, corner of North Sixth street and Franklin Avenue, on Saturday afternoon, 27th January, 1849, Col. Thomas Robinson was called to the Chair, and Mr. George Strawbridge was elected Secretary.

On motion, the following preamble and resolution were adopted, viz:

Whereas there are many Episcopalians in the western part of the district of Kensington, who live at a distance from any parish church, and whereas many of this description have attended the services of the Rev. Jacob M. Douglass, who has preached, with the approval of the Bishop of this diocese, in the new Church edifice, N. W. corner of North Sixth street and Franklin Avenue, since the first Sunday in December, 1848, being the third day of the said month,

Resolved, That it is proper and expedient to organize a Parish, and erect a Church edifice, to be located as the Rector and Vestry may deem most advantageous to the interests of Christ and the Church, which Church shall be denominated Zion Church.

On motion of Mr. McPaul, seconded by Mr. Charles Foster, Resolved, That the Vestry be now elected, and consist of nine persons, who shall be empowered to increase their number to twelve, if deemed expedient.

Whereupon, the following gentlemen were duly elected Vestrymen for the ensuing year, to wit:

TENNESSEE.

PASTORAL LETTER,

To the Ministers and members of the Protestant Episcopal Church in the Diocese of Tennessee.

DEARLY BELOVED BRETHREN:

There is just reason to fear, that that dreadful pestilence, called the Cholera, with which God in his wise providence has visited many nations of the earth, will ere long make its entrance into our borders. In the anticipation of such a visitation, it seems to me not unseasonable to address to you a few words of counsel and exhortation, to encourage you in the performance of such duties as will probably devolve on you, in a season of general alarm and calamity, and to set forth the forms of prayer, hereafter following, to be used on the occasions for which they are specially designated.

We should remember, that all diseases are the just visitation of God for sin, that they act by his permission, that we are dependent on his blessing for their cure and removal, and that they serve wise and valuable ends by reminding us of the uncertainty of life, and teaching us to live in such habits of piety, watchfulness and true godliness, as will prepare us, whensoever called on, to obey without fear and surprise, the summons that bids us give account of our stewardships. When sickness becomes so general as to assume the character of a pestilence, we are warranted in concluding that it is the judgment of God, — a judgment calling for particular notice. Such instances of the divine displeasure manifested towards nations for their impiety and irreligion, are, as you know, recorded in the word of God, and written, it would seem, for warning and admonition. In calling to mind, then, our own personal sins and wickedness, we should likewise remember and confess our iniquity and sinfulness as a nation, as having provoked by our pride, vain glory, ingratitude and forgetfulness of God, the righteous indignation and wrath of heaven. Let us with true penitent hearts acknowledge our unworthiness, confess the wickedness of our people in these things, and with the full purpose of amending our lives, implore God to avert his wrathful displeasure from ourselves and from our country. It may be that He will hear our cries, for He declares himself to be a God of mercy, full of tenderness and pity, and will not suffer the destroyer to come nigh our dwellings to hurt us.

Trusting thus, dear brethren, in His compassion, love and protection, we shall possess our souls in patience, shall be delivered from unreasonable and discomposing fears, and be the more ready to administer to our fellow men the kind offices and assistance which their necessities and miseries may call for at our hands. Remember the words of our blessed Lord, "I was sick and ye visited me" — to be pronounced hereafter to gladden the hearts of God's faithful children — and be assured that the recollection of such a charity on your part, performed to one of the least of those for whom Christ died, will diminish nought from your peace and comfort of mind in a dying hour, and will lessen not your joy in the great day of eternity.

Should it please God then to send among us the dreaded pestilence to scourge us for our sins and to chastise us for our ingratitude and forgetfulness of his many and great blessings, I trust and pray that there may be found among you, no irreligious fear, or cowardly dread unbecoming your profession, no shrinking from the discharge of all the offices of religion and the duties of charity and humanity which the poor, the sick and the afflicted may need. Cultivate a spirit of devout affection and calm trust towards God, as one of the best preservatives against the attacks of disease, and may He for the sake of His dear Son, our Saviour Jesus Christ, give us wise, sober, patient, and understanding minds, devout, religious and courageous hearts, that we may serve Him acceptably without fear while we live, and be made meet for His presence when we come to die. Your affectionate friend and faithful Pastor,

JAS. H. OTEY.

Columbia, Jan. 11, 1849.

PRAYER,

To be used in the Episcopal congregations of the Diocese of Tennessee during the apprehension of danger from "Cholera," immediately before the General Thanksgiving, at Morning and Evening Prayer.

Most gracious Father and God, who hast promised forgiveness of sins to all those who, with hearty repentance and true faith turn to Thee, look down, we beseech Thee, from heaven Thy dwelling place, upon us Thy unworthy servants, who, under an awful apprehension of Thy judgments, and a deep conviction of our sinfulness, prostrate ourselves before Thee. We acknowledge it to be of Thy goodness alone, that, whilst Thou hast visited other nations with pestilence, Thou hast so long spared us. Have pity, O Lord, have pity upon us. Withdraw Thy heavy hand from those who are suffering under Thy judgments, and arrest the grievous calamity with which other people have been scourged, and against which our only security is in Thy compassion. We confess, with shame and contrition, that in the pride and hardness of our hearts, we have shown ourselves unthankful for Thy mercies, and have followed our own inclinations instead of Thy holy laws; yet, O merciful Father, suffer not Thy destroying angel to lift up his hand against us, but keep us in health and safety; and grant that being warned by the sufferings of others, to repent of our sins, we may be preserved from all evil by Thy mighty protection, and enjoy the continuance of Thy mercy and grace, through the merits of our only Mediator and Advocate, Jesus Christ. Amen.

In any place in the Diocese in which the Cholera is prevailing, the following prayers are to be used instead of the foregoing.

O Lord, we beseech Thee, mercifully hear our prayers, and spare all those who confess their sins unto Thee; that they, whose consciences by sin are accused, by Thy merciful pardon may be absolved through Christ our Lord. Amen.

O Almighty God, the Lord of Life and Death, of sickness and health; regard our supplications we humbly beseech Thee; and as Thou hast thought fit to visit us for our sins with great sickness and mortality, in the midst of Thy judgments, O Lord, remember mercy. Have pity upon us miserable sinners, and withdraw from us the grievous sickness with which we are afflicted. May this Thy fatherly correction have its due influence upon us, by leading us to consider how frail and uncertain our life is: that we may apply our hearts unto that heavenly wisdom, which in the end will bring us to everlasting life, through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

A prayer recommended to be used in Family devotions, by masters and heads of families, in apprehension of Cholera.

Deliver us, O Lord, from all our offences, and make us not a rebuke unto the foolish. Take, we humbly beseech Thee, Thy plague away from Thy people, that we be not consumed by means of Thy heavy hand. For Jesus Christ's sake lay us not under this destroying sickness.

O Lord, deliver us from the snare of the hunter, and from the noisome pestilence; O defend us under Thy wings, and keep us safe under Thy feathers, that we may not be afraid for any terror by night, nor for the arrow that flieth by day; for the pestilence that walketh in darkness, nor for the sickness that destroyeth in the noon-day. Let no evil happen unto us, neither let any plague come nigh our dwelling; but give Thine angels charge over us to keep us in all our ways. O let the sorrowful sighing of them whom Thou hast visited come before Thee; and according to the greatness both of Thy power and mercy, preserve Thou them that are appointed to die, even for Jesus Christ's sake. Amen.

In case of the actual prevalence of Cholera the following is to be used instead of the preceding.

O God, merciful Father, who despisest not the sighing of a contrite heart, nor the desire of such as are sorrowful, mercifully assist our prayers which we make before Thee in all our troubles and adversities, whensoever they oppress us. Incline Thine ear O Lord, and hear; open Thine eyes and behold our desolation; and upon our repentance and humiliation remove Thy judgments from us; in wrath, remember mercy, and command the destroying angel to stay his hand and cease from smiting us. Take away the unwholesomeness of the air, and purify our dwellings with the breath of health and safety.

Thou hast promised that when Thou sendest a pestilence among a people, if that people humble themselves, and pray, and seek Thy presence, and turn from their wicked ways, Thou wilt hear in heaven and be merciful to their sin, and heal their land: O make good to us this gracious promise, and ease us of our afflictions; for behold we humble ourselves under Thy mighty hand; we bewail and lament our sinful lives past; and humbly beseech Thee to give us Thy assisting grace, that we may henceforth order our ways to please Thee. Then shall no contagion hurt us, but we shall live to praise Thy name; and all the world shall know that Thou art our God, and that Thy name is called upon by us. Hear us, O Lord, and be merciful unto us, even for Jesus Christ's sake, the righteous; to whom with Thee, and the blessed Spirit, be ascribed all honor and praise now and forever. Amen.

WISCONSIN.

During the past week our ears have been several times saluted with the merry notes of the new bell of the Episcopal Church in this place. The Church in which this bell is hung has just been completed, (with the exception of pews,) and is not only an ornament to the town, but a credit to the denomination by whom it has been erected. It is situated in a pleasant and commanding part of town—built of brick, in Gothic style, and sufficiently commodious for a large congregation. The weight of the bell is 800 lbs., and its notes are as clear and melodious as any we have ever heard. Mr. WILLIAMS, the pastor, we understand has been highly instrumental in the erection and completion of the Church, and we trust will be equally successful in inculcating the principles of Religion and Morality in the minds of his numerous hearers.—Mineral Point, Wisconsin, December 29, 1848.

ORDINATION.—On Sunday, Jan. 14th, Bishop McIlvaine held an ordination in Christ Church, Cincinnati, when the Rev. Dudley A. Tyng, deacon and minister of Trinity Church, Columbus, was admitted to the order of Presbyters. The sermon was preached by the Bishop, the Rev. Messrs. Blake and Dobb assisting in the prayers. The candidate was presented by the Rev. Mr. Blake.—Western Episcopalian.

CONFIRMATION.—Bishop DeLancey visited St. Paul's Church, Waterloo, on Sunday the 14th, and held a confirmation for the parish both morning and afternoon. Prayers and the confirmation preface were read by the Rev. David H. Macurdy, the Rector, on both occasions, and the Bishop preached and also addressed the candidates. In the morning eighteen persons were confirmed, and in the afternoon three persons, making in all twenty-one persons, including two from the congregation at Ovid. Large congregations attended these services. The Church has recently been painted on the outside, and oaked within, a handsome communion set procured, and the chancel neatly furnished with altar cloth, Bishop's chair and carpet. A collection, amounting to about thirteen dollars, was made for Domestic Missions.—Gospel Messenger.

Clerical Changes.

The Rev. J. M. Banister, having removed to Demopolis, Marengo county, Alabama, requests all letters and papers to be sent to him at that place.

The Rev. Wm. J. Zimmer has been received into the Diocese of Florida, by letters dimissory from the Rt. Rev. the Bishop of Alabama, and is Rector of Trinity Church, Apalachicola.

The Rev. Henry McVickar has also been received into the Diocese of Florida, by letters dimissory from the Ecclesiastical Authority of the Diocese of New York, and is serving St. Luke's Parish, Indiana.

Rev. Geo. G. Field, having removed to Holmesburgh, Philadelphia county, Pa., requests letters and papers to be addressed accordingly.

We regret to learn that the Rev. George H. Clarke, in consequence of a sudden and severe attack of illness, has resigned the rectorship of All Saints' Church, Worcester, where he has labored for the last two years, very acceptably and successfully, and with every prospect, under the divine blessing, of building up a vigorous parish in that growing city.

Mr. Clarke will pass the winter in Philadelphia, where his letters and papers will be directed.—Witness.

The Rev. Henry Stanley has resigned the parish of Christ Church, Lockport, and requests his letters and papers to be directed to Le Roy, Western New York.

THE BANISHMENT OF THE JEWS FROM SPAIN BY FERDINAND AND ISABELLA.*

The inquisition prevailed on the two sovereigns to sweep from the Spanish territory the whole profession of Jewish faith, regardless of national interest, and heedless of the ruin to be thus incurred by countless families, possessing loves and attachments which Roman ecclesiastics cannot value. "I am a man, and nothing human is alien to me," said the ancient heathen; "Rejoice with them that do rejoice, and weep with them that weep," said the Christian apostle; but the papal churchman, steeled by his vows and discipline, is ever ready to execute the most cruel resolutions.

No political calculation could have required this deed. The Jews were not like the Moors, in possession of ships and sea-ports, with friendly aid to summon from beyond the sea. There was not even the pretext of that correspondence with foreign foes which, at the close of the Gothic monarchy, had been deemed sufficient reason for consigning every Jew to slavery. It is, therefore, evident that no sovereign, not priest-led against his better knowledge, would have ejected a class of ancient subjects, so numerous and so valuable, to enrich other lands. The decree was signed March, 1492, that in four months every Jew, native or sojourner, should quit the realms of Aragon, Castile, and Granada, never more to return, under penalty of death and confiscation of goods; and the justice of the inquisition was denounced against all who should harbour or conceal a Jew after that time. All property might be carried with them, but not in the substance of gold or silver, or the other articles usually forbidden to be removed from Spain. Bills of exchange might be taken instead of plate, jewels, or coin. But this indulgence sounds better than was realized by the event; for, as the time approached for their departure, the property to be sold exceeded the demand, the most wary purchasers reserved their offers to the last extremity of the helpless victims, who then were glad, it is said, to barter a house for an ass, or a vineyard for a few yards of linen cloth. Many of the Jews abstained from selling, hoping to the last moment that some favourable change would intervene to prevent the final catastrophe. But they were deceived; for Torquemada, the inquisitor-general (whose extended titles Zurita rehearses with pompous delight,) hearing that the wealthiest Jews had attempted to divert the purpose of the court by a bribe of 600,000 crowns, Thomas Torquemada, like Thomas a Becket of old, rushed into the presence, and upbraided the sovereigns for their half-inclination to sell their Saviour to the Jews for pieces of silver. He issued an edict by his own authority, prohibiting all traffic with the Jews for term considerably within that of their banishment by the royal proclamation, and thus incalculably multiplied the losses to which they were previously liable. But, throughout the kingdom of Aragon, which included Valencia and Catalonia, where all Jews were vassals to the crown or to the ecclesiastical lordships, a general sequestration of their property was made by commissioners empowered to liquidate speedily all dues and debts that should be claimed, as well as all rents and taxes for the current year, and to hand over the remainder to the claimants of the property thus disposed of. The synagogues were, probably, accounted private property; and, therefore, their value could be rendered to no individuals, i. e., no Jews were entitled to claim their produce. They were generally converted into churches or convents; as, for instance, that of Merida into a church dedicated to Sta. Catalina, virgin and martyr. It is easy to perceive how open this sequestration lay to extensive speculation; yet it was, probably, more advantageous than private sales at random.

As the term drew near, the ascendant party must have regarded the harassed Jew with such a burning intensity of assured victory as the hawk feels while fluttering fixedly above his prey. The resource of baptism remained; subject, however, to the vigilance of the holy office; and many yielded to the powerful temptation; but the end of July saw multitudes of noble-minded Israelites forsake their homes, their fathers' graves, and all their old associations of infancy and ancestry, to wander they knew not whither, with a dignified triumph of passive courage. Zurita reckons their number at 170,000; Cardoso, at 120,000; Miguel de Barrios and Mariana, at 800,000; and it is said that, notwithstanding all their losses in the breaking up of their property, they carried off thirty million ducats.

Abarbanel's narration, in his preface to the books of Kings, deserves attention and sympathy: "When the royal proclamation was announced I was at court, and wearied myself to frenzy in imploring compassion. Thrice on my knees I besought the king: 'Regard us, O king! Use not thy subjects with so much cruelty: rather exact from us our gold and silver vessels, or abundant gifts, even all that every Jew possesses, if he may still abide in his country.' I entreated likewise my friends, the king's officers, to allay his indignation against my people. I implored the councillors to advise the king, each in his turn, to recall the decree. But, as the adder closes her ear with dust against the voice of the charmer, so the king hardened his heart against the prayers of his suppliants, and declared that he would not revoke his edict to gain all the wealth of all the Jews. At his right hand was the queen, the Jews' enemy, urging him with an angry voice to pursue what he had so happily commenced. We exhausted all our power for the removal of the king's sentence; but there was no wisdom nor help remaining. Our nation, wherever the decree had been proclaimed, or its fame had spread, bewailed their condition with a great wailing. Tossed in these fearful billows, they exhorted and confirmed the minds of each other. Whatever befalls, let us surmount every calamity, for the honour of our nation and our religion, by a brave endurance: let us defend these from the hateful persecutors. If they leave us our life, we will live: if they take it from us, we will die; but never let us violate our holy law, the fullness of our affections, or the counsel of wisdom. O rather (and may God turn it all to good) let us abandon our settlements; and seek for homes elsewhere. Thus excited, there departed in one day 300,000 on foot and unarmed, collected from every province, the young and the old, infants and women, all ready to go in any direction. Of that number was I; and, with God for our leader, we set out."

Those of Castile took refuge in Portugal—about 20,000 families, according to Conestaggio; where they were admitted on the payment of eight gold ducats for each person, children at the breast excepted, but with the stipulation of becoming slaves if found in the country after a stated day. Artificers in brass or iron were admitted at four ducats each, and invited to remain in Portugal. The frontiers were lined with tax-gatherers for the occasion; and the royal treasure must have become rapidly augmented.

Those of the northern provinces fled to Navarre, or took shipping for strange countries. The ports of Cadiz, Sta. Maria, Carthage, Valencia, and Barcelona, were thronged with suppliants for leave to embark, at any price, for Morocco, Italy, or Greece, since the death and confiscation were behind them. Their sufferings during these voyages, at the mercy of the vilest of mercenary ship-masters, are horrible to recount. After exacting large sums for the passage, some burned or wrecked their vessels while at sea, escaping themselves in their boats, and carrying off the goods of the Jews. Others starved their victims, and, when famine induced fever or the plague, put them ashore to perish. One ship's crew were about to murder their Jewish passengers for the sake of their property, or, as they expressed it, to revenge the death of Jesus Christ; but a Christian merchant on board reminded them that Christ died to save men's lives, and therefore his death was a blessing to the world. So the Jews were only carried to a barren coast, and left entirely naked on the beach. There they found a spring of fresh water; but in climbing the rocks by night, to look for tokens of human habitations, several of them were seized and devoured by lions. Five days they abode there; till the crew of a passing ship, perceiving naked people on the shore, brought them on board, provided shifts for the women, and tore up old sails to clothe the men. They gave them food, and conveyed them to a certain port, where, when the inhabitants inquired if he had slaves for sale, the ship-master nobly answered, "No!" but delivered the poor Jews to their brethren in the city, on payment of reasonable expenses. These gladly made him an additional present, "praying God for his safety, and that he would prolong his life to a happy old age."

Those who arrived at Fez were so numerous that the inhabitants shut the gates against them, leaving the Jews exposed to the African July sun in the open plain, with no food but the small quantity of grass which at that season could be found; and, as they died, the survivors were too much enfeebled to bury their relatives. Some sold their children for bread; but after a time the king obtained supplies of food, which he freely distributed, and restored their children without ransom.

At Salée, the crew of a large ship enticed the starving Jewish children on board, to the number of 150, with pieces of bread, and then sailed away. The mothers ran screaming along the beach, imploring compassion, but in vain: their children were conveyed to a distant African port, and sold into slavery.

Amid such distressing events various anecdotes are given of personal suffering and constancy, peculiarly Jewish. Some victims were discharged from a ship on a desolate island, on the plea of pestilence. Of these some died of hunger: others, with more strength, walked forward to search for a human habitation. One of the latter had a wife and two infants; the wife died of fatigue, and himself fainted. On recovering, he found his two babes already dead; but even in this extremity he cried aloud his firm resolve to live and die in the Mosaic religion. Then, gathering up sand and gravel, he heaped a pile above his head, and hasted to rejoin his fellow-sufferers, who had, meanwhile, gained some distance before him; "for, at the brink of death, every one cares for himself, and not for another." One mother was known to snatch up a large stone, as her infant son lay in the agony of death, and strike him on the head till he died, herself expiring almost immediately, from the exertion she had used. And it is boasted that, during the famine, in the fields before Fez, the Jews refrained from even seeking grass or roots upon the sabbath-day. A breaking up of family connexions must have taken place to a great extent. After some time there settled in Barbary a company of 200 widows, some of whom knew their husbands to be dead, but, having no children, were bound to marry their husbands' brothers, and, as these could not be found, were precluded from marrying again. Others had missed their husbands, but could not be assured of their death, and were thus unable to marry. These, all uniting their sympathies and little property, reached Salée, and dwelt all together, labouring diligently with their hands, and setting apart all the earnings above their own moderate expenditure, for the purpose of religion and education.

Of the Jews who directed their course to Christian countries, nine caravels full arrived at Naples, already infected with disease, arising from the hardships and privations of the voyage. This pestilence was communicated to the city, and carried off 20,000 inhabitants. Others repaired to Genoa during a famine there. The citizens allowed them to land, but met them with bread in one hand and a crucifix in the other, to intimate that baptism was to be the price of appeasing their hunger. Many, instead of disembarking at Genoa, proceeded to Rome; at which influx the Jews of the Ghetto were so much alarmed that they offered the pope a bribe of a thousand ducats that he should prohibit the arrival of the strangers. Alexander was justly indignant at such a proposal, not only inhuman, but especially

* The account, which we have extracted from the Rev. W. Ayerst's "Jews of the Nineteenth Century," of the expulsion of the Jews from the Peninsula, was compiled by Mr. Finn in his "Sephardim," a work of peculiar interest. Most forcibly in narratives of this kind do we find the scripture truth illustrated, that disaster is sure to attend those that persecute God's ancient people, while they shall prosper that love Jerusalem.—Ed.

contrary to the usual fraternal spirit of Jews, and threatened to eject them to make room for the unfortunate exiles: to avert which disaster the Roman Jews received their brethren, and presented the pontiff with two thousand ducats.

It is presumption in mortal man, with his limited knowledge, to judge the dispensations of Almighty Providence in individual cases, since the anomalies of this world are frequently left to be rectified by a future retribution; but nations, as such, have no after existence; and God's dealings may be accurately traced in them. Speedily after the expatriation of the Jews, and during the hottest reign of the inquisition, the vaunted royal descent, in both Spain and Portugal, became extinct; and in the former of these, a succession of mad or idiotic sovereigns has tended greatly to make monarchy itself a laughing-stock for the infidel and the republican. Reverses in connected sequence have shown the hollowness of that empire upon whose territories the sun could not set. The colonies, one by one, have vanished: Naples and the Netherlands have been lost: the population of the peninsula, which in the ninth century was forty millions, is now reduced to between ten and eleven millions; that of Toledo is dwindled from two hundred thousand to twenty thousand: the national politics are distracted between the democracy, with its fierce Tragala, and the bigotry of the middle-age Camarillas; each party so lately rivalling the other in cold unflinching butchery: the realm is bankrupt, without a navy, and left naked to her enemies, a reproach for every passer-by.

But national judgments are equally visible in the sufferings of the Jews; and the exile from Spain was a repetition of that from Palestine: "Weep ye not for the dead, neither bemoan him; but weep sore for him that goeth away; for he shall return no more, nor see his native country."—Church of Eng. Magazine.

We make the following extracts from a history of "the Great Epidemic" found in the Church of England Magazine. They are worthy of attention as giving practical hints, by a Physician in reference to the precaution to be adopted by those exposed to this disease.

I am compelled, however, to make these incidental observations, interesting though their nature is, as brief as possible, to make room for a few general remarks in conclusion, upon the character and habits of this desolating epidemic; and in these lie sources of encouragement which its previous history would scarce allow us to suppose. One of the most blessed assurances respecting it, which have yet appeared, is the fact that cholera is not contagious. It is true, in places peculiarly circumstanced, the poison may accumulate in an excessive degree, and that persons who might otherwise escape, if collected together in such places, would most probably be infected with the disease. But ordinarily there is no risk of its communication from person to person. The relatives and friends of the sick ought not to leave them therefore, and may remain and pay them the most assiduous attention, without fear of personal infection. Thus all quarantine rules, with the ruin-doing effects; all sanitary cordons, and such like regulations, intended to shut out or in, are worse than useless. In Russia it was actually found that no sooner were they all abolished than the disease assumed a milder type, owing undoubtedly to the resumption of ordinary business and the employ of many who were rendered wholly destitute by these abominable restrictions. Another equally merciful truth is that cholera does not come without warning. The unusual prevalence of diarrhoea and dysentery is its warning to a nation; and to an individual it generally gives notice of its approach by a looseness of the bowels, often without particular pain, for a variable period before the overwhelming attack ensues. A third cause of comfort is that, if taken in time, that is, if the premonitory symptom of painless diarrhoea is promptly attended to, cholera is curable. If, however, this invaluable opportunity is lost, the case then assumes a far more serious aspect, and the terrible chain of symptoms, which have rendered it the universal fear of mankind, comes into action. It is now also well ascertained that there are certain causes of an obviably kind, which powerfully predispose individuals to the disease. Moisture and filth are the most energetic of these. In the village of Hill-head, in the north, cholera was exclusively confined to some miserable houses of weavers, fronting the canal. In Sunderland it broke out in a damp reeking spot, called the Shore, near the river; and it has particularly struck me, while marking the progress of the present pestilence, to note how cholera when it enters a country generally first picks out its victims by the river-side. The unhappy convict-ship, the "Justitia," at Woolwich, moored opposite an open sewer-mouth, first, and for some time exclusively, felt the force of the disease. Drunkenness is another powerful predisposer. Long will the inhabitants of Gateshead, in the north, remember the dealings of cholera with their fellow-townsmen. It was at Christmas-time; and many made this season of Christian joy a period for the deepest dissipation and debauch. The laughter was soon turned into mourning; for cholera came upon them at their festivities; and the most fearful mortality took place, principally among the hard drinkers and intemperate eaters. It seemed as if, without a previous warning, cholera burst upon them like a thunder-shower, or like a pent-up stream. Negligence as to personal cleanliness is also among this class of agencies; thus it was said of the Jews at Berlin, that, although their domestic arrangements were not so good as those of the other inhabitants of the city, yet, in consequence of their strict attention to personal ablutions, out of 2,000 deaths by cholera, not one was that of a Jew. It must however be stated that in other cities a counter-statement has been made as to the prevalence of the disease in the Jewish quarters. Excessive fear, by its debilitating influence upon the body, undoubtedly predisposes to cholera; when the disease raged on the continent in 1831, such was the excessive alarm into which some were cast, that they even died of fear. This was remarkably exemplified also in the case of two regiments of soldiers. The surgeons and commanding-officers of one were strong contagionists, and were so indiscreet as to tell their men that the terrible malady was infectious: the same authorities of another were, on the contrary, convinced of the non-contagiousness of the disease, and assured their men that it was not so. What was the result? Cholera came upon both regiments; the one full of terror and anxiety; the other calm, and ready to meet the invader. The fatality was altogether enormous in the first case, and very trifling in the second. Negligence as to domestic cleanliness, ventilation, drainage, &c. must also be considered a most weighty cause of predisposition. Intemperance in food, and the use of improper food, insufficient clothing and food, exposure to wet and cold, and late hours, are all in the same category.

These causes are, as I have said, all of them more or less obviably, and if studiously avoided, put us in possession of a defence more or less sure against the inroad of the malady. Believing that it falls quite within my scope* to offer a few words of advice on this important topic, I may venture to suggest them under the following heads:

1. The House.—The drains should be well attended to, all effluvia done away with, the apartments clean, dry, often ventilated, occasionally heated by a fire, and fresh air allowed to flow through all the rooms in appropriate weather.

2. The Person.—Cleanliness, occasional warm bathing, friction with flannel, the use of flannel next the skin, waterproof shoes moderate exercise, and a flannel belt round the waist and stomach.

3. The Diet.—Plain meat, well-boiled potatoes, rice, bread a day or two old, form the best articles of food. Acid drinks, ardent spirits in excess, bad beer, salt meat, fish, green vegetables, pickles, &c., are to be avoided.

These form the proper measures of precaution, upon the use of which the divine blessing may be expected to follow. I would urge also most emphatically that the most trifling looseness of the bowels should be instantly attended to, no matter how slight the attack may appear to be; and it has been recommended by the highest authorities in the country that a little store of proper medicine should be kept ready for administration immediately this warning makes its appearance. This of course is best procured from the medical attendant of a family. Sometimes the symptoms assume rapidly an excessive severity, cramps and coldness occurring, with violent alvine discharges: in such cases instantly send for a medical practitioner, put the person into bed in hot blankets, lay a large mustard-poultice over the stomach and bowels, put bags of hot salt along the spine, and bottles of hot water to the feet, rub the extremities with the hands vigorously, and give every half hour, until medical aid arrives, a dessert spoonful of brandy in some hot water, or half that quantity of sal volatile in the same medium.

Lastly, something has been seen of the consequences of excessive fear. Let us possess our souls in patience. Resting on that sure foundation, a well-grounded Christian confidence, we can look without dismay to the invasion of the disease, and may venture to appropriate the promise of the covenant with the people of God: "It shall not come nigh thee."

CONSTANTINOPLE.

REPORT OF RT. REV. HORATIO SOUTHGATE, D. D.

June 29th.—Visited the school of —, one of the most important and most flourishing institutions among the Armenians. It was founded a few years ago by a society of men who wished to obtain for their children advantages which were not to be found in the nation. It was supported by pledged monthly contributions, and continues to be sustained, in part, in that way. But since its enlargement, it has also received aid from the national treasury, that is, the common fund of the Armenian nation. It is in advance of every other institution, (excepting, perhaps, one,) among the Armenians. It has teachers in Geography, Astronomy, Drawing, Algebra, Geometry, and other branches hitherto almost unknown in Armenian schools. It has also a teacher of English, and in this it is peculiar, being the only Armenian school in Turkey, within my knowledge, that has one. It was founded upon enlarged and liberal principles, which made it an object of interest to me, and it has been freely aided from the Mission, especially in the English department. The books which have been given to it have been of a decidedly religious or sound moral character, and it has also received various text books and instruments necessary to such an institution. The last student whom I admitted under my own care, was one who had finished the prescribed course in the English department in this school, and was the first in his class. Others have been offered, whom I cannot at present take; and I have the promise of the choicest scholars, or as many of them as I require, who have gone through a preparatory course in this institution. This will give me a constant supply of minds already somewhat advanced, and of the best minds in the nation. There are now about 450 boys in the school, of whom thirty are in the English department. I examined the latter in their studies to-day, and found that their progress had been very satisfactory since my last visit.

I took the opportunity of my being in the city to visit some of my native friends, and saw and conversed with a considerable number of the clergy and laity. It would be impossible to detail such conversations at length. Suffice it to say, that the kindness and confidence with which I was everywhere received, and the freedom with which religious topics were introduced, convinced me more than ever of the importance of this kind of labor, and of the facility with which it may be conducted. I find no difficulty in discussing even subjects of difference; nor have I ever found an Eastern brother alienated by such discussions, when they have been conducted in a spirit of love, and a just allowance of his position as a member of Christ's church.

July 1st.—Received a visit from two members of the Armenian Congregational Sect, one of them a "church-member" in that sect. I should not have noticed an event of this nature, if it did not give me an opportunity of saying something which I have desired to say upon this new schism in one of the Oriental churches—and I say it the rather because I have no intention of alluding farther to this denomination.

I feel that I can now, after the time that has elapsed, look dispassionately upon that event which has rent a (so called) "Protestant" fraction from one of the Eastern churches. I still lament it, but not with the same unmingled feeling as at first. I have no doubt that its tendency is evil, and that it has already done more to promote infidelity than any one thing that has ever happened here. But, on the other hand, I think it may have a good effect on many. I think there are those who will be roused by it to greater activity of inquiry, who will not go the length of rationalistic vain-glory to which some seem to tend. I think there are others who will see the necessity of maintaining for the Eastern churches the most liberal position consistent with a holding of essential truth. This is all that will save those churches. If they attempt to enforce anything beyond, it will be fatal to them. There are many who see this. I think that the portions of truth which mingle with the errors of the new reformers will have their effect, and when joined with a proper knowledge of the church of Christ, will bring forth good fruit. The danger is, that this latter knowledge will not be attained, and if not attained, the work that is going on will be one of awful destruction to all true religion. Already infidelity is using this new-springing "Protestantism" as the shield of its own malicious designs. The cry of "liberality," and "freedom of thought," and "private judgment," is taken up and echoed by men who care no more for Protestantism than they do for Mahomedanism; and there are, I doubt not, a hundred such to one true Protestant. They will conquer the work and give it a new character; they will make it an essentially infidel work, and the result will be the wreck of all that is good—the overthrow of Eastern christianity, and the triumph of rationalism and unbelief. It needs no prophet's eye to foresee events already so clearly shadowed forth as these. Unless some conservative element comes in, there seems to be no hope. God grant that my worst fears may not be realized. It is in the trust that such a conservative element may be found and may prevail, that I do not see in the new schism a cause for unmingled regret. It may be overruled for good to the Eastern churches—an affliction sent in mercy. Time only will show.

July 8th.—A deputy from the Papal community in the interior came to me. He has been here several times for the purpose of urging me to take under my charge the people from whom he comes. They are about 20,000 in number. He says that they have cast off their subjection to Rome, and the Bishop who was over them has been compelled to leave the place. He was particularly anxious that I should send a priest to them immediately. This I could not do, as I had none to send. But I sent them some Prayer Books, which, I hear, have been well received. Efforts were made to induce them to become non-Episcopal Protestants, but they rejected them at once. They are now in a destitute condition; all the churches are shut, and there is no one to look after them. The most urgent entreaties have been made to me in their behalf, but I have nothing wherewith to answer them. My funds for this quarter have not yet arrived. A large portion of what was due for the last quarter is not come; and I have no certainty that all of either will ever be received—so that I cannot even make a promise with any security of being able to perform it. For the same reason, I have been compelled to decline receiving another student, who has been offered to me to-day—a young man of high promise, and one in whom I was specially interested, as being a member of the community just mentioned. I have hoped, if I could educate him, that I might send him back as a Missionary to his people, and his own entreaties for education, with this object in view, were such as I could hardly resist. But I was compelled to resist them, and positively to decline receiving him. I should not have done this if I had had my funds in hand for this quarter, as in all former years. Now I have them not, and I would not assure the young man his daily bread. If I should receive him, I must speedily dismiss him again, unless I obtain my appropriation for the quarter. Of this, I have no security whatever. In saying these things, I have no complaint to make. The church is at liberty to adopt what system she pleases. I wish only to present such of the leading facts in the history of my mission as I can embrace in a report, whether they be prosperous or adverse. The church will judge of them as she sees best; and I, for one, shall not repine at her decision, however afflicting it may be.

July 12th.—I have been so fortunate as to find a good translator from English into Greek—a rare thing here—and have put into his hands the Treatise on the Anglican Church for translation into the latter language. That in Armenian has now been some months in circulation, during which time, nearly a thousand copies have been distributed. Numbers have gone into the interior, and in every quarter whence I have heard of it, the reception has been gratifying in the extreme. That it has been useful, I have the most abundant testimony from many. The Greek translations will be made from a revised copy, which I am now preparing, and which I intend shall be somewhat larger, and more exactly adapted to circulation among the Greeks. For this purpose, the whole treatise will be re-written, and some points amplified and some reduced, the substance of the work remaining the same.

July 16th, 4th Sunday after Trinity.—My religious services on Sunday were suspended last spring on account of ill-health. I resumed them afterwards only for my family and students, and have so continued them since. Occasionally, however, native visitors are present, and at such times I ordinarily repeat the substance of my sermon in Turkish. This has been the case to-day, and often before, but it is sufficient for once, to allude to the practice. The most effectual preaching, is that which is addressed to the individual in private conversation, and this I have found the most durable in its impressions. I have greatly to regret that the shortness of my means prevents that degree of intercourse with nations which I formerly kept up at a distance from home, and obliges me to be very sparing, even of the comparatively trifling expense to which that intercourse subjected me—I mean the expense of caiques and other modes of conveyance.

July 18th.—Was pleased to hear from a correspondent that the translation of the Prayer Book into ancient Armenian, was going on at Madras, in India. It is in the hands of an Armenian gentleman, a native of that country, and I have no doubt will be eminently useful, especially among the more enlightened of the clergy, and Armenian scholars, generally. The translation made here is in modern Armenian, as better adapted to the common understanding of the people; but there can be no question that the ancient language is best suited to the expression of theological terms, and to the exact definitions which such a work requires, for it is the language in which most of the religious literature of the Armenians exists. I am, therefore, rejoiced to hear that another has undertaken a version of the liturgy in the ancient tongue, and that he is, as there is good reason to believe, thoroughly competent to the task. His letters show an earnest zeal for the spiritual welfare of his countrymen.

GOSPEL TRUTH, AND PRIMITIVE ECCLESIASTICAL ORDER.

SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 3, 1849.

WHAT WILL THE CHURCH DO FOR CALIFORNIA?—Although we fear many of our readers may be weary of the very sight of this name, the importance of the view, in which we would present it to them, is our apology for bringing it before them. Indeed it must be refreshing to see this name in any other connection than its usual association with gold. Every new fact which comes to light shows the great importance of doing something for the spiritual condition of this country, to rescue it from blind idolatry. This noble country, rich in the bountiful gifts of God, runs fearful risk of becoming a land wholly given up to the service and worship of Mammon. The communication appended is from "The Calendar." We fully agree with "C" that no time should be lost in theorizing. "Practical plans are what we want." But, then, practice must grow out of theory, and it is necessary to bring a subject before the public mind, and urge men to think before you can get them to act. Sober thought must ever precede wise action. We were therefore not hasty in proposing any "practical plans," though a correspondent "W. J. C." in the Banner of January 6th, proposed a plan of action.

We would add to the suggestion of "C" a plan which will not interfere with the one he sets forth.

Let committees be formed in each of our larger cities, to correspond with each other and with the Bishops of Dioceses and Rectors of Parishes, with a view to secure a general action upon the proposed collection for Whitsunday. With the consent of the Bishop public meetings may be called, and the subject fully presented for consideration. We do not think with "C" that the settlers in California would support the Mission. They "cannot serve God and Mammon." We think the means should first be provided. The feeling and interest excited in doing this, will secure the men. A Central Committee should be formed either in Philadelphia or New York, and a Treasurer appointed whose position and character will ensure confidence.

An effort of this kind shall be made in Philadelphia, to prove that so far as the Banner has spoken in this matter, it has been governed by a firm resolve to act when the time for doing came.

We add the article from the Calendar.

MISSION TO CALIFORNIA.

It is evident that something must be done for California, and that without delay. The NASHOTAH PLAN is the only one to be thought of, and in order to suggest one mode of starting it, I beg leave to present the following.

1. Let the Bishop of Connecticut, as the Senior Bishop, East of the mountains, (if he would) consent to receive proposals from any presbyters and deacons of the Church, or candidates for orders, who may be willing to go.

2. Let him, when he has received proposals from a sufficient number of competent men, announce it to the Church, name a Treasurer in New York, or Hartford, and request contributions, in money, prayer-books, &c.

3. Let all lovers of the Church, and of men's souls, begin to offer daily in their families and closets, a prayer that God would raise up the men, and supply the means.

I have faith to believe, Mr. Editor, that we shall not wait long for an answer to our prayers.

The mission in California, would be supported, I think, by the settlers; but a considerable outfit would certainly be required. A pious layman to whom I mentioned this project, immediately offered to give $100, and now stands pledged for it. I look for many similar offerings.

Let us lose no time. If the Mission goes out now, it will gain a foothold, before the next General Convention, and the formation of the first diocese on the Pacific coast will be comparatively easy. I beg all the Church papers to favor this proposal, or to suggest a better one. But let us lose no time theorizing. Practical plans are what we want.

BISHOP DOANE.—The Bishop, we are happy to say, is again recovering from his serious illness. It is hoped that, with care, he will soon be entirely restored to his former health. The thankfulness of his friends, for this new instance of God's mercy, will be proportioned to the greatness of their fears.

THE FOREIGN PAPERS, by the Canada, have reached us so late that we cannot give any intelligence from them this week. They contain nothing, however, of immediate interest to our readers.

THE LADIES' DEPOSITORY, No. 289 Chesnut st. above Ninth.

We have received the sixteenth annual Report of the Board of Managers of this charitable and excellent institution. We esteem the object of this charity a most important one, commending itself to every benevolent mind. In the sad reverses of fortune, of such common experience in this changeable life, many, unaccustomed to labor, are reduced to the necessity of earning a support by the work of their hands. Such persons find it difficult or impossible to dispose of the products of their industry, without being exposed to evils from which the sensitive mind of a lady naturally shrinks. The Ladies' Depository is intended to supply a place of sale for the work of those who are obliged thus to earn their livelihood. It encourages industry, it does not, like too many charitable institutions, foster idleness and give premiums to indolence. The Report before us shows that this Society has been managed with efficiency, and has accomplished much good.

"The Sixteenth Annual Report will exhibit the following statement of Deposits, Sales and Discount. The amount of work entered in 1848, is $4,770 26; Sales, $7,308 39; Discount, $438 38."

We are sorry, however, to learn that "the gradual decrease in the subscription list has caused some anxiety in the minds of the Managers, lest their means should not meet their expenses; but they are unwilling to believe that an institution relieving so much distress, should be suffered to languish for the want of a few more names to augment their annual receipts, or of benevolent employers for the willing hands that would fain earn their bread. Most happy would the Managers be to have it in their power to dispel any feeling of prejudice which they have reason to believe deters many persons from bestowing that patronage on the Society, which is essential to its existence. The Managers have always endeavored faithfully to do their duty, and to secure the interests of the Depositors, while they see that justice is done to the public. Could the community know all the difficulties to be surmounted in a judicious management of the Ladies' Depository, they would pause before pronouncing a hasty judgment, nor suffer any feeling of personal dissatisfaction, to deter them from affording whatever aid they may have in their power to bestow."

We are sure there must be difficulties of a practical kind in the management of such an institution to the satisfaction of all concerned. But the Ladies, who are engaged in this good work, whose names are given in this Report, afford sufficient warrant that the affairs of the Depository are managed with judgment and strict impartiality. We trust that they may receive that aid and encouragement which their benevolent object deserves, and that the means may be furnished to them for enlarging the sphere of their charitable operations. A day may come when those who now have the means of aiding this charity, shall derive in return present benefit from it. And even should that not happen, they will have the present satisfaction of relieving the most trying kind of want, and the future blessing which shall attend upon every deed of mercy.

The following extract presents a subject of great practical importance for the consideration of Parishes. It is a matter equally worthy the attention of city and country parishes. In the country it is often almost impossible for a clergyman to obtain a house, at a suitable rent, and in a convenient situation. In Philadelphia there are but two or three parishes in which there are parsonages. The inconveniences resulting every clergyman can attest. The benefits arising from this wise provision are so well stated by Dr. Gregory that we need only ask attention to his judicious remarks.

IMPORTANCE OF A PARSONAGE.

BY THE REV. H. GREGORY, D. D.

There is another subject to which I am the more willing to ask attention in this address, because I do but express the sentiments of the Vestry, and, I doubt not, of many others also. The importance of a Parsonage to every parish is questioned by none. The considerations in its favor are so numerous and weighty, that every congregation may be presumed to be only waiting a favorable opportunity to secure a permanent residence for their Rector.

1. It saves the trouble, embarrassment, and expense that attend frequent removal. The occupant of a "hired house" is seldom stationary "two whole years."

2. A Church without a Parsonage is incomplete—is solitary. The Parsonage gives it life. It seems to say, "The servant of God's altar is at hand, and ready for his Master's work."

3. It speaks well for the congregation. It is better in their behalf than "letters of commendation." It is a token that they look for permanence in the Pastoral relation.

4. It is important as a centre of hospitality and Christian intercourse;—to the Rector—for the liberality which provided him a home, admonishes him that he especially should be "given to hospitality;"—to the parishioners—for it is theirs in which to seek the counsel of their best friend; theirs in which to come together on those occasions when Pastor and people meet to express and strengthen mutual good will; theirs in which to provide that he who is to them a "steward of the mysteries of God," may also be

"Eyes to the blind, and to the lame Feet, and to sinners wholesome blame, To starving bodies food and fame."

5. In parishes where the Church seats are free a Parsonage is doubly important. If the worship is maintained by voluntary offerings, the income will be, to some extent, uncertain. The Parsonage serves as an endowment, and diminishes that uncertainty.—Gospel Am.

RUBRICAL AND CANONICAL QUESTIONS.—Having been favored lately with several inquiries on points of this kind, we are disposed to allow some of our correspondents, more learned and experienced in these matters, an opportunity of expressing their opinions. In a case of this kind which follows, we should feel great hesitation in pronouncing a judgment where our learned and experienced correspondent is in doubt. We hope the question will secure the attention of some competent expositor. We esteem such questions as especially useful matters for discussion in our Church Journals.

For the Banner of the Cross.

REV. AND DEAR SIR:

I desire, with your permission, to avail myself of the services of your new and handsome types,—and handsome they must be, if "handsome is that handsome does," yea, of most impressive beauty both to the eye and to the mind,—to make an inquiry touching the extent of the jurisdiction of a Standing Committee, when, for the time being, said Committee is the "ecclesiastical authority" of a diocese. This inquiry, the nature and bearing of which will appear as I proceed, I make with a view of eliciting the opinion of some of your correspondents, learned in the law ecclesiastical, on a point concerning which a valued friend at a distance, and myself, have had some correspondence. Does the "ecclesiastical authority" conceded to a Standing Committee, embrace the duties and powers of "the Ordinary?" Has that body jurisdiction in the case of a repulsion from the Holy Communion, and can it act on the required notice from the minister who repels, and on the appeal of the person repelled? The Committee is composed, in most instances, of clergymen and laymen. Are laymen authorized according to the principles and practice of our branch of the Church, to act and decide in a case, which involves the privation of a spiritual privilege, conferred originally, and of necessity, by a spiritual person,—spiritual in an official sense—and continue or restore this purely spiritual privilege? Have the clerical members of a Standing Committee, who, in the case of receiving and instituting an inquiry into an accusation against a minister, preliminary to a trial, are by Canon xxxvii. sec. 2, of 1832, separated from the lay-members thereof, and invested with exclusive cognizance and action in the premises; have they any more jurisdiction and authority, in the instance alluded to, than the others? If they have, whence do they derive the same? Do they derive it from any just construction of said Canon? The law of our Church prescribes in general terms the extent of the jurisdiction and powers of a Standing Committee, under the circumstances supposed; (Canon iv. sec. 3, of 1832.) That law is, "Where there is no Bishop, the Standing Committee is the ecclesiastical authority for all purposes declared in these Canons." But are the duty and powers of "the Ordinary" among these purposes, and so declared expressly or constructively in any part of the paramount law of the Church, the Canons of the General Convention? Does not Canon xlii. sec. 2, of 1832, in relation to a repelling from the communion, define who "the Ordinary" is, in all cases under our ecclesiastical regimen, in the words "that is, the Bishop," and so define as to limit the powers of "the Ordinary" to the Episcopal office, and virtually and effectually inhibit the exercise of such powers by a Standing Committee, when it is the ecclesiastical authority, for the time being, for other purposes; and even by the clerical members of the Committee? To my mind, the exercise of such powers by a Standing Committee, under our ecclesiastical organization, would be an assumption of authority which the Canons do in no respect sanction. The provisional Bishop of a diocese, so circumstanced, or the Bishop temporarily performing Episcopal duties therein, is "the Ordinary" for that diocese, and not the Standing Committee, or any portion thereof. If such Bishop is not, then, if the case supposed occur, it is a case for which there is no canonical provision; and though a serious defect and grievance, it cannot be remedied, and must be submitted to, until there shall be further legislation in the matter.

Rev. G. Upfold D.D.

OCCURRENCE OF A FESTIVAL ON FRIDAY.—B. A. is informed that the case he presents seems to us one decided by the Rubric. In the table of Fast days are designated "All the Fridays in the year except Christmas day." The question is whether the Church's idea of an ordinary Festival would prevent the concurrent observance of a Fast? We think not. Friday comes under these "days of Fasting; on which the Church requires such a Measure of Abstinence as is more especially suited to extraordinary Acts and Exercises of devotion." Does such a measure of abstinence prevent the observance with which the Church marks her Festivals? Surely not. The public services which only mark these Festivals may be quickened by the private observance of the Fast. So that we think both may be observed at one and the same time. The question of B. A. had reference to Friday, on which the Festival of the Purification occurs, but did not reach us in time for last week.

THE CHURCHMAN has not reached us for the last two weeks, before Monday. There are some papers we are willing to wait for, but as this is not the case with respect to the Churchman, we hope that it may not in future take from Thursday till Monday, to travel from New York to Philadelphia.

CHURCH OF THE REDEMPTION.—The Editor of the Banner acknowledges the receipt of $5 for the Church of the Redemption, from "a lady" of Pokeepsie. This amount has been handed over to a member of the vestry. It is pleasant to receive such tokens of interest from distant friends. Having officiated in this Church on Sunday evening last, we were pleased to see the large and attentive audience with which it was filled, we were more than ever impressed with the importance of this effort and with a sense of the zeal with which the faithful missionary has labored in it. We hope those who take an interest in the extension of our Church, will not fail to do their part in furthering this enterprise.

CHURCH SCHOOL.—We have great pleasure in calling attention to the advertisement of Mr. Keith's School. We consider it one of the most promising signs for the Church in Philadelphia, that schools of this kind are increasing, and we wish them all success, and we are sure there is abundant room for all.

Mr. Keith, from his long service as an assistant to Dr. Muhlenburgh, is eminently qualified for the work he has undertaken. He has, moreover, a love for his occupation, and seeks to inspire a similar feeling in the minds of his pupils. His skill in music enables him to make this a branch of education, and his scholars, even now, form a choir whose young voices are daily lifted up in the solemn chants of the Church. We have twice had the pleasure of listening to this pleasant harmony. At the same time an examination of the pupils proved that they were thoroughly instructed in their graver studies.

We feel great confidence in commending this school to the favorable regard of the members of the Church in this city.

NEW CHAPLAINCIES.—The United States Adjutant General, in accordance with an act of Congress, designated twenty military posts at which chaplains are to be employed, and for which applications may be made. The forts are:—Two in Oregon, not yet established; two in Texas, to be fixed by the commander of the third Military Division; a fort at El Paso; Fort Marey, at Santa Fe; at Monterey and San Francisco, in California; the principal recruiting station at New York; Fort Brooke, Florida; Fort Morgan, Alabama; Fort Washita, Red River; Fort Towson, Red River; Fort Gibson, Cherokee Nation; Fort Scott, Missouri frontier; Fort Leavenworth, Missouri; Fort Kearney, a new post at Grand Island on the Platte River; Jefferson Barracks, Missouri; Fort Snelling, at the Falls of St. Anthony, Iowa; and Fort Gaines, a new post at Crow Wing, on the upper Mississippi.

The chaplains will be required to perform the duties of school masters, their compensation being fixed at the time of their appointment, but not to exceed forty dollars per month, with quarters, fuel, and four rations per day. Applications should not be made to the Secretary of War, but to the commanding officers of the posts at which they are employed. The applicant must be recommended by the highest ecclesiastical authority of his communion. Christian Witness.

THE ADDRESS TO THE STUDENTS of the General Theological Seminary of the Protestant Episcopal Church in the United States, at the Annual Matriculation, on Ember Monday in Advent, 1848. By Benjamin I. Haight, D. D., Professor of Pastoral Theology and Pulpit Eloquence. New York: Daniel Dana, Jr., 20 John street. 1849.

The subject of this admirable Address is derived from Titus ii. 6. "Young men likewise exhort to be sober-minded." The Rev. Professor has wisely chosen a subject for the occasion of his Discourse. The subject and its Discussion are most appropriate for the times and for the instruction and counsel of those who are training for the Ministry of the Church.

As the most erroneous impressions prevail with regard to the character of the instructions given to the Students of the General Theological Seminary, we shall consider it our duty, as well as our privilege, to give this Address a place in our columns. Its wise, temperate, and judicious counsel, in keeping with the usual instructions of this noble Theological School, will show the kind of teaching here addressed to the pupil. And we are also sure that the Address, from the eloquence and force with which it presents most important practical truths, will prove interesting to our readers.

THE EVERGREEN, OR MONTHLY CHURCH OFFERING; a repository of religious, literary, and entertaining knowledge for the Christian Family. January, 1849. New York: George W. Mason, 161 Fulton street.

Since our notice in the last number of this periodical we have received the January number. It is greatly improved in appearance, and is published in a most attractive form. It has secured the services of able contributors, judging from the present number, and will, we are sure, be a most interesting and instructive periodical for "the Christian Family." The low price of subscription, $2 a year, and this is very moderate when each number contains a well executed engraving, brings it within the reach of those who have little to spare for such luxuries. Such periodicals if rightly conducted, may do good service for the Church, and as we are sure the Evergreen will be guided by true principles, we hope it will secure merited patronage.

THE NEW YORK ECCLESIOLOGIST.—We find in the last Churchman, the following note in reference to the article in this Periodical we alluded to last week.

January 22, 1849.

MR. EDITOR:

Through a mistake of the Printer, the article on "The Dedication of Churches," in the last Number of the New York Ecclesiologist, did not appear, as it should have done, in the form of a communication; though the fact of there being an editorial appended to it, sufficiently showed its character. On account of your commenting so particularly upon it, in your last week's paper, some of your readers may have been led to suppose that it was an editorial. Will you be kind enough to assert the contrary. An editor, as you well know, cannot be held accountable for every expression used by his correspondents.

With all respect,

THE EDITOR.

We well know that though editors ought not to "be held accountable for every expression of their correspondents," they are in truth subjected to such responsibility.

This number contains some very valuable articles, both original and selected. Among the former we consider the first three as deserving especial notice, on "Christian Art," "Form and arrangement of Churches," and "Architectural nomenclature." The second named, we propose to lay before our readers as it contains valuable hints, from one learned in such matters on a subject of no little importance.

The notices of new Churches are, for the most part, good. One or two we object to, on account of an occasional affectation of smartness, unsuited to the gravity of the subject, and a severity, which will be more likely to wound than to heal.

THE MERCERSBURGH REVIEW, JANUARY, 1849. Published by the Alumni Association of Marshall College, Mercersburgh, Pennsylvania. This is the first number of a Review, to be published bi-monthly, "devoted mainly to the discussion of Theological and Philosophical subjects." Its peculiar views are thus expressed—"In Theology and Philosophy, it will be the organ of the so-styled Mercersburgh system," a name not of its own seeking, but forced upon it from abroad, and as such, of necessity, will countenance neither Sectarianism nor a heartless Indifferentism, narrow Prejudice or Latitudinarianism. It is to be, we gather from this, an anti-ism-atic review. What the system is which it is to favor we know not, except by its geographical distinction as "the Mercersburgh." The master mind of this system, Dr. Nevin (with whom our readers are already acquainted,) seems to be a prominent contributor. Whatever then may be its views, we are sure they will be advocated with ability. We see in this number an article bearing his initials, on "true and false Protestantism," about which we may have something more to say.

A Dictionary of the German and English Languages: in two parts, German and English, and English and German. By G. J. Adler, A.M., Professor of the German Language, &c., in the University of the city of N. Y. Appleton & Co., 200 Broadway. Philadelphia, G. S. Appleton, 164 Chesnut st.

This volume requires but a short recommendation. It is the handsomest Dictionary we have seen; one of the most full, in point of matter, needful for the general student, and most completely arranged. To one who has studied this noblest of modern languages, with such dictionaries as the writer has used, such a book is more welcome than the gold diggings of California.

The literary public will not be slow in giving to the author and publishers all the gold and praise that their benefaction to the student calls for.

We only add, let the poor student, who cannot easily borrow five dollars, not set his eye upon this Dictionary; for he will be in danger of a temptation that may disturb his dreams, and perplex his waking thoughts. To the five dollar man we give no such caution.

FEMALE SCHOOL.

Will the Editor of the Banner permit a subscriber to invite the attention of his readers to the Boarding and Day School of Mrs. Price and Sister, in Arch street below Eleventh? It is situated in an open and healthy part of the city; the mansion is large and commodious; the instruction in all the branches of an English education, in Latin, French, Music, Drawing, Painting, and Needle work, thorough and complete; the best teachers in the city are employed; and of the excellent and indefatigable Principals, it may truly be said, that there are no persons to whose kind and generous care, parents, here or abroad, could entrust their children with a more perfect assurance that their wants would be amply provided for, and the utmost attention given to their moral and intellectual development. The writer, whose daughter is a pupil in the school, speaks with an entire conviction of what he says, and confers, in his judgment, a public benefit in thus directing attention to the establishment.

THE "FLAMING SWORD" AT EDEN.

MR. EDITOR:—

The great consequences of the crime of our first parents were—the knowledge of evil, which is of itself a contamination; the forfeiture of the Holy Spirit or the "image of God," which implies abandonment to depravity, and moral darkness, except as Christ at once intervened and the Spirit was at once again given to Adam and his whole offspring; and, with this death of the soul, the pains, maladies, decrepitude, and dissolution of the body; sorrow of all kinds and shades filling and overflowing the entire aggregation of ills. The less results of the fall were—the curse of the ground, so that it required severe labor for its fertility, which, by the perpetual competition to avoid it, brings like hardship into all business and employment; and expulsion from paradise, the spot which had been prepared for human comfort and happiness, to the cheerless and uncultivated world. When the first transgression was perpetrated, the sentence pronounced, and the Redeemer promised, the guilty pair were extruded from the favoured enclosure. And in the record of this event, there is a particular worthy of notice, not indeed as a basis of doctrine, but as affording a connected view of the occurrence, and an insight into the nature of religion at that early period. What is revealed plainly will authenticate the few constructions superadded. The record is brief: "So He drove out the man: and He placed at the east of the garden of Eden cherubims, and a FLAMING SWORD which turned every way, to keep the way of the tree of life."

As commonly understood, the passage declares that the Almighty, after expelling them from the garden of happiness, stationed angels there, with a threatening "sword" of fire, to prevent the return of Adam and Eve. There is nothing palpably wrong in this view, but it is not analogous with God's usual method of employing natural agents when they will suffice. Paradise might have been desolated by lightning and tempest, or by floods, or overrun with wild beasts, if the only object were to deprive man of it. Or, the "tree of life" might have been removed or destroyed. But that "tree," or what it typified, is always the grand possession for which mortals are to strive; those are "blessed who have a right to the tree of life," for it is "in the midst of the paradise of God." Adam therefore was not entirely and forever withheld from it. To eject him from the garden was proper, lest he should desecrate the tree; but to brandish a "sword" of terror, when his eye and faith and hope reverted to the forfeited blessing, would seem to imply that he was finally debarred from it and all that it signified. Why then was it retained in Eden? And why is its antitype in the "paradise" of the saints? If men may look forward to the reality, Adam might look back on the figure.

A better interpretation is, that Adam, when driven from the garden, was only deprived of immediate connexion with the "tree of life," not of the ultimate privilege; and that, to sustain his hope of this privilege, the Almighty placed "at the garden" the emblem of His peculiar presence; thus inviting or rather summoning him to worship where the forfeited tree would be continually in his remembrance, and perhaps in insight. The "flaming sword" was the Shechinah or symbol of the divine Presence, the Glory, a brilliant light flashing like a sword in rapid motion; in the shape, also, of a sword, as it afterwards resembled a lamp to Abraham, a common blaze to Moses in the bush, a column to Israel, a star to the "wise men," tongues on the day of Pentecost: the emblem resting above the "cherubims," and "keeping" or preserving "the way of the tree of life." Such is the view of able interpreters, as numbers of my readers fully understand.

"Cherubim" are commonly mentioned in scripture, perhaps always, as the bearers or attendants of the fiery symbol of Jehovah's Presence: thus, in Ezekiel, i. x., they come out of the midst of a fire and brightness and its investing cloud, the glory of the Lord; also, the glory or Shechinah removes from the cherub to the temple, and from the temple to the cherubim; again, in the vision of St. John, the four "beasts" or creatures were the cherubim about the throne of the heavenly Presence; again, in a Psalm, "He rode upon the cherubim," when coming to effect storms and tempest, and the clouds pass away at the "brightness" or bright symbol of His Presence; and yet again, in another psalm, "Thou that dwellest between the cherubim," which is repeated in five more scriptures. So invariably are the cherubim noted as servants of honour accompanying the Most High. Hence, in the tabernacle and temple, cherubic images were formed of the gold of the mercy-seat, the top of the ark in the holy of holies, and over them was the visible Presence. We are almost compelled, therefore, to admit that the "cherubims" at Eden prove that the "flaming sword" there exhibited was none other than the awful Symbol, the fiery token that "God was in that place." Nor were Adam and Eve unacquainted with the Shechinah; for "the Lord" had conversed with them in paradise, and had "walked in the garden in the cool of the day" of their transgression, on which latter occasion the guilty pair "hid themselves from the Presence of the Lord God."

The interpretation before us, then, conforms to the general function of the cherubim. It agrees likewise with the previous mercy of God, in not destroying Adam immediately, "in the day he ate," as He had threatened, and in providing also a Redeemer for him. It accords, moreover, with the universal tenor of the bible, that there is no "sword" between the sinner and the "tree of life," but that that tree, or the bliss which it represents, is to be earnestly sought, and if sought with true earnestness, will be attained by every one of the race of Adam. In this view, all is clear. Man is expelled from paradise, but not from the worship of his reconciled God; and the hallowed Symbol appears at the eastern border, that devotion and all sacred rites may be there rendered; for to come "before" this emblem is termed in scripture coming before the Lord, and that in peaceful duty. The exposition almost proves itself. And, instead of the incongruity that mighty angels are stationed to guard paradise from two weak mortals, we have an intimation of the worship still allowed to Adam, which intimation, with other hints, may be profitably expanded.

Paradise was an emblem of heaven. As the angels had their probation in the courts above, and there perform their adorations, innocent man had his trial and rendered his devout homage in the typical heaven—which of course could have been enlarged with the increasing and uncontaminated race—till, being adequately proved and confirmed in holiness, he was to “take of the tree of life, and eat, and live forever,” in the world actually celestial. The “tree of life” was the sacrament, the more than sacrament, the very bestowing of immortality.

Exclusion from the earthly paradise, and from the earthly “tree of life,” being final immediately after the fall, Adam could but hope to be taken to heaven after death, and to be there nourished in immortality by the celestial food which that tree only represented. And from this hope sprang his worship. He went before the Symbol, the Shechinah-Presence, and there offered his prayers and acknowledgments, imploring not only temporal favours, but immortal life and bliss, the eternal kindness of the Sovereign whom he had offended, but who still mercifully showed Himself on earth from between the “cherubims.” Standing in the unconsecrated world, the fallen man dares not come within the holy garden; as, in the levitical devotions, the people and even the priests never went into the inner sanctuary, which typified the supernal mansion of God, and where also He abode between the cherubim as at Eden; the high-priest only, representing the Messiah, having access there. The worship of Adam was changed from that of an innocent to that of a fallen but recoverable creature—the “tree of life,” the immortality it embodied, being still the object of his hopes, his labors, his prayers; and the “way” to that tree being “kept,” preserved, indicated, by the “sword”—resembling flame of the Shechinah. Thus doth the Almighty “devise means that His banished be not expelled from Him.”

Pursuing the holy record, we learn the great act of worship, or distinguishing rite, which immediately became essential, and continues essential through all time, in the homage of fallen man to his Maker—the ordinance of sacrifice, the perpetual representative oblation of the Victim for sin, the Redeemer whose atoning death is the restoration from the fall and the curse. The two eldest sons of Adam, and he likewise as a matter of course,* offered sacrifices; and they “brought” them “unto the Lord”; they “brought” them (the phrase explains itself) to the place of His Presence, to “the east of the garden of Eden”; they “brought” them, and offered them, before the Symbol that dwelt between the “cherubims.” And as that only of Abel was accepted, being an animal sacrifice and not the mere fruits of the earth, they all were taught as plainly as we are, that “without shedding of blood there is no remission of sin”; though they saw not, as clearly as we do, that the blood must be that of the Son of God, dissolving in agony, and expiring on the Cross.

Adam and all his, conscious of immortality and certified of it, and longing for the immortal bliss betokened by the “tree of life,” come before the tempered Glory of the Supreme, which in the heaven of heavens is “light which no man can approach unto,”—that tempered Glory however being “sword”-shaped in token of the divine anger at sin,—and, not daring to enter the consecrated enclosure, lift up the voice of their overburdened hearts, “God, be merciful to me a sinner.” But in thus declaring their misery, they forget not that God’s rectitude and honour are involved, that pardon and favour to the impure for their own sake and merit will disparage the Pure One, and therefore there must be a vindication provided in another Being, the Atonement for their guilt in the wondrous “Seed” of the woman. The sacrament of that only real Atonement they celebrate in the prefigurative ordinance, pouring out the blood that fore-shewed the blood of the Ransom of the world. What did the pious of that early day want of Christianity, except the name of Christ and His completed work? And how impressive is this added proof that in the midst of judgment God remembers mercy! Such indeed are all his dealings with us, short of the final sentence of perdition: chastisements are in love—tribulation worketh patience—trials are counted joy; and all this, because the invisible Presence is now ever with us, as the visible was always near the first reprieved offenders. The “tender mercies of our God are over all His works.”

Such was the primal religion of the lapsed world, whatever other forms may have been added; it was a pure faith and a beautiful worship. What disposition was made of the Presence-flame at Eden, as the multiplying family extended over the earth, concerns us not.† Nor do we know how long the antediluvian

* That Adam offered sacrifice appears to be sufficiently determined by inference from the fact that his sons did. An additional proof is the clothing of “skins” given to Adam and Eve by their Maker; inasmuch as, animal food not being yet allowed, the slaughter must have been sacrificial; and an adequate vegetable clothing could have been found, not only in “leaves,” but in matting formed of rushes, flags, and the like, or in these plaited or strung together at the ends, before fibrous textures were invented. A rude fabric of wool intermingled with rushes (warmth however was no more required than previously) would have served, till art improved it. The selection of “skins,” therefore, is every way remarkable, and evinces a further object than mere raiment; and sacrifice, the sole justification of taking life, is the only such object that can well be imagined. And thus they not merely offered the victim, but “put on” the victim, were clothed in his typical efficacy or merits,—a further anticipation of the gospel.

† “Cain went out from the Presence of the Lord” to a land “east of Eden.” This was a separation from the holy spot, and tending, with schismatic certainty, to further alienation. On the birth of a son to Seth, there was a rallying for the truth, evincing that the separation, now a large one, had compromised it; a palpable, a terrific falling away there must have been, local severance being merged in the conflict of principle, when “men began [in a broadly distinctive way] to call upon the Name of the Lord,” or, as in the margin, and with a sense yet more discriminative, “to call themselves by the Name of the Lord.” The separation, however, predominated. And, these “sons of God” intermarrying with the “daughters of men,” the ungodly multitude, the antediluvian world gave itself up to the threatened belief and ritual maintained its excellence. We are only informed that it yielded to the torrent of depravity which drew down the unsparing calamity of the flood.

Depravity, alas! Friendly reader, we have much to “overcome,” if we would do all that God requires and Christ deserves; we must be superior to a tempting world; we must vanquish our own rebellious hearts. But the reward is great. We shall recover what was forfeited by Adam; for the Spirit hath solemnly pledged to the faithful members of Christ, “To him that overcometh will I give to eat of the tree of life, which is in the midst of the paradise of God.”

CHANTING THE PSALTER.

MR. EDITOR:—

If neither you nor your readers are yet tired out with the discussion upon chanting the Psalter, I shall be glad if you will allow me to notice in your columns PRINCIPLE’S article contained in the Banner for this week, which I have just seen.

Referring to my extract from Bishop White, given in the Banner of Dec. 2d, and to my own and SACERDOS’ observations upon it, PRINCIPLE asks, “Does SACERDOS and W. M. read the extract referred to aright? * * I” (he continues) “understand the extract to show that Bishop White wished the rubrics so framed as ‘to give to the officiating minister the liberty to select psalms at his discretion;’ the Bishop then goes on to give his reasons for thus wishing, and concludes * * ‘Another consequence would be, that the number and length of the psalms depending on the choice of the minister, there would be great encouragement to the introduction of the practice of singing this part of the service.’ * *

“Bishop White offered a proposition that would, if adopted, bring about what SACERDOS labors to make us think does now exist. But ‘he thought’ the course he proposed would afford ‘great encouragement to the introduction of the practice of singing * * instead of the present of repeating the verses by the minister and the clerks (people) alternately.’ Was this proposition adopted? Not at all, (excepting Thanksgiving Day, as shown in my last communication.)”

PRINCIPLE, it seems, thinks that my extract from Bishop White only shows a wish on the part of the Bishop to have the rubrics so framed as “to give to the officiating minister the liberty to select psalms at his discretion, in order that, among other advantages, encouragement might be thereby given to the introduction of the practice of singing the Psalter. He therefore considers that as the Bishop’s proposition expressive of this wish was rejected, consequently with it was likewise rejected the liberty to introduce the practice in question.

I think there is defective logic in PRINCIPLE’S deduction. One reason why Bishop White wished his plan of reading the Psalter to be adopted, certainly was that thus “there would be great encouragement to the introduction of the practice of singing” (not of the permission to sing, please to observe,) “this part of the service.” Does it follow that because the House of Bishops rejected this plan of reading the Psalter, therefore they rejected the practice which Bishop White thought would be one advantage resulting from the adoption of the plan? I judge not. If PRINCIPLE holds to the contrary, what can he oppose to my taking the ground that the House of Bishops rejected the Bishop’s plan because they thought it would not be any greater encouragement to singing the Psalter, than the old system?

The truth is, there is nothing in the extract nor in the context from which it was taken to warrant the supposition that there was at the time any question under consideration, other than whether the minister should be required to read the daily Psalms in their old order, or should be left at liberty to choose portions from appointed selections, or according to his own discretion from any part of the Psalter. There is not a word or a hint of the consideration of any other point connected with this matter. The Bishop’s words are, “The* House of Bishops did not approve of the expedient of the other house, in relation to the selections as they now stand; to† be used at the discretion of the minister instead of the Psalms for the day. But Bishop Seabury interested himself in the subject the less, as knowing, that neither himself nor any of his clergy would make use of the alternative, but that they would adhere to the old practice. For the author’s part, he disliked the course taken.” (What course? Not the striking out from the rubric “said or sung” as PRINCIPLE suggests, but “in relation to the selections as they now stand;” viz. “to be used at the discretion of the minister, instead of the psalms for the day.” To say that the Bishop disliked the striking out “said or sung,” and that because prohibition was thus laid upon singing the Psalter, is a complete petitio principii.) Here follow the words quoted in the Banner of Dec. 2d. The subsequent remarks of the Bishop, further show that the discussion was only as above stated. “As to the selections made,” he says, “he considers some of the omissions of particular verses as capricious: and the selections in general as having added to the length of the morning and evening prayer, instead of shortening them.” This is a part of the account of what took place in the Convention of 1789. In his narrative of the proceedings of the Convention of 1785, to which the Bishop refers the reader for the fuller information upon the same subject, we find the discussion to have been with reference to exactly the same point and no other, excepting that the Bishop had not at that time adopted the particular view which he afterwards held. But there is not so much as an intimation that there was the least design in any quarter to prohibit singing the Psalter. “The† committee,” says the Bishop, “were fully empowered on the subject of the tables, and on that of the selection of reading psalms. The author’s proposal was” (not to retain “said or sung” in the rubric—not a word of this, but) “to take whole psalms, selecting such as fall in with the general subjects of divine worship, and leaving the officiating minister to his destruction. The record is but a sketch of the events; yet the historical facts are readily interwoven into sufficient historical connection.

* Memoirs, p. 152, 2nd edition.

choice, among those which should be selected. But the other members of the committee were of opinion” (not that “said or sung” should be struck out of the rubric, but) “that as much” (of the Psalms) “should be retained as could not well be objected to, on the score of being unsuitable parts of Christian prayer and praise. . . . The author has been since convinced, that instead of a selection of psalms in any shape, a better way would have been to print the psalter entire, and to leave every officiating minister to his choice, from time to time.” This, Mr. Editor, is the pith of the whole matter, and if PRINCIPLE holds that any thing else is to be included, than what appears in the Bishop’s Memoirs, he must prove his point before he can expect others to agree with him. I maintain that the burden of proof in this case, as in the one mentioned in my last communication, rests upon him.

As to the remainder of his article I must infer that when he wrote it he had not yet read my remarks in the Banner of Jan. 6th, for I cannot discover in what he says one word of argument in answer to what I then brought forward. With sincere respect I remain,

Very truly yours,

General Theological Seminary, Jan. 20th, 1849.

ALTAR AND PRIEST.

REV. MR. EDITOR:—

In answer to the courteous article of S. X., of New York, we reply: that amid the diversity of practice among the American Clergy and Architects it will be difficult to follow his judicious caution about “change in established custom.”

Is it an established custom for the Priest to consecrate the Holy Eucharist at the west front of the Altar? For one who does so, we think ten will be found who consecrate at the right (north) side. If any custom can be said to be “established,” it will be against what we presume is S. X.’s view, and certainly SACERDOS’ practice.

Wheatley, quoting Bishop Beveridge, says: “Whenever in the ancient Liturgies the Minister is directed to stand BEFORE the Altar, the NORTH side of it is always meant.”

This authority, (if it be historically accurate,) goes directly, indeed, against the ideal of a Priest consecrating at the east front, but it likewise destroys S. X.’s argument as to “frontals and super frontals,” proving that “before” means at the west front.

It is quite clear to us that the popular definition of “before the Altar” is not necessarily the Liturgical definition.

Wheatley and Bishop Beveridge, quoting the ancient Liturgies, say: “Before, means to the North Side.”

S. X. says: “Before, means to the west front.”

SACERDOS, thinking that the east, and not the people, might possibly be the object of reference, suggests as an idea, that “Before, means the east front.”

Wheatley and Bishop Beveridge’s definition fully satisfy the Rubrical direction as to the visibility of the act of Consecration: So also does that suggested by SACERDOS; but S. X.’s definition contravenes, in our judgment, the manifest intention of the Rubric.

From the undeniable fact that there is no “established customs” as to the Consecrating Priest’s position; and from the ancient liturgical definition, as given above by Bishop Beveridge, which contradicts S. X.’s definition, we still regard it an open question.

What is the Liturgical (not popular) definition of the word “before,” in the Rubric prefixed to the act of Consecration in the Holy Communion Office?

Rev. W. H. Odenheimer, SACERDOS.

P. S. J. B. C. says so many smart things, and fastens his own ideal upon us, that we have no great inclination to enter into any discussion with so witty a controversialist. Four out of his five objections to the “Ideal” arise from his attention to railery rather than rubrics. His notion that the rubric directing the act of consecration of the holy Eucharist is a side thrust at “private masses for the dead, (why not for the living too?) is simply ultraprotestantism, and fails to explain the particular directions as to “readiness and decency,” which evidently imply that the people are to see. The people could not, in our judgment, be better employed than in seeing that which Apostles saw, and which the two disciples at Emmaus saw when Jesus was known to them in the breaking of bread. The rubric designs that the eye here, as the ear elsewhere, shall convey instruction to the soul. And that this is so the general custom of consecrating at the north end fully demonstrates.

The “Ideal” did not say that the Priest was not to leave the spot where the gospel was read, but the place, i. e. the chancel. To go, for example, to the chancel steps and deliver his instructions from a lectern (in the priestly robe and in the holy place) will enable one to fulfil the rubric “return to the holy table,” just as well as to leave the chancel, go out into the vestry room, change the dress, mount a pulpit (which is a structure not once alluded to in our Prayer Book) and then return.

As to the argument in favour of the Priest leaving the chancel during the holy Communion office, derived from the altar being placed in “the body of the church,” we reply that we consider that the altar is placed in the body of the church in most of our Philadelphia and other churches; for examples, in Trinity, St. Luke’s, St. Peter’s, St. James’, St. Andrew’s, and St. Paul’s, &c., &c. There is no chancel technically speaking; the altar is in the body of the church, i. e. in the Nave. And yet we maintain that the rubrics do not contemplate the Priest’s absence from what is popularly called the chancel, during the celebration of the holy mysteries. Necessity may compel, but the rubric does not contemplate. The place, the dress, and the office is priestly, from the beginning to the end of the Holy Communion office.

The notion of a chancel “cut off short at the altar-rails,” and of “two ideals” arises from italicizing the word “just” in SACERDOS’S expression “just outside.” If the expression had been allowed to stand as the author wrote it, and been connected with his other statements of proper chancel arrangements, J. B. C. would have avoided a blunder which we beg him to consider his own. Suum cuique.

We, too, think the proper place for solemnizing marriage should be under the chancel-arch. The chancel-arch, may be "just outside"; if it be not "just outside," the altar rails.

J. B. C. admits that the rubric uses the term "aisle" to express what he prefers to call a "longitudinal alley." The "Ideal" follows the rubric: we leave therefore the "longitudinal alley" and all the wit to J. B. C.

And now as to "the beautiful little church of St. James the Less" (God prosper it and all connected with it,) Sacerdos cannot yield to a better friend than J. B. C. in his admiration for the zeal which originated, the taste which executed, and the noble Catholic spirit which has consecrated the whole undertaking, and yet if any structure more beautiful and effective can be erected, they who best love St. James the Less will be the first to say, WE WISH YOU GOOD LUCK IN THE NAME OF THE LORD.

MR. EDITOR:—

I wish to inform W. M., if he has not by this time discovered it, that I perused with interest his extract from the Memoirs of Bishop White, and that I now take the first opportunity of acknowledging the same: my last communication having been mailed before the Banner that contained the extract came to hand. I mention this to account for my seeming neglect, which W. M. appears to feel unaccountable if not inexcusable. I was pleased to have my attention drawn to the good Bishop's views, and although I cannot arrive at W. M.'s conclusion attached thereto, still I thank him, and am equally grateful for his last able attempt at defence of what I really believe indefensible position of Sacerdos; I likewise thank him for the help he has unwittingly given to the cause I so poorly advocate, but more of this hereafter.

W. M.'s starts off by quoting from my communication Dec. 23, as follows: "Sacerdos asserts that the rubrical term 'say' is the antithesis to 'sing,' whilst the term 'read' comprehends either saying or singing! and upon this assertion he founds his principal argument."

"To make this assertion available it is necessary for Sacerdos to show that the American reviewers of the Prayer Book had his rubrical view of the words read, say and sing."

This ground W. M. disputes, and holds that it is not for Sacerdos, but for me, "to show to the contrary!"

Now certainly this is a very extraordinary position to take. A writer makes an assertion, giving a definition to a word contrary to the usage of the literary world, and I am seriously called upon to prove that the reviewers of our Common Prayer did not write the rubrics of the same in accordance with this forced construction. No, no, friend W. M. the proof must come from Sacerdos, and I again assert that if he fails in showing that our reviewers had his meaning of the word read in the construction of the rubrics, his assertion falls to the ground, and he and his coadjutors must hereafter read when directed, and sing only when permitted.

W. M. must not hope to escape the inconsistency of supposing the compilers of the rubrics would reiterate from page to page the same directions by fancying a perplexity that I have no reason to suppose exists; certainly not in the Prayer Book of our Church. If one rubric directs a certain portion to be read and another directs the same, or the like, to be said or sung, where is the perplexity? read or sing as taste or circumstances may permit. "Say" and "said" are frequently used in the construction of the rubrics, evidently to avoid the frequent repetition of the word "read." "Used," "follow," &c. are likewise introduced instead of repeating former directions. To read or sing would not sound as well, but it would be understood to mean say or sing, and would produce the same performances. But if the reviewer understood and adopted Sacerdos's view of the word read, and studied the brevity that W. M. would have us think they did, why use the synonyme "say" with its almost affix "sing," if the word "read" comprehends both?

W. M. is so wedded to singing that he cannot understand or allow any rubric to interfere or prohibit it. In a former communication I referred to the rubric which says "The minister (not the choir) shall begin the Morning prayer by reading," &c. This W. M. thinks to be questioning the judgment of the reviewers; the insertion (not the choir) was intended to hit the practice (in some churches) of the choir singing one or more of the sentences, which the minister is directed to read. It may be well to say in this place, that I do not intend by any of my remarks to question the propriety or judgment of the reviewers of the common prayer. Their whole work meets my hearty approbation. But I do question the propriety or judgment of those who do violence to common sense and cause the rubrical labors of the reviewers to appear contradictory and incomplete, in order to indulge a morbid appetite for music.

W. M. is not alone in seeking an apology for rubrical transgression by reference to foreign usage. The cathedral service of England cannot be admitted as evidence; we have no cathedrals, and we are worshipping under rules of our own, selected and altered it is true, from the service of the Church of England, but in so doing, our reviewers rejected many usages which of course should have no weight with us now. But before W. M. arraigns the Bishops of England he should try at least to show that there has not been some special provision made for the Cathedral service of England; he must be aware that the order of a King is authority in that country. And in the absence of documentary evidence on the subject I prefer to err, if at all, in favor of the Bishops, and believe that in so long a line of Kings and Queens, some music-loving ruler might be found who gave the requisite authority. He who could order the Litany to be used on certain occasions without reference to the days of the week, can certainly turn read into sing for particular purposes, for even republicans do the same and without authority.

W. M. and Sacerdos differ somewhat as to the power of the word "say." W. M. asserts that neither "say" nor "read" prohibit singing any part of our church service! and attempts to prove it, by English authority as usual; the cathedral service above referred to, is the first proof offered; the second, he says, "is found in the first book of Edward VI. for using the Lessons; in which directions all three words say, read, and sing, occur, concerning one and the same practice in a way which I fear will be rather startling to Principle. First, we find the following, 'The Table and Kalendar, expressing the order of the Psalms and Lessons to be said at matins and even-song, throughout the year.' Secondly, in order of matins we find this rubric, 'Then shall be read two lessons distinctly with a loud voice that the people may hear,' &c. Thirdly, in the rubric immediately following this one we read, 'and (to the end the people may the better hear) in such places where they do sing,' (cathedrals for instance) 'there shall the lessons be sung in plain tune,' How? alas for Principle!—'after the manner of distinct reading; and likewise the Epistle and Gospel!'

I have given above the whole of W. M.'s second proof, because he thinks it conclusive, and I could not produce better evidence for the position I take. Is it possible for a person to be so wrapped up in preconceived opinions as not to perceive the force and bearing of the language of these rubrics? Look at it; because the two words said and read, are used to have the lessons read "distinctly" "with a loud voice;" and an additional one is needed to have them sung, W. M. concludes that all three permits the lessons to be sung! The conclusion is absurd. I think it proves conclusively that the first and second words were used to express the same thing, viz. read. And that if the third had not been added, or rather, introduced, the lessons could not have been sung.

But how were the lessons to be sung? "In plain tune after the manner of distinct reading." In tuning! perhaps.

Now if these compilers understood the word "reading" to express "singing," they certainly would not have directed the singing to be as near as possible (so I understand it) to reading, "to the end the people may the better hear."

It appears they had wretched readers in those days, who required a tune to raise their voices. Will W. M. inform us when this state of things was changed? The present rubric in the English service directs the lessons to "be read distinctly with an audible voice, . . . he that readeth, so standing and turning himself, as he may best be heard of all such as are present."

The singing part was expunged, but when, my book telleth not. I am forced to call upon W. M. to produce those "other evidences" which he mentions "can be adduced" to prove, what think you? "that there is not a letter in any one of our services which the rubrics do not permit to be sung." For really I am more and more convinced that we can only sing what the rubrics permit, and that our reviewers used the word read only in the sense now attached to it by ninety-nine persons out of a hundred. W. M. will permit me however to suggest, that he introduce no more directions like the following, "there shall be sung," to prove that the word read, used just before, must mean the same thing.

I must set W. M. right as far as Principle is concerned, as to the "morbid dread of chanting the Psalter." I have none whatever. But I have an active dread of having the sense of our rubrics violated, and domestic and foreign usages forced upon us by the few to the disquietude of the many. If singing the Psalter is thought to be a better practice than the prescribed one of reading, why not strive to have permission introduced and give all an opportunity of uniting? To have real harmony in a church we must consult something more than the musical taste of musical directors; we must follow rubrical directions to the letter until the Church gives a different interpretation.

INTERESTING CONFIRMATION SCENE.

MR. EDITOR:—

The following extract of a letter received a few days ago from a friend in New York, will, perhaps, be no less acceptable to your readers than it was to me. Its interest is heightened by the fact that the writer was a member of the Methodist society until about three years ago.

"I had the pleasure last Sunday of hearing Bishop Whittingham for the first time. What a clear and forcible writer he is! and what a soul there is in his composition! I mean his literary composition; though I doubt not, there is more than ordinary energy and life in the man and the Bishop. He administered the holy rite of Confirmation at one church to forty-nine persons; who, being from all classes of society, presented a faithful and lively picture of what the Church should be, and is, in this day of her renovation. There were the young, coming in the morning of their years to receive strength for the following day; and the old, seeking light for the coming darkness of death; the rich and the poor, the wise and the ignorant. Among the number was a coloured man, weak and feeble with the consumption. But the most interesting sight was he confirming of an aged negro, who had been confined to his bed some twenty years. Not being able to move without help, he was placed in a chair near to the chancel; and after all the others had been confirmed, the Bishop left the chancel, and invoked the Holy Ghost upon the head of the aged sufferer. He the last aptly represented the mission of the Church, and her returning life.

"The Church," Bishop Doane said, on a former occasion, 'is not like Jesus of Nazareth, who went about doing good.' But is she not now growing into the likeness of her Lord? Is not Zion putting on her beautiful garments, and girding herself with strength? We see it in the temples, wherein everything bespeaks the Lord's house. We hear it in the revival of those holy strains of music that dwell on the lips of the saints of old. Better still, we see the Church's life in her firm adherence to, and defence of, 'the faith once delivered to the saints.' And does not 'Nashotah,' and the 'Vale of the Cross,' show the breathings of that better, holier life; born, not at Oxford, but amid the hills and valleys of Judea, and 'endued with power from on high,' when the day of Pentecost was fully come? But if I don't stop, you will begin to suspect me of 'sickly sentimentalism.' Don't think that I am carried away with those wild, romantic Oxford notions. You know I have had some experience; besides, I am married, and therefore not likely to be suspected. I do sincerely think we owe much of this living energy to Oxford, though human nature dwells there as well as at Geneva. But the day must have come; for the work is the Lord's, and to Him be all the glory!"

REPORT OF THE EPISCOPAL FEMALE TRACT SOCIETY OF PHILADELPHIA—1848.

To present to the subscribers a brief statement of the doings of the Board of Managers, during the past year, is probably all that is, or ought to be expected, at their hands, in the Annual Reports.

The Managers have discharged their duty when they have selected, printed, and distributed as many tracts as the funds provided will allow, and it is seldom that they are able to give any account of the results of their labors beyond this point.

It so happens, however, on the present occasion, that they can lay before the friends of the Society an acknowledgment from the Right Rev. Bishop Chase, not only of the reception of tracts from the Society, but of good derived from the supply thus afforded. He says, of eight congregations gathered in his diocese, that "they have all been more or less benefitted by publications from your society," and thanks "with a full heart" those who are thus striving to promote the Master's glory.

Doubtless the same admission is silently made by every heart of Bishop and Missionary, whose labors are aided by similar contributions.

The supporters of this Society, however, need not such encouragement. They know that they are doing a necessary work, and therefore can have no reasonable doubt of its success under the guidance of God's good providence. Theirs is the duty to sow the seed, it is God only who can give the increase, and He, assuredly, will not let the harvest fail.

Tracts, some of them teaching the doctrines of our Church, and others in the narrative form, inculcating moral and religious obligations upon her members, selected to suit the capacity of the uninformed, and to engage the attention of the more enlightened, have been freely given to the Clergy and Missionaries in this, and other states. Large numbers have been distributed in the coal districts of Pennsylvania, and a very liberal supply given to "the Society for the Religious Improvement of the Neighborhood of the Theological Seminary, in Fairfax county, Virginia."

These silent messengers have been sent to the abodes of poverty, to the sick and suffering, to the sorrowing and penitent, to the mariner, to schools of charity, and into the prisoner's cell. Each box of books from the "Ladies Bishop White Parish Library Association," and from the "Female Prayer Book Society," has also contained many of our Tracts.

The contributions for the past year have been as follows:

From a Mother and Daughter, members of St. Stephen's Church,	$60 00

ST. PAUL'S CHURCH, DOYLESTOWN.

MR. EDITOR:—

I presume it will be unnecessary to remind the readers of your journal of a church bearing this name having been erected in this place, and for the first time used for worship, Easter Sunday last, April, 1848. It is not intended here to enlarge on the difficulties and discouragements, which from the very commencement of the work, have been encountered. These, to a greater or less extent, are common to all Missionaries, but perhaps in a more special sense, to those who go forth, and break new ground for the Church, and in places, where all previous knowledge of her has only been prejudice and misconception. Indeed we have abundant cause for thankfulness, to the "Great Shepherd and Bishop of our souls," since there seems to be reason for believing that whatever trials have been connected with this very arduous undertaking, the Lord in mercy has converted them into so many channels for the transmission of "His heavenly Grace and Benediction." So that in the humble effort of "watering others," we are by no means without evidence of having ourselves been "watered" from above. In the present case therefore the introduction of Missionary difficulties, might probably be out of place. Alas, scarcely a month or week passes but these are set forth in some of our religious journals, in a manner sufficiently descriptive, to make the whole Church weep. Our object in writing this article is simply and solely, to inform churchmen of our affairs, as one of the new and feeble Parishes of this Diocese, and as such requiring their fostering care. Our cry is, "Come over into Macedonia and help us." Yet it may not be supposed that we are unwilling to help ourselves. A large sum has been raised in this place among a few persons, and a still greater amount abroad. Yet in spite of all previous exertions, "although perplexed we are not in despair," there still remains a deficiency of funds, of about $1100, which in order to the speedy consecration of the church, according to an excellent rule of our Bishop, must first be raised or pledged by responsible persons. If then this church, which has been the subject of so many prayers, is to be set apart for the worship of Almighty God, will not our Christian friends to whom He has given the means, come forward, immediately, and help us in this our time of need? Moreover, it is scarcely necessary to say that while the church is encumbered with debt, its prosperity, if not brought to an actual stand, will most assuredly be much retarded; so that under such unfortunate circumstances, the Missionary works with his "right arm withered." To remove, therefore, these serious obstacles in the way of our growth and success as a Parish, our efforts are now mainly directed. NEW YORK.

ST. MICHAEL'S CHURCH, BROOKLYN.—A very interesting meeting was held last evening in St. Michael's church to celebrate the anniversary of its organization. The Rev. E. M. Johnson took the chair, and after reading a portion of scripture called upon the congregation to pray for that and other churches in our land, and especially in this city; for all schools and institutions, for the promotion of Christian instruction, &c. &c. He then offered prayer by using some of the collect in the prayer book, and the Lord's prayer. A report of the state of the congregation was then read, from which it appears that the number of baptisms for the year was fifty-five; of marriages, thirty-eight; communicants, fifty; of burials, thirty-five; of children under catechetical instruction, seventy-five. The church was said to be well filled on Sundays, with an attentive and serious congregation. After the reading of this report, the Rev. S. R. Johnson, D.D., offered a resolution, expressing the satisfaction of those present with the result of this enterprise and tendering their support and sympathy. He prefaced this with some very interesting remarks on the importance of establishing churches in the outskirts of our cities as well as in the newly settled parts of our country. Rev. Dr. Vinton seconded the resolution, which he accompanied with an address to the members of the congregation, forcibly pointing out to them their duty to their church; to their minister, and to themselves, if they expected growth in numbers or growth in grace. Both these addresses were very able and eloquent. The church was well filled, and every one went home satisfied with the manner in which the evening had been spent, and well pleased to know that "the work of the Lord" is prospering in that neglected part of our city.—Daily Eagle.

WESTERN NEW YORK.

CLERGYMEN RECEIVED.—The Rev. Alfred B. Beach, of St. John's Church, Canandaigua, and the Rev. Charles H. Gardiner, Deacon, of St. Stephen's Church, New Hartford, have been canonically transferred to the Diocese of Western New York and received into the same from the Diocese of New York. The Rev. John Noble of Medina has been received into the Diocese from Tennessee.—Gospel Messenger.

ORDINATION.—On Wednesday, Jan. 24th, Right Rev. Bishop Henshaw, acting by request of Bishop Brownell, in St. James' church, New London, admitted Rev. John J. Brandegee, Deacon of this Diocese, now Rector of All Saints' church in the island of St. Thomas, to the Holy Order of Priests.

The Bishop preached from 1 Cor. ii. 2—an interesting and impressive discourse. Rev. Robert A. Hallam, Rector of St. James', N. L. presented the candidate.

The services of the occasion were attended by a large congregation, and witnessed by all with marked attention. And the candidate returns with his enlarged powers to the distant and difficult field of labor, where he has held the office of Deacon so well and so successfully, cheered by the sympathy and followed by the prayers of many affectionate hearts.—Calendar.

We find in the Christian Witness, a very interesting historical account of the Church in Maine before the revolution. As such records are of permanent interest we shall copy, at another time, this narrative.

On Thursday, the 25th ult., the Festival of the conversion of St. Paul, the Bishop visited Trinity Church, Saco; preached in the afternoon and evening; and in the evening confirmed seven persons. Under the ministry of the Rev. J. S. Hammond, this parish, whose depressed and uncertain state was noticed a year since in the Witness, has already recovered a degree of energy and exhibited a zeal and unity which promises, under the blessing of God, the happiest increase. On Friday, the 26th ult. a parish was organized at Dresden, under the title of St. John's Church; the name of a parish and Church in the same town, which subsisted before the Revolution, and of which an account will be found in another part of this paper, from one to whom we are indebted for the preservation of its history, otherwise almost lost. The present parish has been formed under the labors of the Rev. Edwin W. Murray, and embraces a considerable number of the most respectable inhabitants of the town. Wardens and Vestrymen were duly elected; and a brief address was made by the Bishop to the congregation who were assembled.

On the 27th ult., the Bishop of the Diocese made his third visitation to the mission on the Penobscot. Having arrived in Old Town, the residence of the missionary, where a chapel has been opened for stated services, he was warmly greeted by the small but faithful band of Churchmen, the most of whom had but recently become acquainted with the services of the Episcopal Church. The missionary had collected his Sunday school together, in the afternoon numbering about 75 children, when they were to be catechised by the Bishop. Prayers were read by the Rev. Samuel Durborow, who also baptized two adults on the occasion. After which the Bishop, in his usually warm and familiar manner, interested the children for the space of an hour, by alternately catechising and addressing them. Previous to the service, our indefatigable and zealous teachers, in their efforts as well to please as to instruct their scholars, had prepared a collation, consisting of the various 'good things,' suited to the palate of the young. In the middle of the table, a Christmas tree was placed and from the branches were suspended presents, consisting of books, scarfs, and other useful things all of which were either made or purchased by the teachers themselves. Many of the children in the school, were of the poor families in the village, whose religious instruction had been much neglected. It would have cheered the heart of a Christian or philanthropist, to have been present on this occasion, to have seen the little eyes gleaming with delight, and sparkling with pleasure, during the instructions of the Bishop—while the festive board tempted their youthful appetites, and while receiving the various presents designed for them. The children left the house not only assured that their teachers wished them a happy Christmas, but also did all in their power to make it so to them. They will look back upon the season of our Lord's birth, with pleasing emotions, and anticipate the next with delight.

In the evening our chapel was crowded to overflowing. The Bishop then preached a very interesting and appropriate sermon, from Deut. xxvi. 17.—'Thou hast avouched the Lord this day to be thy God,' &c. Four persons were then presented to the Bishop for confirmation; among them was a lady 84 years of age, the widow of one of the earliest settlers on the upper Penobscot. The address to the candidates was very affecting, and few left the house that night unimpressed by the solemnity of the occasion.

Notwithstanding the jealousy and opposition with which the Church has to contend, from the members of the various liberal (?) sects, in her onward march, there is one thing certain,—wherever she goes, she carries rich blessings in her hand, and distributes them cheerfully to every willing receiver.—Witness.

We are happy to add to our Church Intelligence the following gratifying proof of the growth of the Church in the neighboring Colonies of Great Britain. The Bishop of Newfoundland is remembered here, with affectionate respect, by all who met him during his brief visit. The Church cannot but grow under the fostering care of such Missionary Apostles.

NEWFOUNDLAND.

The Newfoundland Times gives interesting accounts of the ceremonies of consecration of two churches in this diocese, and the trouble taken by the natives to make their churches fit places for the worship of their Creator. The following abridged account will be read with pleasure by many of our subscribers:

"The church at Petty Harbor was consecrated by the Lord Bishop of the diocese on the feast of St. Andrew the Apostle. The clergy, eight in number, occupied the chancel, which is a new feature in the churches of this diocese, and one which, we trust, will be copied and adopted in every possible case. The convenience and beauty of such an addition were fully exemplified on this interesting occasion. The Bishop preached, and, assisted by his chaplains and the Rev. the Missionary of the settlement, administered the holy sacrament of the Lord's Supper to a large number of communicants.

"A collection was made towards the expense of fresh painting the church, the amount of which was 107. 19s. Several handsome and valuable offerings were presented, which, with the names of the donors, were recited, by the Bishop's desire, at the usual time of publishing notices in the church. Among them we heard mention of a silver communion service—a font, of stone—a rich cloth, or covering, for the holy table—and a carved seat for the minister. Mention was also made, in terms of just commendation, of the exertions of the inhabitants themselves to complete and furnish their church in some way suitable to its high and holy uses.

"The new and beautiful church at Pouch Cove, for which, we understand, the settlement is indebted to the charity of the Rev. Charles Palairt, formerly missionary to this and the other out-harbors of St. John's, was consecrated on Monday last, the 4th instant. Some attempt has been made in the details of this church to return to the original character of wooden buildings, by introducing narrow windows with pointed angular heads, instead of the arches, (barbarously called Gothic,) more commonly used in these colonies. The pitch of the roof also is very sharp, the effect of which inside, (the ceiling being fastened to the rafters,) is strikingly grand; though the height of the building externally, through an unfortunate departure from the original plan, is unreasonable, we might almost say painfully, exaggerated. However, the strength of the structure was fully proved on the day, and at the time of consecration, by violent gusts of wind from the north-west, the side which is most exposed. This church also is provided with a commodious chancel, of much better proportion, and in better keeping with the nave, than at Petty Harbor. This circumstance, we suppose, may be accounted for by the church and chancel having been designed and also built together; whereas at Petty Harbor the chancel was a subsequent addition. On the whole, we would venture to recommend the Church of St. Thomas, at Pouch Cove, as the best pattern, (except always its towering height,) for wooden churches, which has yet been exhibited in this diocese. The internal arrangements are very simple, and satisfactory because simple. The seats, as at Petty Harbor, are all of the same size and character, all open and free; and the inhabitants can meet and unite as one family, without any distinction of rank and fortune; all as children of the same Father, and brethren of the same Lord. The pulpit, prayer desk, stand for the Bible, holy table, and communion rails, are all of black walnut, highly finished from drawings by Mr. Hay. A very rich chalice and paten of silver, and a font of stone were presented by the same liberal hands, and out of the same charity and piety, to which the church itself is due; and none to whom that reverend gentleman is known, will be surprised to find that his chief and most costly gifts have been bestowed upon the most remote and least observed of his churches.

The clergy were in the chancel, and the body of the church was filled by the inhabitants themselves, who have manifested great interest in the work. They brought over the new pulpit from Flat Rock, a distance of six or seven miles, on the morning of consecration, starting with it as early as two o'clock, that it might be fixed in time for the service. They dragged it through the woods and over several deep bogs, and deposited it at the church door, surmounted by a flag, with many a hearty cheer, by day-break. It was duly fixed before eleven o'clock, and occupied by the Bishop in the usual service.

"We understand this is the seventh church consecrated by the Lord Bishop of the diocese during the present year. S. D. G."

GLORIA TIBI DOMINE!

BY LEILA CAMERON.

Darkly round my drooping head
Hangs the cloud of human woe;
Weary is the path I tread,
Gathering blackness as I go;
Still I faint not on the way,
For my trust is fixed on Thee—
On the cross my hopes I stay—
Gloria tibi Domine!

Few and ill have been the days
Of my sojourn here on earth;
Soon are spent life's fleeting rays—
Quickly grief succeeds to mirth.
Brightest joys are tinged with gloom,
Sweetest pleasures soonest flee;
But I look beyond the tomb,
Gloria tibi Domine!

Life deceitful is at best,
Thorns are hidden 'mid its flowers,
Here I find no peace, nor rest—
O'er me still the storm-cloud lowers.
But along this thorny road,
Jesus bore the Cross for me;
Suffering here he long abode,
Gloria tibi Domine!

What though earthly hope may fail,
Friends prove false, and kindred die,
Human succor naught avail,
In the hour of agony?
Keener pangs, our blessed Lord
Bore in dark Gethsemane—
Ever be His name adored,
Gloria tibi Domine!

Nothing want I here on earth,
While my Saviour proves my friend;
All things else are little worth—
On His love my hopes depend!
Love like His, divinely great,
Never can forgotten be;
Meekly I His coming wait,
Gloria tibi Domine!

When my earthly race is o'er,
And this weary, aching head,
Free from pain forevermore,
Peaceful slumbers with the dead—
Joyful shall my spirit rise,
Through a priceless ransom free,
Singing, as it upward flies—
Gloria tibi Domine!

LADY GLENORCHY.

BY M. G. SLEEPER.

Wilhelmina Maxwell, Viscountess Glenorchy, was born at Preston, Scotland, Sept. 2d, 1741. "With fine talents, which had been improved by a liberal and expensive education, she combined beauty of person, a temper vivacious and peculiarly formed for hilarity, a considerable share of wit and pleasantry, and every accomplishment which could render her an object of admiration in the circles of fashion." In her twentieth year, she married John Lord Viscount Glenorchy, only son of the earl of Breadalbane. This marriage, which had been much desired by her friends, gave her access to the most brilliant society, and engaged her in a still more decided course of gaiety and folly. Soon afterward, she went abroad with her husband, and spent two years in travelling and visiting foreign courts. The excitement of perpetual change, and the continual gratification of a cultivated taste, checked the uneasy thoughts and restless, though vague desires, which sometimes intruded upon her; and after her return, she suppressed them for a time by an uninterrupted succession of giddy pleasures. Yet, forgetful as she was of God, He did not forget her. The still small voice, often heard and often disobeyed, once more uttered its warning. It spoke, not as before, amidst the fascinations of the great world, but in the silence and solitude of the sick chamber, when the folded curtains dimmed the light, and the thick laid carpets gave back no sound to the falling foot. It asked, with thrilling power, "Hast thou answered the design of thy being?" Then memory called up her vanished years, filled with scenes of splendid gaiety. As they passed in review before her, she found youthful ambition, youthful thoughtlessness, youthful love of display and power, but no regard for her Maker, no submission to His will. Fearful and trembling she sat down to the study of the Bible. With it she repaired to God, and the Father, who never turns from the earnest prayer of the seeker after righteousness, listened and blessed. Henceforward, though subject to the same doubts and fears that beset the path of other Christians, Lady Glenorchy devoted herself cordially and vigorously to the service in which she had engaged. For some time, every possible means were tried to connect her again with the world of fashion. Coldness, severity, entreaties, contempt, ridicule, all were in vain. She kept steadily and gently on her way. She was rewarded. She not only retained her influence with her husband, but received his ultimate consent to her plans. Dying in 1771, he bequeathed her property to the amount of between two and three thousand pounds a year, with power to convert the whole into money, and employ the whole, or any part, in the support of schools, and the promotion of religion.

The remaining years of Lady Glenorchy's life were filled with efforts for personal holiness and active usefulness. In 1772, she commenced the erection of a chapel in Edinburgh. In the following year, she repaired the chapel in the district of Strathfillan, endowed it, and placed it under the patronage of the Society for propagating Christian knowledge. This Society sent also, at her expense two Missionaries, though the Highlands and islands of Scotland. She purchased a house at Exmouth, and fitted it up as a chapel. In passing through Carlisle, she saw a church shut up; she purchased it, endowed it, and provided a minister for it. Being once compelled to remain at Matlock over the Sabbath, on account of a broken carriage, and finding but little religious activity, she purchased a chapel and house adjoining, where much good has since been effected. Hope chapel, at Bristol Hot Wells, was built at the joint expense of herself and Lady Henrietta Hope. She built a manufactory for the employment of the poor and provided instruction for the children of the establishment. Even her porters' lodges were occupied as schools for the neighboring poor. This was a favorite charity, and she employed numbers of pious teachers, by whom hundreds of children have been usefully and religiously taught. "She usually supported some promising and pious young minister as her chaplain, which served him as an introduction to respectability in the Church." She often defrayed in whole, or in part, the expense of printing religious tracts, and assisted in circulating them. She also procured a Gaelic translation of Alleine's Alarm to the Unconverted, which has been blessed largely in the Highlands. She gave freely to the public institutions of Edinburgh, and suggested one or two of the most useful, accompanying the suggestion with a generous gift. Neither did she neglect those silent and unobtrusive modes of usefulness, which the public does not see, and of which it never hears. She opened her pleasure grounds to those who came from a distance to attend the communion; and once, in a time of scarcity, she had them planted with potatoes to distribute to those in want. She sometimes expended hundreds of pounds in relieving indigence, and placing pious families in comfortable situations. To furnish means for such lavish bounty, Lady Glenorchy superintended her affairs herself, and "though her dress, her table, her attendants, her equipage, always corresponded to her station, yet she retrenched many personal expenses, and denied herself the splendor which her fortune and rank could well have afforded and excused." She also sold her estate at Barnton, that she might apply the money to a more disinterested object than her own accommodation, and that her fortune might be expended with her life.

Lady Glenorchy's piety was singularly free from every morose and forbidding appearance. She was indeed, an enemy to the theatre, cards and some other amusements, for she had tested them. She knew how they waste the time, destroy the taste for unexciting pleasures, and how quickly before them fly those convictions of sin and desires for holiness, mercifully given to lead the soul to God. But she did not confound the innocent with the noxious. Most zealously would she have opposed the boasted system of ascetic seclusion. Her temper was cheerful, her manners dignified, yet gentle, while her extensive reading, acute observation, and perspicuity in communicating ideas, rendered her conversation highly agreeable. She was a constant attendant upon domestic worship, and was never absent from the public ordinances of religion, when her health permitted her to attend them. She was very solicitous for the welfare of her servants, and frequently gave them advice and assistance. Her benevolent heart enclosed the whole family of man in its embrace; and great as was her fortune, it was too small for her generosity. As her health declined, she thought and spoke much of death, yet cheerfully, and as if it were a favorite and joyful topic. Her last illness was short. Not long after she was seized, she was heard to whisper, "Well, if this be dying, it is the pleasantest thing imaginable." She said little afterward, appearing to sleep most of the time, until she expired, July 17th, 1786.

REV. PROFESSOR HAIGHT'S

MATRICULATION ADDRESS TO THE STUDENTS OF THE GENERAL THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY.

"Young Men likewise exhort to be sober minded."—Titus, ii. 6.

In the discharge of the not light and unimportant duty, which, in course, devolves on me, of addressing you, my young brethren, on this interesting occasion, I have selected these words of the Holy Apostle, St. Paul, as the ground of my remarks. They contain an intimation of a danger, to which all persons at your period of life are exposed, and indicate a line of conduct which it becomes young men, in your position especially, most carefully to follow. "Young men likewise exhort,"—he is addressing Titus, as the Bishop of Crete—"Young men likewise exhort to be sober-minded," or, as our margin has it, to be "discreet." Especially, I said, should young men in your position take heed to this counsel—Students of Theology—Candidates for Holy Orders. Your separation, my beloved brethren, from your fellows, by an entrance upon a course of preparation for the sacred office, has not freed you from the peculiar temptations and trials to which your period of life is exposed. You are still young men; with their impulses, and feelings, and tendencies. Nay, the very vocation which you have assumed, has perhaps rather added to your difficulties and dangers; exposing you to new and stronger temptations. At least, your responsibility is greatly increased, and the result of a neglect of the Apostolic counsel will be vastly more disastrous both to yourselves and others. Give me then your patient attention, while I endeavour, in dependence upon the help of God's Holy Spirit, with all plainness, yet with all affection, to illustrate and enforce the lesson which the inspired Apostle sets before us in the text. I speak to you all; primarily indeed, to those who are this day to be formally received as students of our Seminary, upon their entering into a solemn engagement to observe its statutes, and yield themselves to its discipline; but also to those who have already been so received, and are now here to witness the enrolment of their junior brethren, and to welcome them to the Institution. None, I trust, suppose that they have reached that point where the word of counsel and warning is unnecessary.

"Young men exhort to be sober-minded." As here used by the Apostle, the word, which primarily signifies to be of a sound mind,* may be taken to import a sober, modest, and recollected spirit, as opposed to all yielding to sensual temptations of every sort, and to all light, irregular, and foolish behaviour. To be sober-minded, implies a constant exercise in every part of self-government, the daily keeping under the body, and bringing it into subjection; the being guided in word and deed, not by passion or sense, but by a sound judgment; not being puffed up with proud conceit; but self-distrustful, humbly and meekly submitting one's self to the direction and teaching of those to whom authority for this purpose has been committed.

I. The temper of mind, and disposition of heart thus indicated, should be exercised and manifested in the formation and utterance of your opinions, and in the general tone of your conversation and conduct among men.

1. When I speak of the formation and utterance of your opinions, I do not, of course, refer to your reception and avowal of the fundamental articles of the Christian faith, as set forth in Holy Scripture and witnessed to by the Church. These you are presumed cordially to have embraced, and to be ready with all boldness, on every suitable occasion, to proclaim. But I refer to those Theological and Ecclesiastical questions, connected with and growing out of these fundamental points, which present themselves to every Student of Divinity for consideration and settlement, many of them very nice in their nature, and of high importance. Carefully to study these, under the guidance of wise and learned Bishops and Doctors of the Church, speaking in their writings, and with the help of the living Teacher, is one object of your entrance into this Seminary. To come hither, then, supposing that you are already thoroughly informed on such topics; that you have, and are qualified to express, an opinion on the various points of Theological doctrine and Ecclesiastical practice as they arise, is manifestly absurd. You come as learners, not as teachers; to be instructed, not to instruct. To forget this is not to be sober-minded. And when you have entered within these walls, you will show yourselves mindful of the exhortation of the Apostle, by carefully pursuing the prescribed course of study, and faithfully performing all the duties required of you, that so your views may be carefully and cautiously formed, and with every proper precaution against the entrance of error. That young man is not sober-minded, who, disregarding or slighting the books indicated by the constituted authorities, selects for himself, or under private advisement, the authors whom he will study; or who, idling away his time in miscellaneous reading, or social intercourse, or frivolous amusements, is content to pick up his notions of Theology from the columns of a newspaper, or the pages of a magazine, or to re-echo the opinions expressed by some loud talker in the circle in which he chances to move. This is a point pre-eminently calling for the exercise of sound judgment, modesty, and humility. And error herein is fraught with the most disastrous consequences. For the Student who is satisfied with crude, imperfect, indigestible notions upon the high and important themes which successively are brought before him; who is content with a smattering of Theological knowledge; or who has formed himself upon self-chosen models, will inevitably prove an unsafe, superficial teacher of the people of the Lord, if not their leader into the paths of deadly error, to his own shame and confusion, in the great day of account, and perchance to their eternal detriment.

2. The same principle applies, my brethren, to the utterance of your sentiments while yet in a state of pupilage. It is no cause of shame to a student to be ignorant of those subjects to which his attention has not been given. And it is much more manly and honest for him to confess his ignorance, and to avow that he has no fixed opinion upon a given question, than dogmatically to give forth his guesses, or his half-formed conclusions, as a judgment in the case. Vanity and self-conceit, or a desire of applause, may prompt the latter course; but discretion will point him to the former. Indeed the less that grave theological questions are made the subject of discourse and discussion by Students of Divinity, generally among themselves, or in society, the better. But little benefit can ever arise from it, while very often it is the fruitful source of evil to all parties. What you most need, my young brethren, is prayer and study. Now is your seed-time. By and by, full soon enough, as you will one day confess, though you may not now, you will be called on to speak and to act. Meditation, reflection, reading, prayer,—these are the employments to which your hours should now be consecrated. And when the thoughts of your hearts upon the momentous subjects of your study would find utterance, let it be with the chosen few,—your associates or friends beloved,—and for mutual improvement and edification, not for display, or strife, or the desire of victory in argument. And when abroad among men, it may be expedient or necessary that you should speak on such themes, ever be on your guard. Remember the possible consequences of hasty words to yourself, the Seminary and the Church of God. Better be silent than to speak unadvisedly,—without knowledge, or without reflection, or without regard to circumstances. Thoughtless speech always injures him who utters it; weakening his mental perceptions, or confirming him in error; while the sad effects of imprudent speech often reach far beyond the individual, to those with whom he is connected, causing, not unfrequently, wide-spread mortification and damage. There is "a time," says the wise man, "to keep silence."* "Let every man," counsels St. James, "be slow to speak."† "Let your speech," advises St. Paul, "be always with grace, seasoned with salt, that ye may know how to answer every man."‡ "Young men exhort to be sober-minded."

3. But not only with regard to speech should the exhortation of the text be regarded. In reference to the whole tenor of their conversation and conduct, should young men, who are preparing for the Holy Ministry, be mindful of the injunction, to be sober-minded. In all your intercourse with the world around you,—in all your habits and actions, even the minutest, and in themselves the most insignificant, it is incumbent upon you, my brethren, to observe great discretion,—so to order yourselves as not only not to bring reproach upon yourselves, the Seminary and the Church, but by the beauty and consistency of your deportment, to put to silence the ignorance of foolish men, and to lead observers to respect the Church, and to glorify its adorable Head. The injunctions of the New Testament to the disciples of the Saviour apply with peculiar force to those who are candidates for, or have entered upon the work of the Ministry. "Be ye wise as serpents and harmless as doves."§ "I would have you wise unto that which is good, and simple concerning evil."|| "See then that ye walk circumspectly, not as fools but as wise."¶ "Abstain from all appearance of evil." To go into detail, and specify particular things which should be avoided, is neither expedient nor practicable. The application of the general principle must be left to each one's conscience of good sense. Suffice it to say, that he who is sober-minded, will most carefully abstain from all such peculiarities of outward deportment as are likely to excite attention, and draw forth remark. Good taste indicates this as the only proper course of procedure for persons in your position. But this is not all. It is not merely a question of taste. It is a question of duty. The interests of the Seminary, the interests of the Church of God, are involved herein. No man can draw upon himself, by his departures in behaviour from general usage, the eyes of the community, and awaken their wonder, without thereby contributing somewhat to weaken the legitimate influence of that sacred order to which he is looking, and to hinder the onward march of the Church of Christ.

I know full well that at times it may be difficult to draw the line between what is and what is not expedient and allowable in conduct. There may be a difference of opinion as to what discretion demands. Still these cases are comparatively rare; and when they arise, let it be remembered, that it is far safer to stand on the side of prudence. And if it happen that you find remark occasioned, and offence given, by actions which you had not supposed liable to objection, and to which, from sacred associations perhaps, you would fondly cling, even then, far better is it that you should deny yourselves, than that any odium should fall upon the Church. "Even Christ pleased not himself," therefore "let every one of us please his neighbor for his good to edification."†† "Wherefore if meat make my brother to offend, I will eat no flesh while the world standeth, lest I make my brother to offend."‡‡

BLIND ARTHUR.

"Mamma, when shall I see the light of day again?" asked Arthur Brandon, turning as he spoke, his sightless orbs upon his mother's face, although her dear features were no longer perceptible to their darkened vision. Tears filled Mrs. Brandon's eyes, who had long expected, long dreaded, to meet this natural question. Arthur's aunt quitted the room to conceal her emotion: his little Jane laid her curly head upon his knee, and sobbed as if her young heart would break. "Mamma, you do not answer me," continued the youth, "but I can hear you weep; poor little Jane is crying too. I perceive you wish, yet dread to speak the truth. Mamma, I will spare you that pain, I will tell it myself: I shall never see again!"

These sad words were spoken in a tone of calm resignation, which proved that the youthful sufferer had already armed his mind with fortitude to sustain the calamity that had overshadowed the morning of his days.

"Arthur, dear Arthur," replied Mrs. Brandon, seating herself beside the invalid, and tenderly taking his hand, "it would be useless and cruel to deceive you; for yours is, alas! a hopeless case. I have had every advice upon it that money or friendship could procure, but every application has been made in vain. I have hitherto, been silent upon the subject, because I still flattered myself that an operation called couching, might possibly restore your precious eye-sight. Yesterday, that hope faded forever, when Mr. Guthrie, the most skilful oculist in London, communicated to me the sad fact, that the fever has totally destroyed the visual organs. But, 'oh, my son, despise not the chastening of the Lord, neither be weary of his correction; for whom the Lord loveth he chasteneth, even as the father the son in whom he delighteth.'"

"These are the verses you often repeated to me to reprove my querulous impatience during the fever," rejoined Arthur. "Ah! dear mamma, I have often thought upon them since; and indeed, they have been to my mind what medicine has been to my body: and now I can say with truth, 'Thy will, O Lord! not mine be done.'"

These pious words fell like balm upon the wounded heart of the afflicted mother, and at once relieved her mind from the anxiety that had been pressing upon it during many weeks of care. She uttered a fervent thanksgiving; and then wiping the holy tears of maternity from her face, turned to her sightless boy and said, "Arthur, my dear, dear Arthur, you do not know how happy your patient resignation to the Divine will has made your poor mother. I would not at this moment, exchange my blind son for any son in Christendom."

"I shall never see your kind face again," replied the blind boy, in a mournful tone, a sudden shade of sadness passing over his expressive features, "nor little Jane's sweet, sunny smile, I who loved to look upon you both so dearly! How I used to laugh when the breeze played among my sisters' fair tresses, like the wind when it waves the ripening corn! Ah! Jane, I shall never fling off your bonnet and ruffle your golden curls for my sport again!"

"But Arthur, you will love me still,—won't you, dear Arthur. I will tell you stories, and sing to you, and do all I can to amuse you."

"Jane, dear Jane, you shall do more," answered her brother, in a tone of solemnity, "you shall read the word of God to me; you know you can read nicely, and you must be instead of eyes to poor blind Arthur, now."

"That I will," cried the affectionate little girl, climbing his knee, and flinging her fair arms around his neck, and kissing him, "Yes, dear brother, I will be your eyes," and blind Arthur's sister kept her word.

It is a pretty sight to see her leading him about the grounds of Rose Cottage, singing her hymns, or listening with deep attention while he speaks to her of holy things, of that blessed Saviour who "came to be a man and die," that man might be redeemed and live forever, of that happy place where light shall dawn upon his eyes, more brightly and gloriously than before their earthly beams were quenched in darkness. Yes, it is sweet to hear him, while giving his young sister a practical lesson on every flower, turning with fraternal yet pious fondness, her thoughts towards heaven, as towards her proper home. When, however, the blue sky is overclouded, and the twain return to the house, Jane, in her turn, becomes the teacher, and gives her dear brother her latest lesson on the piano, which his newly acquired ear for music, and rapidly expanding powers of memory led him to retain.

Little Jane, indeed reaps the fruits of all her labors of love. She is storing her mind with useful and entertaining knowledge, and improving all the talents she is exerting to please Arthur, and he, the blind and solitary one, thus thrown upon her care and kindness, does he not love his young, but faithful guide? Oh, yes! for when his giddy companions forsake his society for ruder sports, Jane is still waiting at his side, to cheer and amuse him. Sometimes she teaches him to knit, or makes him guess the flowers of which the nosegay is composed she has gathered for him. It is curious to hear how exactly he names them, guided by his exquisite touch.

But there are holier moments spent with little Jane, moments when the world fades from his mental eye, and his thoughts soar upwards, towards another higher state of being: moments that atone for all his deprivations, when all his sufferings are lost in joy. The other day, his sister was reading to him the tenth chapter of St. Mark's gospel, which contains the account of our Lord's giving blind Bartimeus sight, and with artless simplicity remarked, "Oh, that he were here, dear Arthur, to restore your sight!"

"He is here, dear Jane," replied the bereaved, yet happy Arthur, wiping the tears from off her young fair face. "He is with me, 'for darkness is no darkness with him;' and he has turned mine into 'noonday.' For though my mortal eyes are quenched in night, they shall yet behold him in his beauty, at the resurrection of the just. Then weep not for me, dear sister, 'for whom the Lord loveth he chasteneth betimes.'"

OBLIGATIONS TO PARENTS.

If you perceive that anything in your ways makes your parents unhappy, you ought to have no peace until you have corrected it; and if you find yourself indifferent or insensible to their will and wishes, depend upon it, yours is a carnal, disobedient, ungrateful heart. If you love them, keep their commandments; otherwise love is a mere word in the mouth, or a notion in the fancy, but not a ruling principle in the heart. They know much of the world, you very little: trust them, therefore, when they differ from you, and refuse compliance with your desires. They watch over you for God, and are entitled to great deference and cheerful obedience. You may easily shorten the lives of affectionate and conscientious parents, by misconduct, bad tempers, and alienation from their injunctions. Let not this sin be laid to your charge.—Rev. Legh Richmond.

THE COLLIER BOY AND HIS CANDLE BOX.

On May 3d, 1815, a dreadful accident took place in Heaton Main Colliery, near Newcastle-upon-Tyne. The workings of the colliery at the time were at a very great depth. At about half-past 4 o'clock on the morning of the above day (Wednesday,) the water from some of the old workings broke through the coal in the north-west part of the present colliery. Some of the men who were working near the spot where the water forced its entrance, ran immediately to the shaft, and happily escaped out of the pit. On their way, they met Mr. Miller, the underviewer, and informed him of what had happened, when he ran to give the alarm to the other men, who were working in the higher part of the pit, in hopes that they might be able to effect their escape also; but this alas, they could not do, and he himself perished. The water rushed in with dreadful rapidity, and flowing naturally to the lower parts of the workings, soon cut off the only means of escape, by closing the bottom of the shaft, in which the water soon rose to the height of nineteen fathoms.

Exertions were immediately made to reach the spot where the men were supposed to be, from some other workings, but without success.

Three large engines (one of one hundred and thirty horse power,) were instantly employed in endeavoring to draw the water from the pit, but without the desired effect, as the water in the shaft, which was at first nineteen fathoms in depth, afterwards became deeper; from which it appeared that the water was coming out of some old waste into the pit.

During Thursday night the water gained upon the engines, notwithstanding they discharged one thousand two hundred gallons per minute; and when the lowest shaft was plumbed early on Friday morning, it was found to be thirty-three fathoms.

By this catastrophe seventy-five persons, (forty-one men and thirty-four boys,) lost their lives. The sufferers left twenty-four widows and seventy-seven orphans, besides Mrs. Miller and her eight children, to deplore their untimely end.

From various difficulties the bodies were not arrived at until upwards of nine months from the time of the accident.

On the 6th of January, 1816, the first body of the sufferers was brought up in a state of great decay; but ascertained by the neckcloth to be that of William Scott, between seventy and eighty years of age, who attended one of the furnaces. In a few weeks afterwards the remains of the rest were found in different situations in the workings of the pit. There was one part of the workings very much on the rise, where several men and boys had been employed at the time of the inundation. At a crane adjoining the place, there were ten human bodies, and the carcasses of two horses found. The water had never risen so high as the above workings, by eighty or a hundred yards. On proceeding up the wagon-way to within about fifty yards of the crane, there were found two bodies lying near each other, and every ten or fifteen yards other two bodies; from whence it was conjectured, that these men had gone by two at a time, to the tail of the water, and their strength failing them through suffocation, they had fallen down and died.

Who can describe the scene after the breaking in of the water, and when all hope of escape was cut off! The thought of seventy-five human beings all at once shut up in a pit, with the appalling prospect of a lingering though certain death, is unspeakably distressing. They had not died from hunger, as they had killed one of the horses, and had cut slices off its hind-quarter, some of which were found in the caps and wallets of the men unconsumed. They had likewise an abundant supply of spring water. The exhaustion of the atmospheric air by the influx of water bringing with it foul air, was no doubt the cause of death, probably in a day or two at most. Many of the men, and some of the boys were pious, and most of the latter attended Sunday schools. It is probable that the pious men would employ their time in exhorting those who were irreligious to repentance and faith in Christ.

After the bodies were put in coffins, the relatives were permitted to go down the pit for the purpose of recognizing their husbands or children; and Elizabeth Thew, whose husband and two sons had perished, was among the foremost. She readily found out her son William by his fine auburn hair. What must have been her feelings, when in one of his pockets was found his tin candle box, on which, in the darkness of the suffocating pit, or with only the dim light of his Davy lamp, the dear boy had, with a nail, engraved on his candle-box the following touching words:

Fret not, dear mother, for we were singing while we had time and praising God. Mother follow God more than ever I did.

And then on the other side were found the following words, which, it is supposed, must have been dictated by his father, as it bears his signature, though he could not write:

If Johnny is saved, be a good lad to God and thy mother.

JOHN THEW.

This letter, though short, is full of meaning; and, to use the language of the apostle Paul, it may be with truth and propriety said, "He tho' dead yet speaketh." It has cheered the widow's heart in her solitary and destitute condition; and the precious memorial is treasured with great care. What could be more consolatory to her than the fact that her husband and two sons were "singing and praising God," even in the prospect of certain and painful death. Ah! what meaning is there in the words "while we had time;" or while the vital air enabled them to breathe and live. In this we may observe that the same grace which enabled Paul and Silas to sing psalms in the dungeon at Philippi, enabled these poor colliers to praise God under the most awful and appalling circumstances. Then again his humble acknowledgment that he had not served God as he ought, in his exhortation to his mother, "Mother, follow God more than ever I did;" is a better test of his sincerity than any confident assertions relative to his religious state. Lastly we see the anxiety of the father for the comfort of his wife in the simple expression to his son Johnny, that, if spared, (and this was the case,) he was to be "a good lad to God and his mother."

The following are a few additional particulars relative to William Thew, the writer of these touching lines.

He was the second son of John and Elizabeth Thew, and was seventeen years of age at the time of the catastrophe. A younger brother, John, was one of those, who, on the alarm of the bursting in of the water being made, escaped with others by the shaft. William and John were scholars in the Byker Sunday school at the time, and were steady and well-disposed boys. His mother relates that her sons were very affectionate and steady; that after returning from their work, and when cleaned and refreshed by their meals, they were in the habit of reading the Bible to her; and never retired to rest without prayer. Many pleasing anecdotes are related by their mother, particularly of William, who seems to have been her favorite son. On one occasion he said to her, "Mother, when I'm a man, I'll work hard for you, and keep you like a lady." His mother observes that his wishes and intentions have been in a manner realized in the support she has received by means of the letter he wrote to her in the pit.

FORM AND ARRANGEMENT OF CHURCHES.

We purpose in the present number to commence a series of papers on the proper form and arrangement of Churches and their furniture.

We begin with the ground plan, it being the not less important than natural point to be first determined in building any structure. It matters little how beautiful each doorway and window may be in a Church, if the mass of the fabric be unchurchlike; it is of little use to symbolise in detail if the nobler mysticism be wanting; so, all we can do in ornamenting a structure is but taste and money thrown away, if the ground plan express not its intention, and tell not its story of Catholic Faith, and Order, and Truth. But we need not dwell on this palpable architectural truth.

Every church should consist of a Chancel and Nave; * * * * * The division

* Ecclesiastes iii. 7. † James i. 19. ‡ Colossians iv. 6.
§ Matthew x. 16. || Romans xvi. 19. ¶ Ephes. v. 15.
 1 Thes. v. 22. †† Romans xv. 3, 2. ††† 1 Cor. viii. 13.

between these two should be marked externally and internally. In ancient edifices, the Chancel was about one third of the whole length. But we reserve for an ensuing number all further remarks on this most essential part of a Church. At present, we confine ourselves to the Nave, or rather, to the position the Tower and Porch should occupy as connected with it.

By reference to the accompanying illustration, the general form of various ancient examples, with the different positions the Tower occupies, will be at once seen;—and here we must observe that the position depends upon no fixed rule, excepting that it is never placed at the Eastern extremity of the Chancel. In the majority of instances, the west end of Nave, as at Islip, (see illustration), is the place assigned for it. It is (other things being equal) the most commanding situation. The west end is essentially and symbolically the entrance front of a church; the Font was always near the Western door, and the main entrance was generally through the Tower. Unless, then, there be an obvious reason for so doing, we think this custom should not be departed from. When, however, the approach to the Church is not from the West, or where anything would intervene to hide or mar the view of so beautiful an object as the Tower, or when the ground plan is cruciform, as in Snettisham, then there is a sufficient reason for departing from the general custom.* Only let circumstances, and not a morbid love of the picturesque, govern its position, and we shall be following in the footsteps of the ancients, not blindly, but because we are imbued with their spirit.

In Duddington, the Tower is at the east end of south Aisle. In Donnington, it occupies the usual place of the Porch, (which is the position that, in St. Mark's of Philadelphia, the Tower will occupy). In Herne, it is at the West end of the North Aisle. We occasionally find the Tower altogether detached from the Nave, as at Fleet in Lincolnshire, Mariston in Bedfordshire, S. Mary's Walton, Norfolk, where it is, in the first instance, south-west of Nave, in the second, north of Nave, and in the third, (we believe, but are not quite sure) at the west of Nave. Sometimes, as in Ottery, S. Mary, Devonshire, we find the Transepts are formed by two Towers. At Clymping, in Sussex, the Tower is south of Transept. In cruciform churches, almost the universal position is at the intersection of the Nave and Transepts. In scarcely any instance have we ever seen a departure from this rule, which we did not regret; for this reason, there are but few cases in which we would recommend the adoption of a cruciform plan. If the Tower be not at the intersection of the Arms of the Cross, the church has generally a very clumsy appearance externally; and if the Tower be at the intersection, the magnitude of the piers required to support the superstructure greatly interferes with the interior view, the Altar being thereby concealed from numerous worshippers. We do not apply these objections to Cathedrals, but merely to Parish churches. Next in importance to the Tower comes the Porch: and this is frequently a most beautiful feature in the ancient buildings. But at present, all we are concerned in, is its position. Its usual position is, as in Islip, and Duddington, (see illustration,) south of the second bay from the west end of the south Aisle. In large churches, a north Porch was added opposite to it. Sometimes, the Porch occupies the first, instead of the second bay; occasionally, but very seldom, the third bay. We have seen it at the west end of south Aisle, as in Collumpton, Devonshire. When there is no western Tower, a large triple arched Porch, frequently called a Galilee, is sometimes found. It occurs in Snettisham, (see illustration).

The modern practice of tacking a Porch to the west end as a kind of balance to the Chancel, cannot be sufficiently deprecated. We trust one day to recur to Porches again, believing that nothing adds to the beauty of a church more than a well proportioned Porch, and few things mar that beauty more than a bad one.

EDITORIAL RECORDS.—It has occurred to us that we might, with advantage, at times quit the usual beaten track of controversial and didactic Editorials to lead those who follow such humble guiding in paths less dry and rugged. Although we have hardly reached the age for writing "Reminiscences," few can look back, even upon the history of ten short years experience in the Ministry, without being able to recall incidents and facts which serve at least as useful texts for practical discourses. It is much to be regretted that our Parochial Clergy are not more careful in preserving those materials from which history is to gather up the important records of the past, for the instruction of the present and the future. In preparing a history of the beginning and gradual progress of the Church in this country, the most instructive lessons are to be derived from accounts of missionary experience and the biographies of those, many of them humble persons, "unknown to fame," whose individual exertions have mingled with the united effort, and whose labors are only to be seen in the result. We have often invited such contributions from our Missionaries and Parochial Clergy, and we are sure they would be regarded with favor and interest by our readers. With several of the same class in mind, we make this first record as an experiment.

* Another reason, and in these days a very common one, which justifies the departure from the west end of Nave, is this, that if funds are not at first sufficient to build a Tower, it can be more easily added to the north or south wall of Nave than to the gable end.

The incident we now refer to, has been recalled, by the following narrative in "the Presbyterian."

DR. BEECHER'S SERMON AND HIS HEARER.

The doctor once engaged to preach for a country minister, on exchange, and the Sabbath proved to be one excessively stormy, cold and uncomfortable. It was in mid-winter, and the snow was piled in heaps all along in the roads, so as to make the passage very difficult. Still the minister urged his horse through the drifts till he reached the church, put the animal into a shed, and went in. As yet there was no person in the house, and after looking about, the old gentleman—then young—took his seat in the pulpit. Soon the door opened, and a single individual walked up the aisle, looked about, and took a seat. The hour came for commencing service, but no more hearers.

Whether to preach to such an audience or not was now the question—and it was one that Lyman Beecher was not long in deciding. He felt that he had a duty to perform, and he had no right to refuse to do it, because only one man could reap the benefit of it; and accordingly he actually went through all the services, praying, singing, preaching, and benediction, with only one hearer. And when all was over, he hastened down from the desk to speak to his 'congregation,' but he had departed.

A circumstance so rare was referred to occasionally, but twenty years after it was brought to the doctor's mind quite strangely. Travelling somewhere in Ohio, the doctor alighted from the stage one day in a pleasant village, when a gentleman stepped up and spoke to him familiarly, calling him by name. "I do not remember you," said the doctor. "I suppose not," said the stranger; "but we spent two hours together in a house alone, once in a storm." "I do not recall it, sir," added the old man, "pray when was it?" "Do you remember preaching, twenty years ago, in such a place, to a single person?" "I do, indeed—and if you are the man, I have been wishing to see you ever since." "I am the man, sir; and that sermon saved my soul, made a minister of me, and yonder is my church! The converts of that sermon, sir, are all over Ohio!"

Such a striking result made no little impression on the old veteran's mind. He learned that the man was at the time a lawyer, who was in the town on business; and, tired of a Sunday morning at a country hotel, went, in despite of the storm, to church, to hear that sermon. The doctor often tells the story, and adds, "I think that was about as satisfactory an audience as I ever had."

An only hearer would hardly mistake the person addressed.—PRINTER.

Most of our readers in New Jersey will remember the Rev. Robert Davies. He was one of those faithful and devoted Missionaries, so useful in our country, who are content to labor in the humblest service, and upon the smallest means of support. After several years of this duty in New Jersey, he obtained a good Parish in one of the West India islands. He lived but a short time in his new sphere of labor, and his end was a melancholy one. On his passage to a neighboring island to officiate, he fell overboard, and sunk to rise no more, until the earth and sea shall give up their dead.

We have often heard him relate the following account of the small beginning of a Parish in New Jersey, now not the "least among the thousands of Judah." In a visit to England he narrated it to Dr. Hook, who took great pleasure in repeating the story, and we have heard the Dr. give it in his own inimitable style, as an illustration of the way in which the Church goes ahead in America. The title given by the Dr. to the story was, "DAVIES AND ONE."

Mr. Davies was directed by the Bishop, to hold a service in a place some eight miles from his own Parish. The appointment was made, and Mr. D. proceeded on horseback to fulfil it, at a time when the rain was pouring down in torrents. "When I got to the school-house, (Mr. D. used to say) no one could say that I was a dry preacher." After waiting some time in solitary expectation, a single person arrived to make up the congregation. Two were now gathered together, and Mr. D. proceeded with the service. He gave out a psalm and sung it himself, and few could do it better.

He preached to his one auditor, and after singing a hymn, and the benediction, his congregation departed in silence. This strange service became the theme of village conversation, and the next time he had many instead of one, and with the growth of the congregation the interest in the Church advanced. Thus in the place where "Davies and one" worshipped, there is now a beautiful country Church, and a flourishing Parish.

There is instruction as well as encouragement, to be derived from this incident, which those who labor in the ministry should not fail to apply. It is indeed most discouraging to find our sanctuaries, especially where the congregations are scattered, almost deserted by their proper worshippers, when the weather is bad, or other obstacles of a slight character, prevent their attendance. Clergymen are sometimes tempted to postpone the service on this account, or to defer the sermon, or to make some alteration in them, as if the difference between a small and large audience justified such a change. But is this right—nay, is it not very wrong? Is not the Saviour's promise where two or three are gathered together, there will I be? Do we not declare, "The Lord is in His Holy Temple?" Are not these the words of inspiration, "Lord it is nothing to Thee to help, whether with many or with them that have no power?" Is not one soul above the worth of the whole world? We remember the observation of an old clergyman—I will not refuse to preach to the smallest congregation, when my blessed Saviour once preached to a single woman at the well of Samaria.

For the same reason, clergymen are tempted to give up week day prayers. The excuse is, "Oh, I can only get two or three, and it is of no use." But how will the people ever be led to discharge their duty in these respects if we fail in ours? Two or three can secure the promise, and why should these faithful few be deprived of the blessing, because of the unfaithfulness of the many?

For the encouragement of these, as well as for that of those missionaries who are laboring in fields which give but little present promise, we have placed upon record the case of "Davies and one."

The place where this productive service was held is HOBOKEN, NEW JERSEY.

RUBRICAL DISCUSSIONS.—We have somewhat abounded, of late, in articles of this kind. In most of these the editor has refrained from taking any part, satisfied with giving an open field for the settlement of differences in a friendly way. One word of caution to those engaged, keep your heads cool, and while your articles are not too long, let not their temper be short.

We have received the article of W. M. in reply to Principle, but find it impossible to print it this week. It shall appear in our next number. We hope this able article will close this discussion for the present. We feel sure that despite the conclusive articles of our able correspondents, the Liturgy will be read, said or sung, as the tastes and desires of each shall lead them to interpret the rubrics.

We have received a long article, entirely too long for a single communication, on this subject, which we must decline publishing, because it opens up the whole question anew, and would begin a fresh discussion at the close of the debate. On these grounds we hope the friend who sent it, will excuse us, since we act in compliance with the known wish of many readers.

WOODMAN SPARE THAT TREE.—Few Lyrics have been more honored with parodies than this. It does not certainly require much sense or originality to write a parody, but the one we have been favoured with certainly out-parodies every thing of the kind we have yet seen.

It reached us through the post office, in a small printed sheet with this title, "REFORMER SPARE OUR BOOKS!" It is, as far as we know, the strongest thing which has been written against the articles of "P. P." We were considerably in doubt whether to give the palm to this or to the two editorials which have lately appeared in a neighbouring "hebdomadal," also "an organ professedly religious."

These rival productions could claim equal merit for the skill they display in avoiding the question at issue. But the rhyming parody seems to have the advantage in its appeal to the sympathies of the jury in this case. Our doubts as to the relative merits of these rival advocates were completely settled by the following stanza. "The American Sunday School Union" represents "the tree," and "P. P." is the "woodman," his pen taking the place of the axe.

That blest Society!
"Whose glory and renown
Are spread o'er land and sea:—
And would'st thou" write "it down?"
"P. P." forbear thy stroke!
Cut not these hallowed ties;
But let thy prayers invoke
Fresh blessings from the skies!

And then the closing exhortation quite settles the question.

"UNION!" "the storm still brave!"
And "P. P." cease to frown!
For if thou still wilt rave,
Thou'lt write thine own self down!

We take this occasion to thank the Editors of the Episcopal Recorder for their compliment to the Editor of the Banner of the Cross on "his wonted flow of good humor." It is no small praise, if really deserved, considering the various provocations by which this flow is interrupted. We do hope that these friends, in finding epithets to designate the Banner, will keep within the range of ordinary Dictionaries. The last term, "his hebdomadal," we fortunately had Greek enough to comprehend. In this caution we have in mind the old lady, not distinguished for her flow of good humor, who was greatly enraged by being assailed with Mathematical epithets, which she supposed must be bad because she did not comprehend them. Her fury was wound up to the highest pitch when her adversary told her she was "a parallelogram" and kept "a hypothenuse in her house!"

In reference to our playful allusion to a former epithet, the Recorder generously acquits us of the charge of professing to be what we are not, and says,

"Nay, we know to the contrary, and the entire difficulty is found in this short statement—all the Banner professes is, to be an organ of The Church."

If the Editor had told us what we are to understand by The Church, who it embraces within its bounds, and who are manifestly excluded from its privileges and its hopes, we might possibly comprehend with some degree of clearness the nature of the work which his organ has to perform."

We can easily inform the Editor "what we (we who have taken upon us the solemn vows of ordination) are to understand by the Church." It is a question already decided for us, and we have publicly assented to this decision.

We refer the Editors, for this definition, to the Creeds, and the xix. and xxiii. articles as interpreted by the Ordinal. Of that one Church the Banner professes to be an organ. Beyond these bounds it seeks no patronage nor favor, and it tries not, by the sacrifice of the peculiar principles of the Church, to acquire a religious reputation with so-called Christians of every denomination. They have "organs professedly religious," to speak for them, and right plainly and manfully do they all testify against us. We blame them not for this. If they esteem us wrong, if they regard our views and principles as narrow and exclusive, let them proclaim our errors with the brazen voice of the loudest trumpets. And we demand the same liberty thus accorded to them. But with all our exclusiveness, we go not so far as to decide upon "the hopes" of men. We can speak only of their present state, their future condition we leave to Him who says, "judge not that ye be not judged." We say this also in reply to a correspondent who has put this improper question to us, whose answer must rest with Him to whom all final judgment is committed. Where the Church is, we know of none "who are manifestly excluded from its privileges." Regarding men as free agents, we think that all who do not embrace the privileges freely offered to them, manifestly exclude themselves.

With regard to what the Recorder says about our reservation in behalf of "the Episcopal Sunday School Union," we can only reiterate our opinion, that we do not think the weight of "P. P.'s" argument bears against it. The difference, according to our judgment, between this and the societies of which P. P. speaks, is that the Episcopal Sunday Union does not engage in the book trade, and in the publishing business. It has no printing establishments of its own. It keeps merely the books which supply its peculiar object. We subscribe heartily to the general principle laid down by P. P. in relation to CHARITY PUBLICATION SOCIETIES, and if we are mistaken in our exception, we still hold to the rule let it apply to what it will. We want no unhallowed union between trade and charity. The first cannot be carried on without the admixture of evil, the last should be pure as the holy principle from which it springs, and unalloyed with the dross and dust which must defile it in the marts of Mammon.

We are aware that P. P. and some of his friends do not agree in this opinion. But we wish to say distinctly that, in publishing these articles in the Banner, we by no means, committed either the Editor or the paper to all their conclusions. We regard our columns as affording an opportunity for discussing practical questions in a proper spirit and temper. And on this principle we admitted not only P. P., but the only article sent to the Banner, as a reply.

The Recorder, referring to this reservation, says "two passages in our neighbor's article, when placed in juxtaposition, provoke a smile." We are happy to hear it; this is the most becoming expression for the face of a religious Editor. And our "wonted good humor" makes us ever prefer a smile to a snarl. It is an excellent "end of controversy," and as there were several things in our neighbor's article which had the same effect upon us, now that we have exchanged smiles (how much better than "shots") we can afford to be friends, even though we must agree to differ in some things.

CONSEQUENCES OF BAD MANNERS.—The Freeman's Journal of New York thus unites, with Mrs. Trollope & Co., in censuring our Republican manners. We are sorry, however, that we must go to Italy to learn them, if manners and morals go together.

The Exile of His Holiness.—In the touching pastoral of Bishop Maginn, in another column, will be found an allusion to the asylum that His Holiness might find in the Republic of the United States. This is all very well as a poetic hypothesis; as a proposition, however, it makes our blood thrill with horror. No! Sooner than that impracticable absurdity should occur—sooner than the consecrated foot of the Vicar of Christ should bear him to a soil where more than half of the public press would insult him, and more than half the remainder exhaust themselves in efforts to make political capital out of him; sooner than he should come to a land where more than one-half the Catholic population, ignorant of the etiquette that so distinguishes even the poorest peasantry of a Catholic land, would gape at him with their hats on, or sit in his presence with their heels up in the air—we would exclaim with the "Cercle Catholique" of France: "Rather we will go to you—our arms, our wealth, our lives, are at your service;" yes, we love you far more than we love our country or our homes; we are ready, at a sign from you, to chase out those robbers from the patrimony of St. Peter, and to re-establish your throne in the Vatican—but, Holy Father, do not afflict our Catholic hearts by seeing you in a land which is so unworthy of you, and which is too little advanced in the race of the Christian civilization to know how to receive you becomingly? Such would be the language that we would address to the Sovereign Pontiff. But we shall have no opportunity to do so. There are too many nations baptized by the church who vie with each other to do honor to the Pope, to afford us the necessity of meeting him on these shores.

NASHOTAH.

We have the pleasure of acknowledging the promise of another $100 for this Mission, to be paid when the whole sum ($1000) is made up. We hope these promises will not be unfulfilled through lack of a sufficient number to make up the sum required. Those who cannot afford to give $100 might obtain five others, or even ten, to unite with them. We hope to hear soon again from the friends of Nashotah, as it is very desirable to have the whole amount in time to apply it early in the spring.

THE CHRISTIAN'S MANUAL OF FAITH AND DEVOTION: containing Dialogues and Prayers, suited to the various exercises of the Christian, and an exhortation to ejaculatory Prayer, with Forms of ejaculatory and other Prayers. By JOHN HENRY HOBART, D. D., Bishop of the Protestant Episcopal Church in the Diocese of New York. STANFORD & SWORDS, New York, 139 Broadway, 1849.

This Manual is too well known in the Church to require more than the announcement of its republication. To those who are not familiar with its wise counsels, and soul uplifting devotions, the name of its revered author will commend it. All the prayers breathe the Spirit which quickens our Liturgy.

As this derives its life from that which animated the Church, when immediate inspiration had hardly been withdrawn, so those who are most familiar with the Prayer Book are best fitted for the important work of preparing such Manuals as these. Bishop Hobart was pre-eminently qualified for such a work. Let those who doubt whether spirituality can accompany sound churchmanship, procure this Manual, and it will soon settle the question with every impartial mind. We thank Messrs. Stanford & Swords for giving us this Work in such a cheap and convenient form, and trust that many, from its use, may imbibe the noble and devoted spirit of its author.

SHORT MEDITATIONS FOR EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR. Edited by Walter Farquhar Hook, D. D. Part 1. Advent to Lent. Baltimore: published by Protestant Episcopal Female Tract Society.

A fit companion this for the Manual of Bishop Hobart, and sent forth by a kindred spirit. The meditations are all brief, but they are none the worse for that, since in this busy age men hardly find time for short thoughts about unearthly things. Yet no duty is more imperative, and none more profitable, than that to which this little book would faithfully lead.

THE SOUTHERN LITERARY MESSENGER. We have received the February number of this excellent Periodical from Messrs. STOKES & BROTHERS, 28 and 29 Arcade. A poetical selection, from another number of this admirable Journal will be found in our columns.

Foreign Intelligence.

The Rev. Dr. Hook, we are happy to learn, is fast recovering his health.

GENERAL THANKSGIVING UPON THE CLOSE OF THE YEAR 1848.—A memorial has been forwarded to the Archbishop of Canterbury, signed by the Mayor and a large body of the most influential inhabitants of Reading, praying his Grace to recommend the Government to advise Her Majesty to appoint a day "for some national acknowledgment and thanksgiving," for the Divine goodness so abundantly shown to us during the year now closing upon us.

The following is a copy of the reply of his Grace to the memorialists.

"I beg to acknowledge the receipt of a memorial from the Mayor and other inhabitants of Reading, on the subject of a thanksgiving day for the mercies vouchsafed to this country, in its exception from the calamities which have befallen other nations of Europe. It has probably escaped your recollection that a prayer was issued, by order of the Privy Council, to this effect in April last. I apprehend that Her Majesty's Ministers would not be disposed to recommend such a measure as you propose, unless they had reason to believe that the desire for it was general throughout the land. Neither would it be possible, through the necessary official forms, that any such order could be issued in time for the opening of the ensuing year. It appears to me as the more advisable course that the Clergy should move their congregations to that expression of thankfulness which the memorial so justly desires, according to the circumstances of their own localities; and so be enabled to discriminate between the different parts of Her Majesty's dominions, which are by no means in exactly the same condition of peace or prosperity. May I beg you to communicate the substance of this reply, with due respect, to the memorialists.

I remain, sir, your faithful servant,

(Signed)

J. B. CANTUAR.

It is stated that the committee appointed at the public meeting in Plymouth have received a reply from the Archbishop of Canterbury, in which his Grace acknowledges the receipt of the memorial, and states that the subject of it shall have his serious attention. His Grace further adds that he will not trouble the committee to send a deputation formally to present it, but that if it should be desired that a deputation should have an interview with him, he would be ready to receive one at 12 o'clock to-morrow (Saturday.)

From an advertisement in the Record, it appears that the recent "Jubilee" Collections for the Church Missionary Society have produced about 30,000*l*.

The Rev. W. Wayet, Vicar of Pinchbeck, has subscribed 1'000*l*. towards the building of the new church about to be erected in his parish.

A new district church was opened on Sunday at the Union Baths, Plymouth, as a temporary place of worship for the district church of St. James, Plymouth, by the Rev. G. S. Hooke, M. A., formerly Curate of St. Andrew's, under license from the Bishop of Exeter.

At the last monthly meeting of the Society for Promoting Christian Knowledge a letter from the Holy Synod of Greece was read, thanking the Society for a gift of five hundred copies of some of the Homilies of St. Chrysostom.

The Rev. George Vanburgh, late Rector of Aughton, who died in October, 1847, aged four-score years and ten, left the following bequests:—

3,000*l*. for alms-houses in his own parish of Aughton; 1,000*l*. to the Liverpool Dispensaries, both free of legacy duty; 4,000*l*. Additional Curates' Society; 2,000*l*. Propagation of the Gospel Society; 1,500*l*. Chester Diocesan Church Building Society; 1,500*l*. National Society; and 1,000*l*. Christian Knowledge Society. Unfortunately, from a miscalculation, as it appears, of the extent of his property, and from the bequests subsequently made, the residuary estate was only sufficient to pay about one-fifth of the latter bequests, still giving to the funds of the societies the following handsome contributions:—Additional Curates' Society, 800*l*.; Society for the Propagation of the Gospel, 400*l*.; Chester Diocesan Church Building Society, 300*l*.; National Society, 300*l*.; Christian Knowledge Society, 200*l*.

The Rural Deans of the diocese of Bath and Wells have presented an address to the Ven. Archdeacon Brymer, stating their intention of placing a stained glass window in the Cathedral at Wells:—

"As a New Year's gift, such as may not inappropriately record the past, and serve as a pleasing memento to you during the many future years, to which we heartily pray God your valuable life may be extended."

Steam for California appears to be the principal subject of domestic interest this week. Five companies, we have already noticed, advertise in the public prints as in the course of formation in London, for working the newly discovered treasure; and bands of navies are already on the seas from Liverpool and other ports, armed with all the usual and necessary implements for scratching and delving the surface of the earth.

Is it needless or premature to hope that we may not be about to see another South Sea bubble, or even a repetition of the mining delusions of 1825?—London Guardian.

The same paper has the following in relation to the cholera.

We regret to have to record this week the occurrence of a particular visitation of the cholera in the neighbourhood of London, so marked and severe in its results, and yet so isolated, as to remind us of the operation of some contagious fever or pestilence. We refer to the establishment for pauper children at Tooting, where, within a week, nearly three hundred cases have occurred; of which near one hundred have been fatal. The healthy children have now been moved to their respective parishes; and an inquiry has been instituted, with a view to ascertain, if possible, the cause of the illness having broken out.

With the exception of the persons who are, or have been, inmates of this house, not more than two or three persons in London and its environs have been attacked with the disease this week.

POSTSCRIPT.

WEDNESDAY MORNING.

The following are the cholera returns as reported by the Board of Health up to last night:

Districts.	No. of cases.	Deaths.	Recoveries.	Under treatment, or result not stated.
In London and vicinity,	691	359	166	226
In the country,	426	217	46	163
In Scotland,	5,761	2,523	1,223	2,017
Total,	6,878	3,099	2,375	2,406

These returns show a total of 1,866 new cases since our last, and 715 deaths. The principal of these, however, continue to occur at Glasgow, which city makes an average return of 140 cases daily, with a proportionate number of deaths. There has been, however, an outbreak of cholera nearer home, viz., at Mr. Drouet's infant establishment at Tooting, which contains upwards of 1,400 pauper children. The disease was first manifested on Friday week, and continued daily on the increase for the space of a week, when it was deemed advisable to remove the children remaining in health to their respective work-houses in London.

ITALY.

The Roman Chambers are dissolved. The convocation of a Constituent Assembly of the Roman States was to have taken place on the 30th ult., and to be announced to the people by a salute of 101 guns. Universal suffrage has been declared. The dissolution of the Chambers is a step generally approved of. The city was tranquil, and preparing for the elections. Duke Sforza Cesarini had been appointed General of the Civic Guard. Prince Corsini is reported to have resigned.

From Genoa we learn, by date of the 2nd inst., that the postal intercourse between Sardinia and Lombardy has entirely ceased. The letters are obliged to be forwarded by a circuitous route.

The Contemporaneo remarks as follows on the establishment of a Constituent Assembly at Rome:—

"The imperfect representation of the people was at first an object of blame, and then one of contempt; now, no one speaks of it at all. To-morrow the Government will speak; it will make an appeal to the nation, for it to deliberate on its future existence. Let the work be completed with the same high morality with which it was commenced, and that speedily. The Ministry has replied by its acts to the general expectations; and as it has proved itself worthy of the confidence of the people, we will support it in the difficult path upon which it has entered, and together we will attain the desired end, or else we will share the dangers and misfortunes."

Letters from Rome of the 30th ult. announce that at 4 o'clock on the preceding day the decree convoking the Roman Constituent Assembly was promulgated with great pomp. The artillery of Fort St. Angelo fired a salute of 101 guns, and all the bells were set ringing. Colonel Luigi Masi had been appointed Lieutenant-General commanding the Civic Guard of Rome.

The Municipal Council of Bologna voted on the 30th an act of adhesion to the protest of the Pope.

The Constitutional Journal, of the Two Sicilies, of the 27th ult., brings accounts from Gaeta of the 25th. On that day (Christmas day) the Pope celebrated the second mass in his private Chapel. The King, Queen, and Royal Family assisted at it, and received the Holy Sacrament. His Holiness afterwards repaired in state to the Cathedral, where he was received by the Bishop at the head of the Clergy. The members of the diplomatical body, attired in their grand costume, were all in attendance. Their Majesties arrived shortly afterwards. The Pope having remained a short time in prayer in one of the side Chapels proceeded to the grand altar and celebrated divine service. He afterwards retired to the Bishop's palace, which is contiguous to the Church, and thence returned in the same state to his residence. At noon the diplomatic corps, which was joined by M. Creptovich, the Russian Ambassador at Naples, waited on His Holiness, and the Ambassador of Spain addressed him in these terms:—

"Holy Father, on this solemn day, consecrated by religion, the diplomatic body performs a duty in laying at the feet of your Holiness its most respectful and sincere homage. Having witnessed the virtues which your Holiness displayed in circumstances too striking ever to be forgotten, we are happy to express on this occasion the same sentiments of admiration and devotedness, as unalterable as the virtues they inspire. In wishing your Holiness the peace and happiness of which you are so worthy, we are only faithful interpreters of the wishes of our Governments, who all take a lively interest in the fate of the Sovereign Pontiff, whose cause is too just, too holy, not to be protected by Him, who holds in His powerful hand the destinies of nations and kings."

To which the Pope made the following answer:—

"These new demonstrations of affection, and the interest shown to us by the diplomatic body, excite in our hearts new sentiments of gratitude and satisfaction. All the fortitude we, the Vicar, however unworthy, of the Man-God, whose birth we celebrate on this day, displayed in days of affliction, came from Him, as well as the grace of loving our subjects and children, in the place where we provisionally reside in, with the same affection we experienced for them when we inhabited our city of Rome. The sanctity and justice of our cause are such that God, we are certain, will inspire salutary counsels to the Governments you represent, in order that it may obtain a triumph, which is at the same time the triumph of order and of the Catholic Church, so deeply interested in the liberty and independence of its chief."

The corps diplomatique afterwards paid its homages to the King and Queen of Naples, and ultimately waited on the Senior Cardinal Macchi.

We have received despatches from our correspondent at Rome to the 30th ult. Our correspondent considers that the act of the 29th, which we have already reported, has put an end for ever to the temporal sway of the head of the Catholic Church, and observes a coincidence rather remarkable, that the day of the flight of the Pope from Rome (the 24th of November) was the anniversary of the foundation of the Papal sovereignty, the date of which was 24th of November, 800. Our correspondent says that the secular Government in Rome is proceeding with perfect regularity, and that the administration has announced that it is prepared to pay the dividends due in January, and that the claims of the public creditor will be rigorously respected. Count Mamiani was not expected to live. The supreme junta were reforming Post-office abuses, and had dismissed the chief of that establishment.—Daily News.

APOSTOLICAL SUCCESSION.

MR. EDITOR:—

It is a great secret in the art of reasoning, not to go for too much; and, above all, in dealing with septsics or unbelievers, is it important to drive the sharp end of the wedge first: seeing this, they may by and by "see greater things than these." Such was the principle upon which Bishop Butler proceeded, in his immortal "Analogy." He well knew he had those to feed who were not fit for very strong meat; and accordingly he simply proposed, in his own characteristic language, to show—what? that Christianity was true to a demonstration?—no, but "that it was not so clear a case that there was nothing in it." What Butler thus did for revelation in general, may be done for any particular doctrine of the Bible; and as an apt instance, I beg to transfer to your columns the following extracts from a late admirable essay in The Churchman, over the well known signature of "B. T. O." Bp. Oudertink of N.Y.

After alluding to the popular objections to the doctrine of apostolical succession—that it is impossible, in the nature of things, that an unbroken succession in the ministry should have been maintained amid the revolutions and convulsions of the world and the Church, and the wicked arts which have been practised to obtain high places in the Church, and the corrupt views with which men have been raised, to those places, and the base and unprincipled manner in which clerical functions have been abused, and other difficulties on which objectors seem so fond of dwelling—the writer proceeds:—

"As against the ministry, so against the revelation of God, are they arrayed. The infidel, who would utterly expel the Bible from the world, has no lack of arguments to show how impossible it is that a book written at various periods from the time of Moses to that of St. John, could have retained its genuineness to our day, considering the revolutions and convulsions, civil and religious, through which it has passed, the bad men who have had to do with it, the iniquitous purposes which it has been made to serve, the many reasons and temptations it has had to encounter for corrupting and altering it, &c. &c. If objectors to the uninterrupted and officially pure succession of the ministry have, with apparent triumph, asked to be shown a list of names, and proofs of valid orders, in uninterrupted series, from some apostle to the Bishops of the present day; so may brother objectors ask that there be produced an uninterrupted series of copies of every book in the Bible from its original copy to that now in hand; or—which is the same thing—that there be produced the original autograph of each book, with ample vouchers of genuineness, by which to verify present copies and translations. The reasonable man sees that, in both cases, the demand is an unreasonable one. The Christian of true heart sees that genuine Christian faith is a sufficient answer to each. There is a line of historical unimpeachable testimony—fortified by the occasional return to light, in different and distant parts of the world, of ancient sacred manuscripts—to prove conclusively that our present Bible is composed of the very books which, ever since their first composition by the inspired authors, from Moses to St. John, have been held sacred by the true worshippers of God. There is a line of historical unimpeachable testimony—fortified by occasional renewed intercourse with different and distant ancient sections of the Church, long almost unknown to each other, and to the rest of Christendom—to prove conclusively that always and every where—with very small exceptions in comparatively modern times—the Christian community has regarded the uninterrupted succession of the ministry from the apostles, as among the principles of the doctrine of Christ, and in both teaching and practice, has jealously guarded it accordingly; and indeed, to prove that so deeply rooted was this conviction in early times, that even schisms and heresies, knowing that in no other way could they deceive by the Christian profession, were wont to act upon the same principle, and secure Bishops among them, by having proselytes of that order from the true Church, and thus the continuance of that order by and through ordination by them."

* * * * *

"Objectors to the doctrine and fact of uninterrupted succession, should be able to show how and when it was broken. Has it been—could it have been—that is, could the Church have been imposed upon by false pretenders to valid consecration—during the present century? during the last? during that preceding? at any time since the Reformation? at any time before the Reformation? in this country? in England? in any part of the world? He that is not prepared to answer such questions understandingly, is not prepared to urge the objection honestly, and with any claim to the respect of intelligent men."

Yours, &c.

THE RUBRICATED IDEAL OF SACERDOS.

REV. MR. EDITOR:—

I fear "SACERDOS" will gain but little for his "ideal" by affecting to say sharp and slighting things of those who honestly differ with him about it and have the frankness bluntly to say so. His doing so is not argument, and will not pass for such with discriminating people. He must pardon me for saying that his feint of declining a discussion with me in one paragraph which he is evidently bent upon commencing with all his might and main in the next, is at best but an impotent attempt at being severe. There are reasons, and transparent ones, for his wishing the reductio ad absurdum form of argument I have unanswered used against him to go for mere "raillery" and "wit." The readers of the Banner, however, are fortunately too intelligent to be misled in this way. I have no doubt but that they have already formed a pretty correct estimate of the magnanimity, and logical power, with which "SACERDOS" has treated my respectful and fair critique upon his "Ideal." I can, therefore, very well afford to pass such things by. To his somewhat testy, and not very courteous rejoinder, the following is a respectful reply:

1st. I have not fastened my "ideal" upon him but his own as it appeared in the Banner of the Cross three weeks since. The honour therefore of having had my liturgical studies crowned in this way, I must most respectfully disclaim. "Suum cuique"

2nd. My "notion" is that the Rubric which bids the Priest to "break the bread before the people" is a direct home thrust, not a "side thrust" at solitary masses. The Prayer Book elsewhere expressly prohibits them. The universal practice of the Church in England, Ireland, Scotland, and America, repudiates them. In calling, therefore, their prohibition "ultra protestantism," "SACERDOS" hits the Prayer Book, and the Church, not me. When he next condescends to call names he should at least be sure that he is not playing with edge tools. Verbum sapientibus satius.

3rd. He is wrong in supposing that this ultra protestant version of the Rubric "fails to express the particular directions as to readiness and decency" which he alleges "evidently imply that the people are to see." The whole act of Consecration, I answer, can just as readily take place at the west as at the east front of the Altar, and far more readily than at its north end. That the Priest, too, may consecrate here with far more "decency" than in any other situation is equally clear, for were he to stand any where else than between the people and the sacrifice, a most ancient, significant, and beautiful symbolical feature of our holy Religion would be entirely lost. "Let all things," therefore, "be done decently and in order." To say that the seeing of the people is necessary to this end is a plain begging of the question under discussion. That they may reverently and profitably behold the consecration of the Holy Mysteries I however freely admit. It was only in view of my supposing "Sacerdos" had taken up with the popular error that the Rubric means to make the people spies upon the officiating Priest that I suggested the possibility of their being "better employed" than by actually seeing "the bread broken and the hand imposed." From what he now says I have no doubt but that I have misunderstood him in this, and am most happy to acknowledge my mistake. It is however by no means necessary for the people to behold more of the act of consecration than the Church in her wisdom sees proper to disclose. Again; granting for argument's sake (though I deny both the fact and the conclusion) that "the general custom of consecrating at the north end fully demonstrates" that the Rubric designs the people to see all that the officiating Priest does at the Altar; by parity of reasoning "the general custom" of preaching from a pulpit just as "fully demonstrates" that the pulpit is the place from which the Rubric intends the Minister to return after the sermon; and consequently that the Rubric takes for granted that there is a pulpit in every Church; which "SACERDOS" elsewhere denies. At very best, therefore, what the "Ideal" gains in one way by this sort of reasoning, it manifestly loses in another. It will not let "Sacerdos" put the Altar "out from the wall" without forcing him notens volens to have a pulpit too. I beg that he will not treat this as mere "wit" and "raillery" but as a fair argumentum ad hominem. He has already scourged my "wit"—let him now annihilate my arguments.

4th. I frankly accept the explanation that "the Ideal" did not say that the Priest was not to leave the spot where the gospel was read, but the place, i. e. the Chancel." Far be it from me to fasten any thing upon the "Ideal" which "SACERDOS" did not really intend. I, at least, have no pet positions of any kind to support. In future, however, it would be well to guard expressions which must otherwise be inevitably misunderstood. So far as intelligibility is concerned it is one thing to say "the Priest is not to leave the place where the gospel was read," and another to declare "the Priest is not to leave the place, i. e. the Chancel where the gospel was read." His explanation, however, by no means meets the main issue I made with him that the words, "THEN (next in order) shall follow the sermon", do not mean that the Priest is to preach within the Chancel and not to quit it during "the whole of the Holy Communion office." I repeat, therefore, (not with a view to "raillery" but to a fair reductio ad absurdum of this notion of his) that the word "then" in this Rubric has no more allusion to the Chancel than it has to the altar cloth or church steeple. "Suum cuique" to the Rubrics, and Lexicography, as well as to ourselves. I would, however, by no means be understood as objecting to the primitive and beautiful practice of preaching from the Chancel steps. All I mean to say is that the Rubric quoted by "SACERDOS" has nothing at all to do with the matter. I wish it had with all my heart. It is, however, I firmly believe, doing a good thing an injury to attempt supporting it on transparently insufficient ground. I really wish "SACERDOS" would be more intent upon candidly weighing this than upon putting me down. Truth would be best served by such a course.

5th. The Rubric requiring the altar "at communion time" to be "placed in the Chancel or in the body of the church," does "provide" for the Priest's absence from the Chancel, no matter whether it be really a chancel or only popularly called so. In the church of St. Andrew, St. Peter, St. James, and most of our Philadelphia churches, for instance, the altar might, according to this Rubric, be placed outside the rail, just as in the church of St. James the Less it might be placed outside the chancel arch. It is to be implied from what "SACERDOS" says, that this Rubric was framed to meet the case of these "nominal" chancels," which is all the same as to say that the Prayer Book recognizes them. This without full proof I should be extremely loath to admit. If "Sacerdos" however, be right in this it must of course follow that the Rubrics out of which he has extracted his "Ideal" are after all but doubtful Ecclesiological guides. This is what I have been contending for all along. This Rubric is verily a two-edged sword. Which way would "SACERDOS" have it cut? He should have recollected, too, that I quoted the unfortunate permission it gives as an "argumentum ad hominem"—not as one of its admirers. Suum cuique.

6th. I did quote the words of "SACERDOS" "just outside," precisely as he wrote them, as may be seen by reference to my article. The inference that his remark "cut the chancel short off at the altar rail," was not occasioned by my italicising the word "just," for this occurs long after the inference was made, and in a connection which plainly shows that the italics are my own. He had, therefore, better confess to the "two Ideals" with a good grace. "Suum cuique" to him back again. When he gravely tells us, however, that "the chancel arch may be 'just outside' if it be not 'just outside' the Altar rails", his claim to originality becomes indisputable. All the benefit he is likely to get from this distinction I freely concede to him with all my heart. Suum cuique. Surely "SACERDOS" will be too magnanimous to grudge us a little good natured "raillery" at seeing him try to force himself and his "Ideal" through such a very small hole. I hope that neither he nor it have been put much out of shape in making the attempt. If Sacerdos will put himself in such queer positions he cannot expect people to be grave.

7th. The point of my criticism touching "the Aisle" was directed purely at the loose way in which "SACERDOS" used the term; thus leaving it in doubt whether he meant it in its popular, Rubrical, or technical sense. My hit was therefore downright and fair. That he meant only what was right I did not dispute. The term "longitudinal alley" (twice put by him within quotation marks as having been used by me) I did not employ. "Wit" I assuredly did not attempt. "The longitudinal alley, therefore, and also all the wit" belong of right rather to him than to me. "Suum cuique" to him then once more.

Most cordially and fervently do I join him in his prayer that God will bless the noble little church of St. James the Less and all connected with it. I must, however, frankly say that his having improved upon it by his "Ideal" is at best a matter of opinion and open to doubt. "Suum cuique" to him with my whole heart if he has. God forbid that I should be so puffed up as not to acknowledge that this beautiful temple both has, and ought to have, MANY "better" friends than myself. I also from my heart believe that in this matter, as well as in his well-known and characteristic love and untiring zeal for the promotion of every really "good and holy work," that there is no one whom I can more safely imitate than "Sacerdos" himself. His lead in many things, though at an humble distance, I shall strive, and pray, and feel proud to follow. May God reward all the good he has yet done, or may yet do, for His beloved Church and Kingdom SEVEN FOLD INTO HIS BOSOM. "Suum cuique." I do most sincerely trust that the present fair and explanatory tone of this article will bring everything wearing the appearance of controversy between that esteemed brother and his "witty" opponent to a close.

P. S. In my last article for Payano-Rimanize, read Payano-Romanized.

REV. MR. EDITOR:—

In these days of Rubrical excitement, (and if the excitement be only kept within Rubrical limits, it will do good) perhaps the following summary may be of service. Should any reader of the Banner be tempted to feel impatient at hearing so much of forms and ceremonies, let him take it goodnaturedly, recollecting how much zeal, and how long time, it has taken to forget and discredit the Rubrical enactments of the Prayer book.

THE POSITION OF THE CONSECRATING PRIEST.

MR. EDITOR:—

I beg leave to say a few words in reply to SACERDOS, on the above subject, which I shall do as concisely as possible, consistently with perspicuity.

SACERDOS seems not to understand me exactly, in reference to the "established custom" in regard to the position of the consecrating Priest, to which I referred in my former communication. His recommendation, which I consider to be opposed to established custom, is that "the Holy Table is to be out from the wall, so that the Priest in consecrating the Eucharist, may stand 'before it,' that is, to the east." I mentioned that however diverse the "practice among the American Clergy and Architects," it is uniform in this respect, that the consecrating Priest does not stand at the "east front" of the Altar, properly so called, i. e., the side furthest from the body of the Church; and in this respect is the practice of the Church of England uniform also, and to the best of my knowledge, so was the primitive practice. SACERDOS's rule, then, would certainly cause a change in the practice of every individual Priest, whether he had previously adopted the position at the North side, or at the West front of the Altar. So far I went, and no farther, not entering upon the discussion of the interpretation of the phrase "before the Table," farther than to express and support my opinion, that it did not mean, as SACERDOS "suggests," "the east-front," and not caring lightly to enter the lists against such authorities as Bishop Beveridge and Wheatly; I therefore did not say, as SACERDOS misquotes me, that "Before, means to the West front," (although I thought so,) but only that it did not mean "the east front," and so far, Bishop Beveridge and Wheatly are with me, and against him. SACERDOS, I think, also inadvertently misrepresents Wheatly's testimony; he says, "Wheatly and Bishop Beveridge, quoting the ancient Liturgies, say, 'Before, means to the North side,'" now there are only two passages in "Wheatly on the Common Prayer," in which

I find a direct reference to this subject; the first is as follows, (CHAP. VI. Sect. 1.) "And Bishop Beveridge has shown that wherever, in the ancient Liturgies, the Minister is directed to stand before the altar, the north side of it is always meant." (I regret very much that my search for the passage of Bishop Beveridge here referred to, has been unsuccessful, the reference being either to a different edition, or to a different work, from that which I find with the title given in Wheatly.) So that Wheatly does not here "quote the ancient Liturgies," but only Bishop Beveridge. Nor does he in the only other passage in which he treats of the subject in hand, (CHAP. VI. Sect. 22.) In this passage, indeed, he is directly opposed, not only to SACERDOS and myself, but also to his own previous citation of Bishop Beveridge; I may therefore be excused for quoting the passage at length. And,

"If it be asked whether the Priest is to say this prayer," (the prayer of consecration,) "standing before the table, or at the north-end of it; I answer, at the north-end of it: for, according to the rules of grammar, the participle standing must refer to the verb ordered, and not to the verb say. So that whilst the Priest is ordering the bread and wine, he is to stand before the table: but when he says the prayer, he is to stand so as that he may with the more readiness and decency break the bread before the people, which must be on the north-side. For if he stood before the table, his body would hinder the people from seeing: so that he must not stand there: and consequently he must stand on the north side; there being, in our present rubric, no other place mentioned for performing any part of this office."

He here manifestly considers the phrase "before the table," in the rubric, to mean at the West front of it, though he makes it refer, not to the saying of the prayer of consecration, but to the "ordering of the bread and wine;" and this passage more than counterbalances the former, as being the expression of his own opinion, whereas the former was only the citation, with an implied approval indeed, of that of Bishop Beveridge. So far then, from Wheatly's saying "Before, means to the North side," he says it means to the West side, and so is clearly an authority on my side, so far as the interpretation of the phrase in dispute goes; and it is only because he thinks this phrase refers to the Priest, not when consecrating, but only when "ordering the bread and wine," that he does not fully bear me out in my opinion as to the position of the consecrating Priest. I may mention also, that on the same page, he makes a quotation from the Scotch Rubric, which, to my mind, goes to show the correctness of my view; viz. "that during the time of consecration the Priest should stand at such a part of the holy table, where he may with more ease and decency use both his hands." This would certainly seem to be rather before, than at the North side, where the proximity of his left hand to the east wall, might interfere with this free use of "both his hands." And such, I understand, was the practice of Bishop Seabury.

From the undeniable fact, then, that there is an "established custom" as to the consecrating Priest's position, (viz. that it is not at the East-part of the Altar,) and from the ancient liturgical definition, as given above by Bishop Beveridge, which contradicts SACERDOS's "suggestion," we regard it as not an open question, so far as the East-front is concerned. And furthermore, from the liturgical (not popular) definition of the word "before," in the Rubric prefixed to the act of consecration, as given above by Wheatly, and from what we know of primitive practice, we are of opinion that the consecrating Priest is to stand at the West front of the Altar.

I still stand, therefore, on the ground of "established custom," and consider the only lawful question to be between the North side and the West front, being clear, myself, for the latter, as the true interpretation of the Rubric, and in accordance with primitive practice.

But not having leisure, at present, fully to discuss this question of primitive practice, I trust that some abler pen will anticipate any future remarks which I might otherwise have to offer on this point; and I would suggest that a careful examination and analysis of Renaudot's Ancient Liturgies, either in the original or the Latin translation, of which there is probably a copy in most large Libraries, might prove sufficient to settle it conclusively.

I remain, Mr. Editor,

Very truly yours,

S. X.

CHRIST CHURCH, MILTON, PA.

MR. EDITOR:

Many of your readers, somewhat familiar with the position of the Church in the interior of our state, are not aware, perhaps, that there ever was such a parish as Christ Church, Milton. To give a brief history of this parish, and, if possible, awaken an interest in its revival, is the purpose of the present communication. About the year 1793, the Rev. Mr. Hopkins, a Minister of the Church, began to preach in and about Milton, in barns, sugar camps, and on the river side, to large congregations, assembled from all parts of the neighbourhood. If not the first messenger of the Cross to that region, he was among the earliest, and for some time the only one who visited the place regularly. In the year 1795 a deed for ninety perches of ground was given by Joseph and Susannah Marr to John Covert, Matthias Webb, and Samuel Staddon, Trustees of the "English Protestant Episcopal Church," for a building lot and burial ground. The parish was called Christ Church, and very soon a log building was erected, which was for many years the only place of worship in the neighborhood, and was occupied at pleasure by Presbyterians and Methodists till it became unfit for use. For want of timely repair, it early began to decay, and has long since mingled its dust with that of those whose hands reared its walls. The burying ground, about half a mile above the present town of Milton, is still used as such by the families originally belonging to the congregation, and the tomb-stones show that many lie beneath who bore the names of the donors and trustees mentioned above.

After the death of the Rev. Mr. Hopkins, this congregation was occasionally visited by the Rev. Messrs. Plum Eldred, Christian Wiltberger, and Isaac Smith, who were stationed in this part of the Diocese, with still more rare visits from clergymen passing through. But between the visits of these different clergymen many years elapsed—other religious bodies began to grow up around them, and having neither services nor sanctuary of their own, numbers of them connected themselves with these bodies, and as an Episcopal congregation they ceased to exist. There are still however some of the first worshippers in the "Old Log Church," who retain their attachment to the faith of their fathers, and though far on in the decline of life, hope to see that faith and worship revived in their day. There are others, children of those who lie in the old church-yard, that though but little acquainted with the "old paths" in which their fathers trod, are desirous to seek them out, and prove their worth; and there are others, settled in the faith of the Church, who have come from other parishes, and are anxious to enjoy here the privileges they have left behind.

For the past two years, a missionary of the Advancement Society, has held services occasionally in this place, and though irregularly, yet as frequently as other engagements would allow. These services have been held sometimes in the building belonging to the Covenanters, sometimes in an uncomfortable school house, and at present in a large "upper room," known as the town hall. Under the circumstances, they have been better attended than the missionary had reason to expect.

During this time the holy communion has been administered once, to fifteen persons, and six infants and one adult baptized. And it is thought there is good ground for encouragement in the attempt to revive the Church in this neglected portion of our Diocese. Among the few there whom we call our own people, there is quite an interest felt in this work. And the time has now come to know whether it will succeed or fail, by attempting to build a Church of our own. Without this we can do little or nothing. And with what is really a little help from abroad we have every reason to believe we shall succeed. If those who have the ability, could be made to feel an interest in this work, and would aid us with but $500, we can at once build a decent Church suitable to our wants.

Are there not those somewhere within the limits of this Diocese, who feel an interest in the extension of the Church—particularly in building up her waste places—and gathering together her own scattering sheep, that will prompt them to aid us in this work? I know that these calls upon the liberality of your citizens are so numerous that there seems but little hope in presenting a new object. But are they as numerous as the avenues of wealth to the same citizens? And may we not hope that those who have an ear for such cases, believing that it is more blessed to give than to receive, will remember this undertaking in their charities? B. WISTAR MORRIS.

ST. PAUL'S CHURCH, DOYLESTOWN.

It is now about eight months since St. Paul's church, Doylestown, was opened for worship. The success which has thus far attended the enterprise, more than rewards us for whatever trial and difficulty there may have been connected with it. But the entire accomplishment of this good cause cannot be expected until the church is consecrated, nor can this most desirable object be attained so long as there is any debt on it. Present liabilities amount to eleven hundred dollars. Such being the state of the case, it is almost needless to say that the Rector, Vestrymen, and friends of the Church generally are anxious to have this obstacle removed as soon as possible. While the Rector cannot but unite with the Bishop as regards the excellence of the rule adopted by him, of not consecrating a Church until all debts are either assumed by responsible individuals, or actually paid; still our friends of the Laity will immediately perceive that no Clergyman can possibly carry out the views of his Diocesan in this matter, without their aid and co-operation. The hope is therefore cherished that, as the establishment of the Church at Doylestown has been considered a matter of great importance, and its growth and prosperity is a subject of many prayers, they will now "Come up to the help of the Lord," in this good and desirable work, and thus enable us to have it solemnly dedicated to the worship of Almighty God, on the Bishop's next visitation in April.

THE CHURCH IN MAINE

BEFORE THE REVOLUTION.

The effort which is now making to establish the Church in Dresden, Maine, will, if successful, result in the revival of an ancient Parish.

The history of that Parish is of more than ordinary consequence, as it is in a great part, the history of the Church in Maine, previous to the American Revolution. Although a very general article only can now be given, drawn from pretty full MSS. materials for quite an extended history, yet it is feared that the present communication may reach to an undesirable length.

A large territory on both sides of the Kennebec River had been purchased by the 'Plymouth Company,' (as it was usually called,) about the year 1750.

Several German families, with some of other nations, were induced by that Company to settle on that part of their land, now included in the towns of Richmond and Dresden. A fort, built in former years to hold the Indians in check, was the garrison to which they fled on the alarm being given of the approach of their swarthy foes. A chapel in this fort was their church, the fortress was used a part of the time for the minister's house, and, in after years, the farm around the fort for a glebe. There had been a settlement near the mouth of the Kennebec, of many years standing, called Georgetown.

In the Petition of the inhabitants of that settlement, and in another of those of Frankfort* in 1754, to the Society for Propagating the Gospel in Foreign Parts, it is stated that the Petitioners are "a Collection of Protestants from Great Britain, Ireland, France and Germany, as well as from New England, whose narrow and low Circumstances in Life obliged them to accept gladly a settlement on that Frontier; and that it saddened their Souls to consider that they shall find it hard to keep alive the Sparks of Religion in themselves, without the Administration of God's Word and Sacraments; and that their children must be in imminent Danger of falling into the grossest Ignorance and Irreligion, so as to become an easy Prey to the Popish Missionaries in that Neighbourhood, unless the Society shall send them a Missionary to officiate to and instruct them, and beg them out of their Christian Compassion to grant their request."

The Petition was granted. Rev. Wm. MacLennaghan "who had been a Dissenting Teacher," went to London, received Holy Orders, and returned as an "Itinerant Missionary on the Eastern Frontier of Massachusetts Bay," with a stipend of £50 sterling. He resided in the old fort previously spoken of, and his Mission embraced the two towns who had petitioned for a missionary, and also a large extent of country. Mr. McL. remained in this mission about four years, when he left for Philadelphia, and was instrumental in forming St. Paul's Church in that city.

In 1759, Rev. JACOB BAILEY, who had been 'approved' by the Congregationalists, and had occasionally preached for them, embarked for England. Having been ordained by the Bishop of London, and appointed to succeed Mr. MacLennaghan, he returned and entered upon his mission in Frankfort, July 1st. 1760.†

The fort before spoken of, having nearly fallen into ruins, the 'Plymouth Company' erected one on the east side of the river, and also a building three stories high, containing a court-room and other public offices. About this time all the territory in Maine, east of the Androscoggin River, was incorporated into the county of Lincoln, and Pownalborough, since divided into three towns, and in which the court-house was situated, was made the shire town.

Fifty pounds sterling was the stipend allowed this mission. The missionary obtained little from his Parishioners, who were mostly poor, but during the latter part of his stay with them, he realized something from the land which he cultivated.

The services of the Church were held as before stated in old

* Now Dresden.

† Mr. B. graduated at Harvard College in 1755, and was one of a class most of whose members afterwards held high offices. Among them were JOHN ADAMS, second President U. S.; three Judges of the Supreme Court, either in the American States, or British Colonies; one who became President of Harvard College in 1773; and one afterwards U. S. Senator. Eight of the class were clergymen, including himself and Rev. William W. Wheeler, afterwards Missionary to Georgetown, Me.

fort Richmond, and afterwards for a number of years in the court-house in Pownalborough.

On the 5th of November, 1770, after great labor and anxiety, a church having been built, the floor laid, and a temporary pulpit erected, Mr. Bailey officiated in it for the first time. He writes to the Society in England, that the church is 60 feet in length, including the chancel, and 32 feet in breadth. In the course of the next year the church was completed, and in the same year a parsonage was built, and three acres of land around it prepared for a garden.

Pownalborough had become the permanent or occasional residence of a few persons of education and talents, who were either officially connected with the courts held there, or who practised in them.

Among these residents was WILLIAM CUSHING, afterwards Chief Justice of Massachusetts, and subsequently a Judge on the Supreme Bench of the United States. This gentleman and his family were regular attendants at the church, and others connected with the courts were among the number of Mr. Bailey's parishioners, and at times officers of the Parish.

But the papers that Mr. B. has left, abound in complaints of the treatment which he received at their hands, which increased in malice as the American Revolution drew near.

Of Judge Cushing and his family, he invariably writes in terms of high regard and warm praise. But he relates acts done by the others to him, which were cruel and some almost criminal.

The poverty of the people in the region under notice, was made the plea, and doubtless with truth, for their asking the Society in England to furnish them with the means of religious instruction, which they were unable to obtain themselves.

This poverty continued with no material diminution for years. The settlers were Lutherans, some few Roman Catholics, and some Episcopalians.

Our Church stepped forward to their relief. Grateful for the kindness, these people in the wilderness became attendants on the services of the Church, and gladly availed themselves of the labors of her missionary. But this did not satisfy some of the few prominent persons residing in town.

Having been brought up in the Congregational persuasion, they endeavored to introduce that sect. They started subscriptions for a meeting house, procured itinerant preachers to officiate occasionally, and endeavored to divert the church-building and parsonage from the purposes for which those who furnished the money to erect them, intended they should be used. But though these and other highly disreputable proceedings on the part of prominent men in the community, gave Mr. Bailey much trouble, they were entirely unsuccessful.*

The church and parsonage having been built, and a portion of land having been put under cultivation by the missionary to aid in his support the prospects of the Church in Dresden assumed a promising aspect.

But the disputes between the American colonies and the mother country were daily becoming more serious.

Mr. Bailey did not feel at liberty to throw off his allegiance, and his influence with his parishioners kept most of them aloof from political movements.

His influential enemies availed themselves of this opportunity to persecute him themselves, and to inflame the passions of the worthless part of the community against him. They, in these frontier regions, to whom political power was delegated by their principals in Boston, grossly abused their trust; visited persons suspected to be unfriendly to the Revolutionary cause with punishments unknown in more populous and refined communities, virtually set aside votes of town meetings; and even dared to refuse or delay obedience to acts and resolves of the 'General Court,' if they were in favor of the objects of their petty malice.

Mr. Bailey has left an account of his exposures, sufferings, and trials from political causes, which would move the sympathy of any reader.

Tired at last of continued persecution, he embarked in a vessel, or rather boat, of only fifteen tons burthen, for Halifax, N. S., where he arrived in June, 1779, in extreme poverty. He was successively Rector of the Church in Cornwallis and Annapolis Royal, at which latter place he died July 26th, 1808, aged 76 years.

The church and parsonage gradually fell into decay. The cellar of the latter, and the traces of what (as appears by his own account,) must have been a fine garden, are still visible. The foundations of the church are yet to be seen, and, near by, the grave-stones of many of the little flock.†

There were Episcopal clergymen in Maine, long before the first missionary went to Kennebec.

The services of the Church were held in Kittery, Saco, and Richmond's Island, near Portland.

No results, now visible, however, followed from these ministrations. But the mission at the Kennebec existed with but little interruption for about twenty-four years.‡ The missionaries by

* The honesty of the principals in these acts, and the desire on the part of the people for Congregationalism, may be inferred from the fact, that twenty-two years had elapsed after the Church had ceased to exist, before a minister of that order was settled in a meeting-house, which had a short time before been built. Nearly a quarter of a century has passed since the meeting-house spoken of has been abandoned by the Congregationalists.

† These grave-stones are simply flat pieces of the hard gneiss rocks, found near the spot, placed edgewise at the head and foot of each grave. The last senior warden of St. John's church, Pownalborough, was buried in the church-yard. White marble grave-stones have been erected to his memory. The head-stone is inscribed as follows:

no means confined their labors to their own Parishes or their immediate vicinity. Mr. Bailey has left records of his journeys of fifty miles, in different directions, to perform the services of the Church. He officiated at Gardiner, occasionally, before they had any church-building, and probably at Portland. Such of his manuscripts as have come into the hands of the present writer, are very full and minute in some particulars. Copies of many of the letters which he wrote, are preserved, with the letters he received from persons of no small note in that day. A part of his daily journals, sermons, essays, history of the country in which he lived, with no small amount of poetry written by himself, still remain. They form the materials for the biography of a person, whose life was remarkably checkered; they inform us more fully than before, of the situation of many refugees after their arrival in the British provinces, and they are indispensable to the historian of the Church in the State of Maine.

KENTUCKY.

THE REV. JOHN B. GALLAGHER.—It becomes our melancholy duty to record the death of the Rev. John B. Gallagher, Rector of St. Paul's Church, Louisville, Kentucky. Mr. Gallagher died at Tusculum, Alabama, on the first instant. He left his parish, for a short time only, with a view to re-establishing his health by a change of scene. On his journey to Savannah or his return from that city—we do not learn which—he was stricken down by disease.

Mr. Gallagher was well known to many friends in this Diocese, as a former Rector of St. Paul's Church, Syracuse; where his ability, piety and pastoral fidelity,—his christian refinement, and urbanity of manner won him general esteem. His ministry, we believe, was productive of great good, to many who will be witnesses for his worth on earth, and we trust also, for his faithfulness before our Father in Heaven. The removal of another from the ranks of the ministry admonishes his surviving brethren to be "diligent in business, fervent in spirit, serving the Lord."—Gospel Messenger.

"LIGHT, ON A DARK DAY."

Prospects darken, shadows lengthen,
In our onward march, through life:
Thou, my God, our spirits strengthen,
Manfully to bear the strife!

Friends forsake us, foes surround us,
As we tread life's weary way;
Strongest ties that ever bound us
Fall asunder, in a day.

Still, our God hath not bereft us;
We contend not all alone:
While His Word and Church are left us,
We will struggle bravely on.

CAPE OF GOOD HOPE.

Few, if any, of the Dioceses lately erected in the distant dependencies of the British Crown, present a nobler field for missionary enterprise and self-devotion than that which embraces the colony of the Cape of Good Hope. Whether we regard the territorial extent, the variety of races, the differences in religion, or the neglect of past years, and the consequent spiritual destitution, we shall see that the work is one to try the faith and task the energies of the most zealous and gifted of the ministers of Christ. And when we add to this, that it is the first systematic effort on the part of the English Church to communicate life. In the autumn of 1768, Rev. Wm. W. Wheeler, a classmate of Mr. Bailey, who had, through his influence, been induced to visit England for Holy Orders, returned and commenced his labors at Georgetown. A frame of a church was put up, and the building was probably enclosed, finished and occupied. Mr. Wheeler left Georgetown, in the spring of 1772, for Newport, R. I. The Church in this place existed from 1755 to 1772, under the charge of settled clergymen about one-half the time, and had the general supervision and frequent occasional services of Rev. Mr. Bailey, during nearly the whole of the intervening time, and in fact till he left the country in 1779.

Yet so completely had these facts been forgotten, or suppressed, that when a gentleman, a few years since, contributed to the Maine Historical Society an account of the territory in which Georgetown was formerly included, he gathered not even a hint of the former existence of an Episcopal Church in that place. He gives some account of Rev. Mr. McLennan as a Presbyterian minister, and states that he officiated as such, either regularly or occasionally, from 1734 to 1744.

From 1752 to 1765, the gentleman who furnished the account to the Historical Society, could find no materials for any kind of ecclesiastical history of the town, and was obliged to leave these thirteen years blank, although during a greater part of this time, and indeed for some years longer, our Church existed in Georgetown.

the blessings of a pure faith to the benighted continent of Africa, the Mission at the Cape becomes an object of universal and surpassing interest.

It was on the anniversary of the Festival of the Holy Cross, 1486, that Bartholomew Diaz, the discoverer, having doubled the "Cape of Storms" with two small and weather-beaten barks, landed on a rugged islet in Algoa Bay, and there caused the Holy Eucharist to be administered to his crew at the foot of the cross, which he planted with his own hands, and which gave to that barren rock its present name of Santa Cruz. The "Cabo de los Tormentos" was afterwards metamorphosed into the "Cabo de la buena Esperanza," but it did not become an European settlement until 1652, when the Dutch East India Company planted a colony there: and from the Dutch it passed finally under the power of the British Crown in 1806.

This important Colony, in point of extent of territory, is larger than the whole of Great Britain itself. It is divided into two provinces; the western, comprehending seven counties—Cape, Stellenbosch, Swellendam, George, Worcester, Clanwilliam, and Beaufort;—the eastern, consisting of six counties—Albany, Uitenhage, Somerset, Cradock, Graaff Reinet, and Colesberg. In the west is Capetown, the seat of Government and capital of the Colony; in the east, Graham's Town, daily growing in population and importance. To these two great divisions must be added the rising settlement at Port Natal, and the vast extent of Kaffraria, augmenting very considerably both the size and population of the Colony.

It is difficult to arrive at the exact numbers of the diversified population, but they may be estimated in the aggregate (excluding Natal and Kaffraria) at nearly 200,000 souls. Of the white inhabitants, the most numerous are the original European settlers or their descendants, chiefly of Dutch origin, and members of the Dutch reformed communion, whose religious establishment was recognised upon the cession of the Colony. They are a brave and hospitable race, and have ever shown a kindly spirit to the members of the English Church scattered among them. Next come the emigrants from our own shores, amounting to perhaps 50,000 souls. They are to be found mainly in the western province in the neighbourhood of Capetown, in Stellenbosch and Swellendam; and in the eastern province in Albany and Uitenhage.

The emancipated slaves form an important feature in a statistical account of the coloured population, their numbers having been estimated at 35,000. They may be divided into three classes—Malays, from the Indian Archipelago—Africans, the half-caste descendants of an European and a Malay, or Negro—and Negroes imported from Mozambique, or the western coast of Africa. Distinct in their origin, they still maintain this distinction of races, and will not intermarry with each other. Within the Colony, and on its outskirts, along both banks of the Gareep or Great Orange River, are still found a large number of Hottentots, the aborigines of the soil, of whom there are many varieties, such as the Namaquas and Korannas. They are a pastoral people, mild, inoffensive, indolent, and unenterprising; but have proved useful auxiliaries in the recent war. Of the stunted and degraded Bosjesmen or Bushmen, supposed to be the diminutive offspring of those Hottentots, whom the persecution of the Dutch Boors had driven to the caves and mountains, few specimens remain, and they are fast wasting away.

Of this coloured population it has been estimated that about 70,000 are Heathen, and 8,000 Mahomedans.

Along the north-eastern coast is the vast region of Kaffraria, or Kaffirland, inhabited by a warlike race, who have long disputed the ascendancy of Great Britain, and have but lately succumbed, to some extent, to the power of the British arms and the fame of Sir Harry Smith. The word Kaffir, or unbeliever, was originally applied to the inhabitants of this part of the coast of Africa by the Moorish navigators of the Indian Ocean, and borrowed from them by the Portuguese. In its more restricted sense, it is applied to the Amakosas, the southern tribe with which the settlers in Albany have become too well acquainted, but it is the proper designation of a widespread multitude; for the numerous Beuanha tribes, who occupy the interior of the continent to an extent yet unexplored, are not only sprung from one common stock, but bear so striking a resemblance to each other in language, customs, and mode of life, as to be readily recognised as subdivisions of one common family. Descended from the Bedouin Arabs, and tracing their pedigree up to their progenitor Ishmael, they are a stalwart race, roving from place to place, cruel and treacherous, superstitious, but devoid, it is said, of the idea of a future state; inveterate liars and notorious cattle stealers. Christianity has as yet made scarcely any progress among them.

Closely allied to the Kaffirs are the Fingos, the remnants of eight powerful nations, formerly slaves of the Kaffirs, but delivered from captivity by the British in the war of 1834. They are now quite distinct from their former masters, and have fought in the last war on the side of the British forces. A more joyous and mercurial people than the Kaffirs, they may, it is to be hoped, be more accessible to the influence of the Gospel. Mrs. Ward* gives a pleasing description of a group of Fingos, whom she witnessed gathered round a man who was reading a Bible, translated into the Kaffir language; and tells an interesting anecdote of a Fingo, who trudged fifty miles on foot and back again, for the sole purpose of purchasing a Bible from a Missionary.

Our description of the variety of races would be incomplete without mention of the Griquas, a half-caste population of Dutch and Hottentots, numbering many thousands, and spread for 700 miles at least along both banks of the Orange River, while, to the north-east, near Natal, are the Zoolas, a ferocious race, supposed to be distinct from the Kaffirs.

From 1806 to 1847, the Church at home had evinced very little interest in the religious condition of Southern Africa. Mrs. Ward, writing at the end of 1846, speaks thus of the melancholy condition of the Church in the Colony:—

"While English, French, and German societies, of various denominations, are sending out their Missionaries, our own Church does worse than nothing for the cause of that Gospel for whose sake the fathers of the Reformed Church suffered martyrdom. The noble Liturgy compiled by the holy men who perished in defence of its precepts, is heard by few in Africa; and when, by some of its glorious passages, I am reminded of the sacred fane of England, I look round the building in which I hear the service now, and grieve at its being either a dilapidated church, with slight prospect of funds for repairs, or a chapel, borrowed from the sectarians, well appointed, consistent, and creditable in its appearance. The Church—the 'Established Church' of England, as it stands now in Southern Africa, calls for the immediate attention of the Home Government."

In vain had the Colonists petitioned for the appointment of a Bishop, a blessing for which they were at last indebted to the munificence of an English lady. Only thirteen Clergymen, and one Catechist, were found ministering to the widely-scattered congregations of the Anglican Communion throughout the extensive Colony. And it is to be feared that many of our expatriated countrymen were either living in a total neglect of religion, or were cut off from the services and religious ordinances of their own Church. Nor was any effort made to gather into the Christian fold the multitudes of heathen, with whom the Colony abounded. While the Moravians, Presbyterians, Wesleyans, Independents, Baptists, the Rhenish, Paris and Berlin Societies, and the Americans, all had their missions in active operation, the Church of England had none. And while the Church was thus regardless of her duty to her own children, and apparently indifferent to the conversion of the heathen, the disciples of the False Prophet were not so negligent. Travellers in Southern Africa recorded the astounding fact, that in the nineteenth century, in a Christian and civilized community, Islamism could boast of 8000 recent converts, not as heretofore constrained by the sword, but gathered together by the peaceful influence of their pastors, and recruited not merely from among the neglected slaves, but also (grievous to relate!) from among men born in a Christian land, and baptized in the name of the ever-blessed Trinity.

It was to the arduous task of building up the Church in such a Colony, that Bishop Gray was called, in the ancient Abbey of Westminster, on the Festival of St. Peter, 1847. He had to confirm the stable and to restore the lapsed Churchman. He had to provide for the religious wants of a stream of emigrants, year by year flowing to the shores of his Diocese. He had to do battle for Christ against Mahomet, to assault the strongholds of Paganism, and to consolidate the fabric of our Apostolic Church in the Southern hemisphere. And for this work he needed not merely unwearied energy, but unbounded charity; for he had to maintain, without compromise, the distinctive principles of his own Church in all their integrity, and to evince all possible tenderness and conciliatory spirit towards those other Christian communities, who had been labouring for many years, and not without encouraging tokens of God's blessing in the cause of the same Lord. Twelve months have now elapsed since he quitted the English shores for his new Diocese. We then presented to our readers* a letter from himself, containing a statement of his wants and prospects. We now proceed to glean from some correspondence to which we have access, a few details of his proceedings during about six months' residence in the Colony, assured that those friends at home, whose prayers and sympathies have gone along with the infant Mission, will be interested in learning what progress he has been enabled to make in his arduous work.

After a very prosperous voyage† of two months, the Bishop landed at Capetown on Sunday, February 20th, 1848, accompanied by his Chaplains, the Rev. H. Badnall and the Hon. and Rev. H. Douglas, Mr. Davidson, the Churchwarden of his late parish, and several catechists. He fixed his residence at Protea, distant seven miles from Capetown itself, but in a central situation as regarded the churches in the district.

An overwhelming extent of spiritual destitution soon forced itself on his notice. Applications for the services of clergymen and aid towards the erection of Churches and schools poured in from various quarters. Some idea of this may be formed from the two following extracts:—

"A memorial from the district called the Knysna, contained the following statements signed by many of the chief parishioners:—

"The population of the district lying between the Knysna and the Zeitzikamma forest, numbers 1,200 souls. The part most contiguous to the nearest place of worship at George Town is distant from it about sixty miles. The population of the line of country lying between the Knysna and the Zwart river, embracing the Gonhamma, which would be directly benefited by the ministrations of a clergyman, is computed at 330 more; thus the parish would comprise a congregation of about 1,500 persons, many of whom are removed nearly one hundred miles from church." "Then from the nature of the country, intersected by deep ravines and rivers, the roads are always difficult, and often impracticable, requiring large teams of cattle, and in rains great delays taking place, waiting for the subsiding of the floods. Many are deterred from going to church who have not the means of support."

"In another letter, the following passage occurs:—'We

* No. VII., January, 1848.

† We cannot forbear inserting the following account of the Bishop's embarkation at Madeira, where he landed and held a confirmation, on the feast of the Circumcision, 1848. The party proceeded to the ship to embark, after afternoon service, on Sunday, January 2d; "and here," the Bishop says, "by a spontaneous move, a great portion of the congregation followed us, and requested permission to accompany us to the beach; and so I proceeded through the town, to the astonishment of the Portuguese, at the head of a great concourse of merchants, with their wives and families, who thronged the narrow streets. As I was stepping into my boat, last of our party, they asked for my blessing. All uncovered, some knelt on the beach, while I implored the Divine blessing. The Portuguese around us seemed impressed, and there were a great many near us, and on a jetty at a little distance; they uncovered themselves, and some few knelt. We pushed off amidst the waving of hats and handkerchiefs, and kind expressions."

would particularly bring your Lordship's attention to the barriers which intervene between us and our present parish church. We have two difficult passes and nine rivers to cross; these rivers are all dangerous, and impassable in rainy weather, and prove so great an obstacle that the inhabitants seldom go to church, except on occasions of baptism and marriage."

And the Bishop has subsequently had this destitution brought forcibly before his eyes, during his visitation in the eastern provinces. He travelled nearly 900 miles, from Capetown to Uitenhage, and did not meet with a single English church, or more than one English clergyman. Yet he states that the church still has a wonderful hold upon her members, even under the most disadvantageous circumstances.

Within two months from his arrival in the colony, the Bishop had provided posts for the fourteen clergy, or catechists, whom he had engaged in England; and he had written to request that six more might be sent out to supply posts then vacant; efforts were being made in fifteen places to erect churches, and a great desire had been expressed for increased Church education. And, during his recent visitation, before he had passed through more than one-third of the eastern portion of his diocese, he had arranged for the erection of ten additional churches, and the support of six additional clergymen. Mr. Badnall resides with the Bishop at Protea, and is employed in instructing candidates for Holy Orders and catechists, besides doing the work of a parish priest in a district much neglected, where he officiates in a schoolroom. Mr. Douglas has devoted himself to the most wretched and neglected part of Capetown, where he is endeavouring to build a Free church for the emigrants and sailors belonging to vessels lying in the harbour. Dr. Orpen, with his wife and family, has been stationed at Colesberg, one of the most distant and least inviting parts of the colony. "I was much affected," says the Bishop, "by the cheerful and earnest resolution, which he and his showed in entering on a work, for which they will receive no earthly reward; for he is to support himself without any assistance from myself or any other quarter." He had collected there a congregation of about seventy souls; and many of those Churchmen, who had joined other societies, seemed disposed to return to the bosom of their Mother Church. Some of the catechists itinerate incessantly among scattered populations. The Rev. J. Green has been appointed to the chaplaincy at Port Natal, and has been the companion of the Bishop during his visitation; and on August 27th, a considerable reinforcement sailed from England, to share the Bishop's labours, in company with the Ven. N. J. Merriman, Archdeacon of Albany. Towards the income of the latter, the colonial Government has made a grant of £400 a year, and a like sum has been voted from the same source for the Bishop's travelling expenses, and £200 a year for additional clergymen.

REV. PROFESSOR HAIGHT'S

MATRICULATION ADDRESS TO THE STUDENTS OF THE GENERAL THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY.

"Young Men likewise exhort to be sober minded."—Titus, ii. 6.

II.—1. And now, let no one say that the course thus indicated as that to which obedience to the precept of the text will lead, may interfere with the claims of conscience. Not so. Conscience has reference to law; the law of God; the law of the Church. Whatever that law requires, whether of word or deed, is to be done, and that at any risk, or any sacrifice. When it speaks, we are not to confer with flesh and blood, but at once to obey, even though thereby those whom we love are plunged in grief, and our own lives are jeopardized. Discretion on the other hand, relates to the time, and mode, and circumstances of obedience, when they are not indicated by the law or the Lawgiver. A duty is enjoined. If the time, place, and manner of its discharge are specified, no question can arise as to what a Christian man is bound to do. But it is in cases where no such intimation is given, and these form by far the greatest number, that we are to inquire what is the best, the wisest, the most expedient mode of performing the duty to which we are called. Many are the follies and vagaries, not to mention the crimes, which have been enacted under the plea of conscience. In too many cases conscience is synonymous with self-will. We plead duty as the moving cause, when in fact, we are acting solely under the influence of pride, or vanity, or self-conceit. There is no ground of action which requires to be more thoroughly scanned than this, so numerous are its counterfeits, and so deceitful is the human heart. If it is the voice of conscience, it is the voice of God, and must be obeyed, at the peril of the soul's salvation. But let us beware that we mistake not the decisions of self, for the declarations of the Most High.

2. Nor let it be said that the advice which has now been given trenches upon individual liberty. There is no liberty to the individual, but what is permitted by the general good. The welfare of the whole is the standard by which the procedure of each must be regulated. "By one Spirit we are all baptized into one body. Whether one member suffer, all the members suffer with it; or one member be honored, all the members rejoice with it. Now, ye are the body of Christ, and members in particular."* To suppose that any one member of the Christian community has a right, primarily to consult his own feelings and interests, irrespective of the effect of his actions upon his fellow disciples, is to betray a sad want of acquaintance with the leading law of the new and better dispensation under which it is our glorious privilege to live; the law of love. "None of us liveth unto himself."† "Look not every man on his own things, but every man also on the things of others."‡ The liberty of the gospel, is the liberty of restraint; of self-discipline; of law. To the "weary and heavy laden" Christ says, "take my yoke upon you."§ The Christian is not free to do as he lists. He is bound to live by rule. He is bound to "take up his cross daily," and to follow the blessed Jesus in His patience, and humility, and charity. He is indeed free from the law of sin and death, but he has come under the law of righteousness. He is indeed no longer the slave of Satan, but he is the servant of Christ. Away then with the idea of personal liberty, as opposed to, or trenching upon the welfare of the body of Christ. Perish the thought that the individual is to be considered before the whole company of the faithful. Be it ever remembered, that the doctrine of "the Holy Catholic Church, the Communion of Saints," is a reality; one not only to be professed, and eulogized, but to be so embraced as to influence our words and deeds; to be within us a living principle of action. "By their fruits ye shall know them."* "Not every one that saith unto me, Lord, Lord, shall enter into the kingdom of Heaven, but he that doeth the will of my Father which is in Heaven."†

3. Nor let it be said, that to adopt the course of conduct which has now been recommended, savours of timidity and cowardice. Courage is one thing; head-long rashness quite another—as different from it as the miserable paste from the diamond of finest water. Self-willed presumption, mis-called boldness, is often met with; but true courage, the courage to wait, to endure, patiently to follow in the path of duty, discerned by the eye of reason or faith, even at the risk of being stigmatized as timid and craven—this is a trait of character much more rare. When the Holy Paul "made himself servant unto all," when he was "made all things to all men," was it from fear or faint-heartedness? When he was careful to "give none offence, neither to the Jews nor to the Gentiles, nor to the Church of God; to please all men in all things, not seeking his own profit, but theirs," was it because he stood in terror of them, and dared not pursue any other course? No. He thus acted, "that he might, by all means, save some." He thus acted that he might thereby promote the glory of God. He thus acted, because he had the true spirit of a Christian and a Christian Minister; the same spirit which, under other circumstances, led him to "withstand Peter to the face;" to reason with the thoughtless Felix and the wicked Drusilla, of "righteousness, temperance, and judgment to come;" to denounce the sins of the Corinthian Christians; and to bare his neck to the sword of the executioner. It is easier, far, to imitate St. Peter in his early rashness, which was followed by his lamentable fall, than to tread in the footsteps of the meek, thoughtful, wise, discreet, courageous Paul. But who can doubt to which line of conduct duty calls the disciple of Christ. "Remember," says Bishop Jeremy Taylor, "that discretion is the mistress of all graces; and humility is the greatest of all miracles; and without this, all graces perish to a man's-self; and without that, all graces are useless to others."‡

III. Young men—Candidates for the Holy Ministry—Brethren beloved in the Lord—I exhort you, in the name of our Common Master, to be sober-minded; to exercise a wise discretion, while here pursuing your studies, in the formation of your opinions, in giving them utterance, and in the whole course of your conversation with those around you. Be modest, humble, and constant in the appropriate duties of your calling. Have a ready will to observe all spiritual discipline. Seek in all things to be guided by a sound judgment. Be on your guard against the baleful influence of pride and self-conceit. Live near the Cross. Be much in communion with your own hearts. Hold frequent intercourse with Heaven. In the several acts and exercises of devotion, seek to have intimate fellowship with your Father and his Son Jesus Christ, and to attain unto that pureness of heart which alone has the promise of the clear vision of God, and of his truth.§ Do this, I pray you, for your own sakes; for the sake of the Institution with which you are connected; for the sake of the Church of God.

1. Do this for your own sakes. Your own peace and comfort, and usefulness in the Sacred Ministry, to which you are looking forward, will depend in a great measure upon the character of that preparation which is here made for its high and holy duties and services. If it is one-sided, partial, erratic; if due attention be not given to the care of the heart, the cultivation of the lowly, chastened, heavenly dispositions which we behold in our great Exemplar, and the manifestation in your lives of the fruits of the Spirit, "love, joy, peace, long-suffering, gentleness, goodness, faith, meekness, temperance,"||—you will treasure up for yourselves disappointment and bitterness of spirit—perhaps "wrath against the day of wrath."¶ Mental ability and varied learning are not the only, or the principal qualifications for a successful discharge of the weighty functions of a Minister of the Gospel. These may exist; alas! they often have existed; where there has been no fruit to the glory of God, and the edifying of his Church. And this must ever be the result, where they are united with an unchastened spirit, or an unsanctified heart. Seek then to know yourselves. Seek to "grow in grace and the knowledge of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ." "Give diligence to make your calling and election sure."†† "Be sober-minded."

2. Do this for the sake of our Seminary. Its reputation, and consequently, its power to do good, is to a certain, perhaps a great extent, in your hands. Rightfully or wrongfully, men have judged, and they will judge of the institution by its inmates for the time being. What then must be the inevitable consequence of a failure on your part to exhibit that gravity, decorum, and modesty, which the common feeling of mankind demand in those who are candidates for the sacred office? What must be the result of reckless speech, of the exhibition of wayward tempers, and of affected singularity in deportment, and this on the part of a few only of the whole number? Melancholy experience gives the answer. Suspicion and distrust, and antipathy, have been excited: which not even the long unspotted lives, and faithful, invaluable services of our Fathers in this sacred community, could avail to remove, and which exposed even their venerated names to obloquy and scorn. And what has happened, will happen again, if our Students, disregarding the counsels and warnings of their teachers, fail to deport themselves with that prudence, humility and propriety which are demanded by their position as Candidates for the Ministry. To "endeavor, by every means within your proper sphere, to promote the reputation and interests of the Seminary," is a part of that solemn engagement into which those of you who have re

It takes place before the Altar. It takes place under the eye of Almighty God. It is witnessed by the Holy Angels. Better is it not to promise, than to promise and not perform.*

3. And finally, beloved brethren, take heed to the exhortation which has now been addressed to you, for the sake of the Church of God. The interests of the Church must always be affected by the lives of its members, and more especially by the lives of its Ministers, among whom you are preparing to be numbered, and with whom, in a certain sense, you are always associated in the public mind. As on the one hand the purity and zeal of her children, and especially her priests, are, under God, one main element of her glory and strength, so, on the other hand, is she weakened and brought to shame by their inconsistency and sins. See to it, then, dear brethren, that the spouse of our Redeemer be not 'wounded in this house of her friends.' Let the thought of your high and holy relation to her, ever inspire you with fresh resolutions to be watchful over your hearts,—your thoughts, and words, and deeds,—and whatever you do, to do all to the glory of God. Then, let what may betide you here, you shall share in his final triumph, and reap, in the possession of the enduring joys which are at God's right hand, much more than an ample recompense for all the self-denial, and labor, and toil, which fidelity to her interests may now demand of you.

"And I, John, say the Holy City, new Jerusalem, coming down from God, out of heaven, prepared as a bride adorned for her husband. And I heard a great voice out of heaven, saying, Behold the tabernacle of God is with men, and he will dwell with them, and they shall be his people, and God himself shall be with them, and be their God. And God shall wipe away all tears from their eyes; and there shall be no more death, neither sorrow, nor crying, neither shall there be any more pain; for the former things are passed away."†

That ye all may so faithfully serve your Lord and Saviour in this life as finally to attain unto this blessed state, may God of his infinite mercy grant, through JESUS CHRIST our LORD.

GOSPEL TRUTH, AND PRIMITIVE ECCLESIASTICAL ORDER.

THE CALIFORNIA MISSION.

We find that this important subject is attracting the general notice of our Church Journals. We esteem it a matter of the greatest interest to all who desire the extension of our Holy Church, whose blessed influence shall most advance the present and eternal welfare of men. It is a case also which demands prompt and immediate action. While we talk about and discuss the best methods of occupying this wide Missionary field, the favorable opportunity may pass unimproved.

An esteemed correspondent thus urges us to continue the discussion of this theme, and to endeavor to excite, and keep alive, an active interest in its behalf.

MR. EDITOR:—

In your last you seem to be afraid that your readers would think you were occupying your columns too much with California. No sir, no sir. I speak that I do know when I say that there are in this neighborhood many constant readers of the Banner, whose first anxiety when the Banner comes, is, to see what it says about that Mission, and whether any thing has been done. Do not for the sake of the Church relax your praise-worthy, and praise-repaid efforts. Now, it is an honor to be zealous in that work; soon it will be a shame not to have been.

A SOUTHERNER.

We beg leave to correct our friend's statement, that we expressed any fear of occupying our "columns too much with California." We merely said we feared our readers might be weary of this oft recurring word.

The question before asked, we reiterate. WHAT IS THE CHURCH DOING FOR CALIFORNIA? To this we respond, as far as our information enables us. In the first place, a movement is making in Connecticut under the authority of the senior Bishop of the East. The exact nature of the plan is not stated. We believe, however, it contemplates something like the organization so successfully employed at Nashotah. The last number of "The Calendar" thus refers to it.

CALIFORNIA MISSION.

It affords us the liveliest pleasure to be enabled to state that the idea of a Mission to California has met with a most cordial response from both clergy and laity. From what we have heard, we have reason to believe that able and devoted men will freely offer themselves for this great work, and we have equally strong reasons for believing that the means will not be wanting to send them forth on their mission of love. The initiatory steps are now being taken to ascertain these two points—who of the clergy are willing to consecrate themselves to this noble enterprise; and what sums will be pledged to sustain the Mission. As soon as the plan is matured it will be made known to the Church at large.

A movement also is making in New York city. Two Presbyters of high standing, and of acknowledged ability, have offered themselves for this work. A meeting has been held, and the following circular signed by a number of influential clergymen and laymen, has been put forth in order to raise the necessary funds for their outfit, and for their support during one year. They also propose carrying out with them, the frame of a Church and dwelling-house.

New York, February 6, 1849.

We, the undersigned, clergymen of New York, and laymen from the congregations of the Protestant Episcopal Church in the cities of New York and Brooklyn, having, with our brethren generally of the same communion in these cities, determined by the help of God to use our best efforts to extend the ministrations of the Church, to the newly acquired territory of the United States, in California—and it being now in our power to promote this object by rendering aid and support to one or more clergymen, well fitted for the work, who have offered to devote their lives to the same; we respectfully suggest to the clergy generally, that in order to prompt and united action in this great charity, a collection be made in all the Churches of New York and Brooklyn, on the same day—and that the day appointed be Sunday, the 18th inst.

It is proposed that the aid now to be given shall consist in the outfit of the clergymen, the expenses of their journey, their support for one year after their arrival in California, together with a Church edifice, and parsonage, and the transportation thereof.

The contributions so collected are to be deposited with CHARLES N. S. ROWLAND, Esq., 55 Water street, New York.

We regret that we cannot speak of any action in Philadelphia, as yet. This city is not usually behindhand in such good works as these. We have redeemed our promise of attempting to give this matter, what seems to us, the right beginning.

We still think that a general and simultaneous effort should be made, if possible, to collect the necessary funds to send out a complete Missionary corps. Let us not attempt the work of feeding the thousands of California, with the bread of life, upon means less in proportion than those with which the five thousand were miraculously fed by our Saviour in the wilderness. Let us add, at least, five to the two already sent.

We know that questions have been raised, as to the interference of these movements with the office of the Domestic Committee of Missions. But is that committee, unable now to sustain its present missionaries, willing to undertake the care and responsibility of supplying California? It seems to us that extraordinary cases, and surely this is one, demand extraordinary efforts. And we are sure that the Domestic Committee are too sincere in their desire for the extension of the Church's influence, to hinder this by any questions about prerogatives.

We have read, with pleasure, the following article in "the Presbyterian." We are glad to see that our neighbors are not afraid to speak on this important subject in such wise. We cannot indeed sympathise with this correspondent's distress because "the church building was, in every respect, unsuitable to the dignity of the Pastor, (!) the ability of the congregation, (!) or the character and importance of the place." (!) It is, to be sure, a very sad spectacle to see a distinguished Divine, a natural dignity, (thus we must interpret the expression "dignity of the Pastor," when used by those who hold to official parity,) degrading his lofty powers and high capacities in an unsuitable church building! It is also very distressing to behold a congregation of "ability," i. e. made up of wealthy people, compelled to enter such "unsuitable" places! And how trying must it be for a place of "importance," i. e. where they do a thriving business, and where perhaps they have a palace for a hotel, and a temple for a bank, to suffer in character from an "unsuitable" church building! But still we think a deeper cause of christian grief might be found in the dishonor thus cast, not merely upon "the dignity of the Pastor," "the ability of the congregation," or "the importance of the place"—but upon Him to whom we may say, of the most suitable church building—"Behold, the heaven and heaven of heavens cannot contain Thee; how much less this house that I have builded!"

CHURCH ARCHITECTURE.

MR. EDITOR—As much has been said and written about church music, I venture a few words upon the subject of church architecture.

The place of solemn worship should always have something about its general appearance to suggest reverential reflections, and to inspire holy emotions. It is the tabernacle of the Most High. But, opposed to this, should we discover a total want of harmony and beauty, an aspect of neglect, a beggarly untidiness—our seriousness is banished by the wrong done to our sense of fitness and propriety. Let me instance some of the causes which, though apparently trifling in their character, but too often excite our perceptions of the ludicrous, and this, too, in situations when a decent gravity should veil every countenance. An ambitious building, which has been suffered to fall into decay ere it has been entirely completed; a flight of steps, broken and loose, which cannot be ascended without the risk of a sprain or fracture; a wall unseemly stained, describing, in rude outline, monsters and caricatures; a ceiling, partly fallen, disclosing vast regions of lath and rafter; floors, creaky and soiled; pews, cushionless and uncomfortable; books, without indexes and out of modern date; the church music, neither well selected nor well executed; a mischievously played organ, or a dissonant bell! It is not easy to divest the mind of outward circumstances, and the spirit of devotion is better promoted by a due consideration of these minor matters.

I wonder, Mr. Editor, now that so many plans and drawings of handsome Churches are accessible to the public, by means of works of design and artists of acknowledged taste, that Churches are ever built without a careful attention to the graceful and beautiful in art. While nature every where unfolds to our view so many objects of exquisite skill and divine workmanship, let our hearts and the labour of our hands in some degree respond to her. Artists, who should always be consulted before the building of a Church, have the power, if they have the religious feeling, to contribute a plan, if they can do no more; and when the Church to be built is an humble one, and the congregation poor and feeble, the offer would be generous and graceful.

These random remarks have been suggested by the remembrance of a very agreeable visit I paid, during the last summer, to the lovely valley of —. The services of the Presbyterian Church, which I attended, were conducted most delightfully; the appeal was solemn; the exhortation earnest; the Christian's duty was enforced, and his hopes set forth with power. The music of the choir was appropriate and familiar; and the strain appeared to find its echo in the heart of every worshipper. But the Church building was, in every respect, unsuitable to the dignity of the pastor, the ability of the congregation, or the character and importance of the place. If I am not treading upon dangerous ground, the edifice should either be thoroughly repaired, or removed, to give place to a new and more commodious one; an edifice worthy of a people, who, in every cause of humanity and religion, are prompt to act and generous to give.

Let us stir one another up to good works. Let us invest the house of God with that degree of order and beauty, which shall invite, and not repel, the feet of the wayward and fastidious traveller.

FRIENDSHIP PROVED.

In behalf of the Publishers of THE BANNER OF THE CROSS, we beg leave to thank the kind friend in Mississippi who has proved the real interest he takes in this Paper, by sending a list of fifteen new subscribers. Such kind acts, proving real friendship, encourage the Editor as well as the Publishers.

How many who have the kindest feelings towards us, and who often most kindly express it in words, might without much trouble give this substantial proof of real friendship. We have referred to the fact that the free list of the Banner was too large in the judgment of the Publishers. The most liberal policy has been pursued by the Proprietors of this Paper, especially towards those clergymen whose means are limited. No change will be made towards any of these who send even one pay subscriber to balance the loss on their paper to the Publisher. Some return of this kind is but a fair reciprocation on the part of those who receive the Paper, at an expense to the Publisher, without cost to themselves.

We are happy to learn from the following communication, that there is so good a prospect of the success of this new parish. Every one who desires the extension of the Church, must rejoice to see a Church added to the number already built. The more we have, the better for all. We heartily unite in the concluding recommendation of this article.

CHURCH OF ST. BARTHOLOMEW.

The Vestry of this Church have secured a valuable lot of 75 feet in width, by 106 feet in depth, on the north-east corner of Master and Marshall streets. The improvements about to be commenced in that neighbourhood this present year, render this location one of peculiar importance; and, we hope, the members of our city Churches, by their timely contributions, will enable the Vestry to commence the building sufficiently early this spring, (as they are resolved not to commence it until the whole amount is subscribed to complete it,) that it may be covered in by the ensuing winter. It having been found by experience, that, where a part only of the pews in a Church are free, persons of humble means refuse to occupy them, as it is making a distinction between them and their wealthier neighbours, the Vestry have determined to have this Church built in so economical a manner, that, whilst it will be one of the neatest Gothic edifices in the city, the seats will be less than three dollars per annum each! We cannot do less than strongly recommend to the patronage of the Church, an enterprise, in which economy is so blended with utility; and where every poor man in the neighbourhood can worship God without feeling his poverty; and where there will be no debt hanging over it, to dispirit the pastor, and prevent others from uniting with it.

CHURCH AT DOYLESTOWN.—Under the head of Church Intelligence will be found an appeal in behalf of this church. In the Banner of Feb. 3rd, there was an interesting account of the difficulties encountered and yet to be surmounted in establishing the Church in this place. We know the faithful and zealous Missionary has labored devotedly and successfully against many obstacles. He has certainly strong claims upon the beneficence of the Churchmen of Pennsylvania. We earnestly hope that his present effort to pay off the debt upon his church, to secure its consecration, will ensure a liberal response.

CHANTING THE PSALTER.—The Editor had no idea of the length of the communication on this subject until he saw it in the proof. Having received several remonstrances with respect to this discussion he must close it with the present article. In justice to himself and his readers, he must lay it down, as a positive rule, that in similar discussions no single article must overrun two columns.

* Cf. Ecclesiastes v. 4, 5.

† Revelation xxi. 2, 3, 4.

CHURCH AT MILTON.—An appeal in behalf of this interesting Parish, also, will be found in our columns. If the church at Doylestown has peculiar claims as a new Parish, this has equal interest from the fact that it is an old one. It is "the first established Parish in the northern and interior part of the state." Favored with the services of a devoted and zealous Missionary, it only requires the small sum of $500 to relieve them of difficulties and to give new life to this Parish. "Humanly speaking," says the Missionary in a private letter, "with this aid, there is no doubt of our success."

We have many opportunities of knowing the difficulties which our most faithful clergy have to struggle with, from the inadequate means afforded them to carry on their work. The wants of the Church should be supplied in a more liberal spirit. We hope that liberal hearts will be found to devise liberal things to meet this particular demand in behalf of one of our oldest and most important Missionary Parishes.

We have received the following in reply to the questions proposed by G. U. in a late number. It must be remembered that whatever application may be made of the inquiry, G. U. proposed merely an abstract case.

MR. EDITOR:—

For the Banner of the Cross.

The question which was adverted to by your correspondent G. U. in your paper of the 3d inst., respecting the power of a Standing Committee in the case of a layman repelled from the holy communion, may, no doubt, be of difficulty in some Dioceses, but not in the Diocese of New York.

By a canon of that Diocese (I.) as amended in 1845, "in case of a vacancy in the Episcopate, or of the inability or disability of the Bishop, the powers and duties to be performed by the Bishop in matters of discipline, shall be performed by the Standing Committee, except in cases where such powers and duties are or may be especially delegated to or enjoined upon the clerical members of said Committee, in which cases all powers and duties shall be exercised by such clerical members alone."

There being no such delegation to the clerical members of the Committee in the case of a repelled layman, the power of the Committee can admit of no question unless the phrase used in the 42d canon of the General Convention cited by your correspondent, makes a difference.

It is, "There being provision in the second rubric before the Communion service, requiring that every minister repelling from the communion, shall give an account of the same to the Ordinary—it is hereby provided that on the information to the effect stated being laid before the Ordinary, that is the Bishop, it shall be his duty," &c.

Now when the canon says that an ordinary means the Bishop, it declares what the whole canon law declares, where there is a Bishop. But does it mean to say that no one but a Bishop shall exercise the powers of an Ordinary?

We are to observe that the term Ordinary is no where else used in our canons. The term Bishop and Ecclesiastical authority is always employed. It was therefore natural when a phrase new to the canons was taken from the Rubric, a description of the person known as the Ordinary should be added, which is done parenthetically. The phrase is, the Bishop, that is the Bishop where there is one. But any argument of exception or exclusion drawn from this explanatory phrase, would involve the conclusion that it prohibits a Diocese from expressly conferring the power on any body or class of men, during a vacancy of the Episcopate, a result I think which will demonstrate its fallacy.

Now the comprehensive language of our own canon in vesting the power in matters of discipline in the Committee is equally as applicable to the present case as if the Diocesan Convention had specifically enumerated it among the powers conferred. The authority is clearly vested, unless that phrase of the canon precludes it, and if it is precluded in this case, it would be equally so, if there was an actual specification.

A Serious Call to a Devout and Holy Life, adapted to the state and condition of all orders of Christians. By William Law, A.M. New York: Stanford & Swords, 139 Broadway.

We consider it a grateful proof that the practical duties of our Holy Faith are not lost sight of in the Church, when we find such works as these called for and republished. Law's "Serious Call" is too well known, by those familiar with the sounder works upon practical Christianity, to need our commendation. It is a book eminently practical, the production of a mind of deep thought and wide observation, and of a heart which, from a consciousness of its own dangers and necessities, felt for the wants and temptations of others. We have marked portions of two or three chapters from which to make extracts, and these will give our readers who are not already familiar with the work, a just estimate of its value. We commend it to all who consider a devout and holy life as the end of their calling in the Church of Christ. They may learn much from this book, and they will be wise and blessed if they practice what they thus know.

The Beauty of Holiness; the Sermon, at the Consecration of Grace Church, Newark, October 5, 1848. By the Bishop of the Diocese.

This sermon delivered at the Consecration of one of the noblest churches ever built in New Jersey, and few nobler ones have been erected in any other part of the country, has just been published. The following extract will say more for the character of this Discourse than we would like to utter:—

O, worship the Lord, in the beauty of holiness.—Psalm xciv. 9.

The text has a three-fold theme:

Beauty:

Consecrated Beauty:

Acceptable to God, as an accessory of worship:

"O, worship the Lord, in the beauty of holiness." Its adaptation to the present service made quite perfect, by the reading, in the margin: "Worship the Lord, in the glorious Sanctuary."

i. "O, worship the Lord, in the beauty of holiness." The theme of the text is BEAUTY. "A thing of beauty is a joy forever." This was the happy thought, in happier words, of him,* whose self-indited epitaph stands, on his tomb, at Rome—

"Here lies one, whose name was writ in water."

"A thing of beauty is a joy forever." It stirs the immortal spirit; and its pulses, like the circle in the water, spread through its whole eternity. You scarcely note it, now. A bursting rosebud. The evening star. A tree, in autumn. Some special pageant of our western skies. A sleeping infant's smile. But, in another hemisphere, and, at the lapse of half a life, you know not how, or why, "the electric chain is touched;" and it is there, in all its loveliness, "a thing of beauty," and "a joy forever." And who can tell, when Paradise shall open, and let in the morning twilight of the perfect day, upon the ransomed soul, how much, that constitutes its bliss, shall be, in memories of the lovely and beloved of the earth; and things of beauty thus be joys forever? Does it not help to this conclusion, that beauty has no standard; and can have none? Else, were the children of the Father dealt with, in unequal measure, in the thing, for which all seek instinctively: and in which all find chief delight. Does it not help to this conclusion, that air, and light, and life itself, are not of wider sway, than beauty, and the love of it? The green, that garnitures the earth. The hues and tints, that sport and revel in the clouds. The wayward charms, that play upon the water's changeful face. The fine Mosaic, which a morning in the Spring enamels, of the flowers. Or, the fantastic frost-work of a Winter's night. Does it not help to this conclusion, that the love of beauty never tames, and never tires; but still goes on to grow, expansive as the mind, more vigorous with use, and with indulgence still more exquisite? What are these all but hints and harmonies of the divine creative power, that moulds us by our instincts; and employs our sympathies, to sway us, for our happiness? That makes even this fallen world a minister of immortality; and earth, in ruined, yet entrancing, beauty, a vestibule of Heaven? Oh, that we would but learn, by all the lessons, that are lavished on our life! Oh, that we had an ear, like Plato's, that could catch the music of the spheres! An eye, like John's, in Patmos, to behold the rainbow, like an emerald, that girds the throne! A heart, like David's, in the stillness of whose subdued and reverent wisdom, the heavens were "telling the glory of God!" So, in the simple joy of little children, we should feel the power of beauty, in its purity: know that it comes to us direct from Him; and make it but the star-paved path, to lead to Him again. So, should we take the beauty of the outer world as but the sacramental sign of His perfections, Who created it; employ it as the argument of virtue, and the instrument of piety; and find it, as, no doubt, the angels do, a motive of devotion, and the aliment of immortality. "O, sing unto the Lord a new song; sing unto the Lord, all the earth. Sing unto the Lord, bless His name, shew forth His salvation from day to day." "Honour and majesty are before Him; strength and beauty are in His Sanctuary. Give unto the Lord, O ye kindreds of the people, give unto the Lord glory and strength. Give unto the Lord the glory due unto His name; bring an offering, and come into His courts. O, worship the Lord, in the beauty of holiness."

Foreign Intelligence.

The late Foreign Papers contain little news of general interest. We give the following extract from the reply of the Archbishop of Canterbury to the memorial from Plymouth against the Bishop of Exeter, noticed lately in our columns. Of course such temperate counsel was not satisfactory.

You complain, however, of the introduction of obsolete forms and ceremonies into the service of the Church, and of an approach among many of the clergy of your Diocese towards practices which appear to savour of Romish superstition.

You have already been informed by your Diocesan which of those practices can be, and which cannot be defended by the letter of the Book of Common Prayer.

I could certainly have wished that the younger clergy, to whom your remarks are chiefly applicable, had thought themselves at liberty, to follow the usage of their predecessors and the example of the great majority of their brethren at the present day;—so as to acquiesce in those slight deviations from the Rubric which custom had sanctioned and which had not been reprobated by competent authority. I could have wished they had considered the Apostle's example applicable to their case, and in non-essential things had yielded to the feelings of the people as he yielded to those of the Jews, for the sake of avoiding offence and gaining confidence. Especially I regret the introduction into our parish Churches of a mode of worship which, however proper and suitable in our Cathedrals, appears too artificial and elaborate for simple and general devotion.

But, on the other hand, I am bound to respect conscientious scruples, even though I cannot participate in them. These clergy assured me that they consider themselves fettered by directions which, in their judgment, the Church to which they have promised obedience, requires them to observe.

Your memorial alludes to this and expresses a desire that the attention of the Legislature should be called towards the subject, and a bill be introduced with the concurrence of ecclesiastical authorities for securing certain specific objects which you consider expedient in the present circumstances of the Church.

The time may possibly arrive when such a change as you contemplate might be effected, without occasioning far greater evils than those which we wish to remedy. It must, however, be generally acknowledged, that such a time is not yet come.

A season of excitement is not a season for reasonable deliberation. Men judge of these things, not according to their actual value, but according to the value which they themselves attach to them. And, after all, differences of real importance, differences in the tone and spirit of public teaching, can never be prevented by any law, or any form of articles or prayers. If the doctrine were erroneous, it would little signify in what dress it were delivered, or with what form it was accompanied; whilst, on the other hand, if the minister be diligent in his duties and faithful in his instructions, we may readily excuse the addition of a gesture, or the omission of a prayer.

I can scarcely hope that these remarks will prove satisfactory to those who seem to have expected more from my interference than I possess the power or see the possibility of accomplishing. I can only entreat them to unite with me in supplicating the Great Head of the Church, that He may grant to every member of the same, in his vocation and ministry, the spirit of a sound mind and a right judgment, that they may approve things that are really "excellent and pertain to life and godliness," rather than things of "doubtful disputation," ever remembering, that "the end of the commandment is charity, and that the fruits of righteousness are sown in peace of them that make peace."

Lambeth, December 30th, 1848.

ITALY.

We have received accounts from Rome to the 7th of January. Cardinals Feretti and Altieri, two of the most influential members of the Sacred College, had arrived at Rome four days previously, from Gaeta, and were the bearers of proposals from the Pope of a conciliatory nature. Among the proposals is that of an amnesty to all political offenders, with the exception of the murderers of M. Rossi. It was said that the most able and influential leaders of the movement, and among others, the Minister, M. Sterbini, had replied that they had it not in their power to induce the members of the ultra-democratic clubs to accept those conditions, however reasonable they might be, without the assistance of an armed force acting in the name of the Pope.

In consequence of the arrival of the cardinals, Prince Corsini and the whole of the municipality of Rome had given in their resignations, and a deputation of all the parochial Clergy of Rome had gone to Gaeta. It was reported that the Pope had excommunicated the Roman people; but this report is contradicted by the friends of his Holiness.

The Pope is still at Gaeta. He has virtually excommunicated the Romans, who have tossed the act of excommunication into the river Tiber. His Holiness has refused the Sardinian and Spanish intervention, and has demanded the assistance of Austria. The King of SARDINIA has protested against Spanish interference in Italy. The King of NAPLES is said to have been shot at, and to have had his horse killed under him.—En. Ch.

CHANTING THE PSALTER.

MR. EDITOR:—

At the time of sending to the Banner my extract from Bishop White's Memoirs upon Chanting the Psalter I had very little thought of entering into a controversy upon this subject. Moreover, the present difficulty was first started between SACERDOS and PRINCIPLE: my action in the matter was more that of a looker-on, than of a party immediately concerned. However, in accordance with my expressed wish PRINCIPLE, as it seems from to-day's Banner, has taken some notice of my communication contained in the number for December 6th. It also seems that in doing this he has pointed his battery off from SACERDOS directly on to me. Such being the state of affairs, I have now much less inclination to withdraw from the discussion, than I had to enter upon it. Upon two conditions therefore I shall be happy to have a friendly argument with PRINCIPLE. The first is, that SACERDOS will not consider me as officiously interfering with his business. The second is, that as soon as the Editor of the Banner shall think that his readers have had enough of the discussion he will inform me of it, that I may not weary them with further communications upon the subject. If SACERDOS gives me no intimation to the contrary, I shall act upon the belief, that in consequence of his many higher duties, he is willing that I should take up this matter. The second condition I shall take for granted will be fulfilled. In the meantime I shall proceed to answer PRINCIPLE's communication of to-day.

First let me thank him for the two courteous acknowledgments in the beginning of this article; although the second contains an expression of thanks for what I never gave him—"Help to the cause he so poorly advocates." And now for his arguments!

The ground from the first taken by him against Chanting the Psalter in our Daily Service, which ground he still adheres to, is, that the word "read," as used in the rubric bearing upon the point, excludes the practice. The ground taken in opposition to this was, that as in the Liturgies from which this word was taken into our own, it bore no such exclusive sense, the burden of proof with respect to the point at issue rested upon PRINCIPLE. To this he replies, "This is a very extraordinary position to take. A writer (SACERDOS) makes an assertion, giving a definition to a word contrary to the usage of the literary world, and I am seriously called upon to prove that the reviewers of our Common Prayer did not write the rubrics of the same in accordance with this forced construction."

Whether or not the position is extraordinary in the sense in which PRINCIPLE thinks it so, altogether depends upon whether the statement be true or false in which the position was asserted. If the word "read," as used in the Liturgies from which it was transferred into our own, has always included permission to sing, then notwithstanding PRINCIPLE's disclaimer, the burden of proof does rest upon him. That such is the case, with respect to the signification of this word, I must believe was made clear to all unbiassed judges in the subsequent part of the communication in which the assertion was made. PRINCIPLE, however, does not see this in the same light, and I am willing to try to make it clearer to him.

One of the difficulties in the way of his comprehending the fact is expressed by him as follows: "If one rubric directs a certain portion to be read, and another directs the same, or the like, to be said or sung, where is the perplexity? read or sing as taste or circumstances may permit."

I have italicised the clause, "or the like," because it speaks an important truth which, if PRINCIPLE will only carefully look at, it will help to clear the way for the more straight-forward operation of his mind. He is referring to one evidence adduced in my article of the indiscriminate use of the words "read," "say," and "sing," it being directed in the first Liturgy of Edward VI. that the Venite "shall be said or sung," and that "after the first Lesson shall follow Te Deum;" and again, in the same book, that "shall be used Benedictus," but in the second book, that "shall be used and said Benedictus." My position with regard to these rubrical differences was, as expressed in the Banner of Jan. 6th, that "it is impossible to conclude that a difference in meaning is always intended by such changes in the wording of rubrics as these. For both changes of this sort and omissions, where the same sense is evidently designed, too often occur to admit of any such custom of interpretation." In this I now find PRINCIPLE unintentionally supporting me, though I needed no aid. In his honesty he was obliged to insert the clause, "or the like," because he could not help admitting the fact that the English Liturgies did intend to permit those portions of the services to be sung which are like to others which are more expressly appointed to be sung, although the word sung occur not in the rubrical directions for the former. He allows that "if one rubric directs a certain portion to be read, and another directs the same, or the like, to be said or sung," there is no perplexity; "read or sing," he says, "as taste or circumstances may permit." Why, my dear friend PRINCIPLE, this is exactly what I have all along been contending for! How happens it we are both on the same side? I have certainly not moved from my place. Do you not now perceive the application of your own argument to the question between us? Thus it stands, "If one rubric" (in our Prayer Book) "directs a certain portion" (the Psalter) "to be read, and another directs the same, or the like," (the Venite, the Gloria in Excelsis, the TE DEUM, the Benedicite, Cantate, Bonum est, Deus miseratur, Benedic, and above all the selections in that favorite Thanksgiving Service) "to be said or sung, where is the perplexity? read or sing as taste or circumstances may permit." And now, too, Mr. Editor, I hope our friend will see the real bearing of his own subsequent words, which like the former must have sprung forth from his honesty, in spite of his mistaken zeal for a wrong theory. "Say and said," he continues, "are frequently used in the construction of the rubrics, evidently to avoid the frequent repetition of the word 'read.' 'Used,' 'follow,' &c., are likewise introduced instead of repeating former directions;" (just as "read" is, to avoid the frequent repetition of "said or sung," he might have added.) The most vigorous advocate of Chanting the Psalter could not have stated the fact more correctly. As for the little difficulty immediately afterwards urged—"If the reviewers understood and adopted Sacrosanct's view of the word read, and studied the brevity that W. M. would have us think they did, why use the synonyme 'say' with its almost affix 'sing,' if the word read comprehends both?"—it is easily answered in his own words already quoted, "To avoid the frequent repetition of the word 'read,'" which is not at all inconsistent with the general tendency towards abbreviation so manifest in our rubrics as compared with those of the English Book.

There are still some obstacles in the way of PRINCIPLE'S rubrical discernment, which I must try to remove. He will not admit my argument from the Cathedral practice in England; "Before W. M.," he says, "arraigns the Bishops of England he should try at least to show that there has not been some special provision made for the Cathedral service of England; he must be aware that the order of a king is authority in that country. And in the absence of documentary evidence on the subject, I prefer to err, if at all, in favor of the Bishops, and believe that in so long a line of Kings and Queens, some music-loving ruler might be found who gave the requisite authority."

Here I must first protest against being charged with arraigning the Bishops of England. I did not arraign them; on the contrary my argument was based upon the conviction that what they did was certainly right. I hope PRINCIPLE will not take offence, but I must throw the responsibility of all such arraignment in the matter upon his shoulders, and I insist upon it, that holding his theory of the mode in which the Church services are required by the rubrics to be conducted, he does, ipso facto, arraign the English Bishops and the whole English Church.

Secondly, it is my turn to declare—and this with more reason than appeared in the instance before mentioned—that "this" (demand of proof) "is a very extraordinary position to take." What! does PRINCIPLE refuse to accept the ancient and common practice, continued to this day, of the highest ecclesiastical authorities in England, as evidence of what is admissible under their laws, unless I, W. M., a poor unknown Candidate for holy Orders in the American Church, shall first search, if necessary, every English book of history, and every document, record and work, civil and ecclesiastical, written since the compilation of King Edward's first Liturgy, and now extant, and "show there has not been some special provision made for the Cathedral service of England?" Truly, Mr. Editor, this is making one prove a negative with as little mercy to him of whom it is required, as regard for the rules of logic. With my opponent's permission, or if necessary without it, I decline the illogical position, and must, with all proper deference, throw the burden of proof as to this point where it really belongs—on our good friend PRINCIPLE. He may, if he pleases, show that injunctions have been issued for singing the whole service in England, but I warn him beforehand that he can in this way add nothing to the strength of his cause.

But again, my opponent says, "The Cathedral service of England cannot be admitted as evidence; we have no Cathedrals." He seems to think that in England the Choral Service is lawful only in Cathedrals. He is mistaken. It is more commonly adopted in Cathedrals, but it is lawful in all Churches. Jebb in his valuable work on the Choral Service says, "There is no law whatever of the Church, which forbids any portion, or the whole, of the Cathedral mode to be adopted in any Church. For its use or rejection a wise discretion, and a charitable consideration of circumstances, are the only restraining laws." And again, "All the parts, without exception, directed 'to be sung' or 'said,' ought to be sung in choirs: the apparent alternative being merely a recognition of the system usually adopted in Parish Churches, and restricted to them." And again, "The difference, indeed, between the performance of the ordinary Parochial and Cathedral Service seems to have consisted rather in the degree, than in the principle." Dyce's remarks in an admirable standard work on the same subject, give similar evidence to the same point: "The terms," he says, "in which the rubrics are expressed must be interpreted according to their technico-ecclesiastical meaning in the 16th century. * * * It was not necessary, therefore, that the direction 'to be sung' should in every case be prefixed to portions of the office really intended to be sung in plain tune. To 'say,' or to 'use and say' the service signified that it was to be said after the use of some diocese or province, which use was one of singing as well as saying. If there were no choir, it signified recitation in the ordinary tone of voice. * * * In few words, the rubric to 'say,' 'use,' or 'read,' signifies in choral language, to sing in some manner appropriate to the particular office; and, accordingly, the direction to be 'said or sung' is not so much an order to sing those portions of the service which the direction precedes, as a license to read them in the ordinary tone of voice, provided there is no choir. If there be any singing at all, those portions are to have the preference; if not, they, as well as the rest, may be read in the usual voice;" and in a note he says, "It will be seen that three cases are thus contemplated: first, that of cathedrals or collegiate churches having complete choirs, in which the whole service is to be chanted or used chorally; the second, that of churches with imperfect choral arrangements,—in these the portions to be sung in preference to others are indicated by the direction to be 'said or sung'; and, lastly, the case of churches or chapels in which there is no singing, whose circumstances are provided for by the license to read those parts of the Liturgy which, if any, ought properly to be sung."

PRINCIPLE has yet another difficulty: he cannot understand the force of my argument taken from the first book of Edward, in proof that, as in the case of the Lessons, "read," "say," and "sing" may all be applied in the rubrics to singing. "Because," says he, "the two words said and read, are used to have the lessons read 'distinctly' 'with a loud voice,' and an additional one is needed to have them sung, W. M. concludes that all three permit the lessons to be sung! The conclusion is absurd. I think it proves conclusively that the first and second words were used to express the same thing, viz., read, and that if the third had not been added, or rather introduced, the lessons could not have been sung."

The quotations just given from Jebb and Dyce may help PRINCIPLE along here. He has however misunderstood my argument exactly in the same way that he and Z. misunderstood the argument of SACROSANCT some time ago. I never maintained that "said" or "read" in the case before us required the Lessons to be sung, but that they permitted them to be. If PRINCIPLE will persist in misunderstanding this point we shall have a good deal of trouble in getting along together. The additional direction to "sing" the Lessons, made obligatory what without this direction would have been merely permitted. My opponent will pardon me then I hope for not thinking with him that the conclusion that all these words include permission to sing, is absurd; especially as the rubric which directs that the Lessons shall "be sung in a plain tune, after the manner of distinct reading," shows as plainly as possible, that in the Church's view, plain tune is after the manner of distinct reading. Therefore, reading and saying being according to PRINCIPLE'S theory the same, and according to the authority of the Church, predicable of the same practice—singing; my argument holds good in itself, and is by PRINCIPLE turned into a weapon against his own cause.

Our good friend adds, "Now if these compilers understood the word 'reading' to express 'singing,' they certainly would not have directed the singing to be as near as possible (so I understand it,) to reading, 'to the end the people may the better hear.'"

This is a complete subversion of the order of the rubric. It does not stand thus, "and in such places where they do sing, there shall the Lessons be sung in a plain tune, after the manner of distinct reading, to the end the people may the better hear," as PRINCIPLE understands it; but, "and (to the end the people may the better hear) in such places where they do sing, there shall the Lessons be sung in a plain tune, after the manner of distinct reading." And this is agreeable to the fact of which every one who knows any thing about reading in large Churches is aware, that intoning is the only way in which men of ordinary strength of lungs can, without physical suffering, fill such Churches. Therefore, PRINCIPLE to the contrary notwithstanding, the fact of their "requiring a tune to raise their voices," is no proof that "they had wretched readers in those days."

PRINCIPLE asks, "Will W. M. inform us when this state of things was changed? The present rubric in the English service directs the Lessons to 'be read distinctly with an audible voice, . . . he that readeth, so standing and turning himself, as he may best be heard of all such as are present.'"

"The singing part was expunged, but when, my book telleth not."

Though it is part of a sad story, W. M. will, with pleasure, inform PRINCIPLE when, and under what circumstances, the form of this rubric was changed. But it is impossible for him to say when the practice of singing the Lessons (if this is what PRINCIPLE means by "this state of things,") was given up, inasmuch as, notwithstanding that the change in the rubric has removed the obligation to sing them, the practice has continued the same to this day.

In an unhappy condescension to the wretched outcry of the Puritans against the Book of Common Prayer, "On the 1st of March, 1641, the house of lords appointed a committee consisting of ten earls, ten bishops, and ten lay-barons, to 'take into consideration all innovations in the Church respecting religion.'" Of this committee, the author from whom I have taken this extract says, "It is probable that the greater number of them entered upon their task with views derived altogether from the strange necessities of the times, rather than in compliance with their own deliberate judgment. They were aware that the torch was already uplifted for the destruction of the sacred edifice, and they were willing to remove those outworks which, though employed formerly in its defence, would be now most likely to fall into the hands of the assailant. * * * In the ensuing month of May they found that motions were entertained in the house of commons, which left no further doubt as to the impending ruin of the established Church, and their undertaking was abandoned." Further, in "A copy of the proceedings of some worthy and learned divines" (those of the committee just mentioned,) "touching innovations in the doctrine and discipline of the Church of England; together with considerations upon the Common Prayer Book," under the head of "Considerations upon the Book of Common Prayer," I find the following question proposed: "Whether the rubrick should not be mended, where it is, that the Lessons should be sung in a plain tune; why not, read with a distinct voice?" After summing up the alterations proposed, the historian from whom I quote continues, "Such were the alterations approved by the committee of divines; and their decision, though unavailing with reference to its immediate object, became a record to be quoted as authority by future non-conformists, and to be lamented by the orthodox party as one of the many causes that weakened the defences of the Church, and led, by certain consequence, to its overthrow." Affairs continued in this distracted state until the time of the Savoy Conference in 1661. Among "the exceptions against the Book of Common Prayer," at this time brought forward by the Puritans, I find the following against the form of the rubric we are considering, "¶ The Lessons, and the Epistles, and Gospels, being for the most part neither psalms nor hymns, we know no warrant why they should be sung in any place, and conceive that the distinct reading of them with an audible voice tends more to the edification of the Church." Among the answers of the Bishops to these miserable exceptions, is the following: "¶ In such places where they do sing, &c. The rubric directs only such singing as is after the manner of distinct reading, and we never heard of any inconvenience thereby, and therefore conceive this demand needless." Nevertheless the alteration, with many others, was afterwards made in the Convocation which had begun to sit during the session of the Conference, "¶ and, finally," (thus altered,) "on the 20th of December, 1661, the Book of Common Prayer was adopted and subscribed by the clergy of both houses of convocation and of both provinces." The spirit in which this, and all the other alterations alluded to, were made, is manifest from the further remarks of the same historian; "¶ It will be observed," says he, "that in this long enumeration there is no mention of any of those characteristic points which had been the subjects of strife and division in the Church from the earliest days of Puritanism. * * * All these and several others had been conceded by the committee of 1641; they had also been virtually withdrawn by the royal declaration of October, 1660; and some of them had been abandoned by the bishops in the Savoy Conference. But they were all of them retained and confirmed by the Act of Uniformity, on the plea that the non-conformists had lost whatever claim they might once have had for consideration and forbearance, and that the other party, consisting at once of the orthodox and the royalists, saw nothing in such alterations but inconvenience and error. And this feeling was so strong, both in convocation and in parliament, that several changes of an opposite character were approved, which could not fail to be galling to the Presbyterians."

This is an outline of the history of this rubrical change. Ever since the change was made, those in authority in the Church of England who disliked singing the Lessons, have availed themselves of the liberty thus granted, and those who preferred to practice as if still under the old obligation, have continued to do so.

PRINCIPLE of course has not seen my answer in to-day's Banner to his remarks upon my extract from Bishop White. As however in the first part of his present communication he expresses dissent from my inference from the Bishop's observations, I will add another proof to what I have already given, that in rejecting the Bishop's plan of reading the Psalter, the American reviewers had no intention of rejecting the liberty to sing the daily psalms. As appears in my communication in to-day's Banner, the discussion as to how the Psalter should be read was first carried on in the Convention of 1785. Now in 1786 the proposed Book of Common Prayer was published; in this the rubric prefixed to the Psalter reads thus, "Those portions of the following Psalter which are severally entitled Part I. shall be said or sung in the morning, and those entitled Part II. in the evening of their respective days: but where it is not convenient to have Divine Service more than once in the day, both parts may be said or sung, if time will permit; or the first portions or parts may be said or sung in one month, and the second portions or parts in the month following; and so on alternately throughout the year."

I will also give another proof that reading was understood to include singing. The Psalter, though permitted to be sung by express rubrical enactment, has commonly been called "reading Psalms," to distinguish it from the metrical Psalms which were always sung and never read in the restricted sense of the word. In Cardwell's work we find the following: "¶ The amendment of the translation of the reading Psalms, (as they are called,) made by the Bishop of St. Asaph," &c. The expression occurs in my last extract from Bishop White concerning the discussion in 1785. "The committee," says the Bishop, "were fully empowered on the subject of the tables, and on that of the selection of reading Psalms." In the preface to the Proposed Book we find the same title applied to them; "A selection is made both of the reading and singing psalms, commonly so called."

In PRINCIPLE's communication in the Banner of Jan. 20th, he makes an appeal to "the Lexicographers of the English language." To-day, I observe, he renews his appeal in charging SACERDOS with making "an assertion, giving a definition to a word contrary to the usages of the literary world." I agree to the appeal, and will at once advance it. Does PRINCIPLE admit the English Bible to be of any authority as to the meaning of English words? I must take for granted he does. Has he ever read in that Book of the Jews reading the Scriptures? Doubtless he has. Let him bear in mind then, that in those days, as in the present, among the Jews the Scriptures were always sung; and they are throughout accentuated for the very purpose of guiding the reader in singing them. If PRINCIPLE wishes to hear a specimen of their reading, he can do so by going into one of their Synagogues some Saturday while this part of their service is going on. If he will ask any of them what they call this part of their service, they will tell him, "Reading the Scriptures." The Koran is marked for the same purpose, and has always been read much in the same way.

If PRINCIPLE wishes for some direct definition in proof that reading is not always to be understood as exclusive of singing, I will give him this too, and from a Lexicon of the very highest authority. Richardson thus defines the word "sing." * * * Goth. Siguan, LEGERE, to READ: siguan lokos, LEGERE libros, (Luc. iv. 16,) to READ, to recite. Applied to the READING of numbers of persons, the murmuring sound of numbers READING, their CHANT, or musical modulation of voice in READING or recitation."

Rather than the "assertion" of SACERDOS is opposed to PRINCIPLE's notions of "the usage of the literary world," than to the usage itself. Remember, friend PRINCIPLE, the truest literary usage and the greatest accuracy of thought and language, lie not upon the surface nor among the vulgar, but deep and among the few. But, Mr. Editor, pardon me for trespassing so long upon the time and patience of yourself and of your readers.

I remain very truly yours,

MR. EDITOR:—

For the gratification of your younger and less informed readers, I send you the following passage from the Jerusalem Targum,* concerning the dispute between the twin-brothers, Cain and Abel, the fatal termination of which is recorded in Gen. iv. 8.

The present version is made as literal as consistent with the idiom of our language, and may be depended upon as a faithful transcript of the words of the original—although I should certainly have preferred any translation by an oriental scholar, had one been known to me.

The narrative follows, in the Sacred Text, the words "And Cain talked with Abel his brother,"—which is rendered more closely, "And Cain said to Abel his brother,"—the seeming omission being supplied by other versions. Of the authority of the following narration, little probably can be said in its favour. It claims to be a received tradition of the Jewish Church, transmitted from the earliest times, and finally preserved in the Chaldee Paraphrase of Jerusalem, and also according to Dr. Clarke, the Methodist Commentator, in that of Jonathan Ben Uzziel, which, be it observed, is a Paraphrase of the Prophets.

"And Cain said to Abel his brother, come, and let us go out into the field: and it was so, that when they went out together into the open field, Cain spoke and said to Abel his brother, There is no judgment, and no Judge, and no other world, and there is no reward to be given to the good, nor vengeance to be taken of the wicked. The world was not created in mercy, nor is it governed in mercy. Why was your oblation received with favour, and mine was not received from me with favour? Abel answered and said to Cain, There is a judgment, and there is a Judge, and there is a future, and there is a giving of reward to the righteous, and vengeance will be taken of the wicked, and the world was created in mercy, and in mercy is governed. But it is governed according to the fruit of good works. Because my works were more pious than yours, my sacrifice was received with favour, but yours was not received with favour. And they were together disputing in the field, and Cain rose up against his brother Abel, and slew him."

The version of Dr. Clarke, though somewhat longer, is very similar to the above, and is herewith given, from his Commentary on Gen. iv. 8.

"And Cain said unto Abel his brother, 'Let us go out into the field;' and it came to pass that, when they were in the field, Cain answered and said to Abel his brother, 'I thought that the world was created in mercy, but it is not governed according to the merit of good works, nor is there any judgment nor a Judge, nor shall there be any future state, in which good rewards shall be given to the righteous, or punishment executed on the wicked; and now there is respect of persons in judgment. On what account is it that thy sacrifice has been accepted, and mine not received with complacency?'"

"And Hebel answered and said, 'The world was created in mercy, and it is governed according to the fruit of good works; there is a Judge, a future world, and a coming judgment, where good rewards shall be given to the righteous, and the impious punished; and there is no respect of persons in judgment; but because my works were better and more precious than thine, my 'oblation was received with complacency.' And because of these things they contended on the face of the field, and Cain rose up against Hebel his brother, and struck a stone into his forehead, and killed him."

* NOTE.—Targum, a Chaldee word, meaning a paraphrase. The Targumim were continued or scattered paraphrases like the above, written in Chaldee, after or during the captivity. They number ten, the most valuable of which are the Targums of Onkelos on the Pentateuch, and Jonathan Ben Uzziel on the Prophets. Their expositions of doubtful passages are implicitly reviewed by the Jews. Hence the words of our Divine Lord, Ye make the Scriptures of none effect, by your traditions.

If space would allow, much more might be added, at the present time, on the subject of the genuineness of the proposed reading, which forms the opening sentence of the Targum on this text, but it will have to be deferred.

Yours respectfully,
Philadelphia, Feb. 3d.

New York, January 30th, 1849.

DEAR MR. EDITOR:—

I shall go distracted! my mind is dreadfully disturbed, and the disturbing forces are the correspondents of the Banner, the writers of the Ecclesiologist, and the Editor of the Churchman. I was educated by a pious mother, and attended with her in Trinity Church the usual services, dear good Bishop Hobart was our pastor, and though some people said he was "very high," we went along our Christian way under his guidance, peacefully and happily. We were taught by him that it was all important men should "believe and be baptized," but never heard him utter one word about "metal pails" "ornamented to any extent according to pleasure," as necessary or even proper appendages to the solemn service, nor did he speak of "drains," nor of placing the font near the door, and filling it with water at any particular point in the service. But by the Ecclesiologist, I find all these things to be very important, it speaks of them with an aspect so grave, that I look around in fear, and fixing my eyes on the usually thoughtful face of the Editor of the Churchman, am horrified at detecting a broad smile! "Metal pails," says he, (kettles,) "we feel an irresistible impulse to resiliency," (Church'n, 20.)

Again, in a long, long ministry, I do not know that the dear Bishop even spoke of "patron saints." He never, I know in my hearing, said aught about "canonizing them," but now I find there are such things and such doings, that it is a great matter to get the right sort of a patron for a Church, and not to select "Grace or the Redemption or the Atonement," because "these words really mean nothing at all!" (Ecc. page 54.) Bless me! My dear Mr. Editor, is this really so! Our dear good Bishop taught us that these words meant a great deal, left us to infer that if St. Peter or St. Bede could take care of a Church, and congregation "Grace" could do the same thing, or that if the memory of a man was to be honored, the memory of a great mercy might with equal propriety be constantly preserved by the name of a building in which that mercy was daily or weekly acknowledged! In my dilemma I again look to "the Editor," and again he seems to smile—may he is I really believe frowning! Those pleasant placid features of his contract, and he says, "pooh! choke the superstitious notion."

Then my dear Mr. Editor those rubrics! we are always taught to obey them, we thought we did obey them, but by what your correspondents say, I find our obedience is a matter of great doubt. I shall now never know whether a clergyman is behind the altar or before the altar, whether he is in the aisle or in an "alley," whether he is going where he ought to go, and when he ought to go, but is just where he ought not to be, when he ought not to be—whether he is singing when he ought to be saying, or saying when he ought to be singing—in fine my peace of mind is destroyed. These matters being of such deep moment and so much doubt hanging about them, I hardly know what to do. Do you not think a "general council" could be convened, and things disputed about so earnestly, be settled by its decision? I see no other remedy. I won't believe in "metal pails" ornamented "to any extent according to pleasure," nor in "patron saints formally canonized," till the Church tells me I must do so—and the Ecclesiologist is not the Church, or her voice as yet—so a council is our only hope.

Miscellaneous.

THE CHURCH OF NOTRE DAME, AT PARIS.—Through such avenues we threaded our way, half blinded and quite stunned, to the front of the venerable cathedral; an open space, indeed, but more resembling a filthy inn yard than the approach to one of the most famous churches in Christendom, where every kind of filth was allowed to accumulate, and rubbish might be cast, not in secret, but under the great eye of heaven. Not a trace of reverential care gave token of Christian piety or antiquarian sentiment; but the poor old majestic pile, neighbored by dirty cafés and bankrupt-looking shops, seemed left meekly to vindicate its claim of respect before heaven, like christianity in its earliest days, rising above the scorns and the abuses of the world. I was disappointed in the size of the edifice, having received a shadowy notion of an enormous building, from Victor Hugo's great romance, of which it is the scene; but abundantly recompensed by the sense of dim antiquity which it conveys with more hoary power than any pile which I recollect, not in ruins. Its square grey turrets are the haunts of innumerable birds, former generations of whom have shivered away the crumbling stones for their posterity to "make their bed and procreate cradle in;" and the low archways, over the humble portals beneath them, seemed carved out of wood which has been charred by the action of fire. The interior is naked and gloomy, and struck us with a vault-like chillness. How different from the pride of Paris, the Madeline, which we visited the next day, elevated on broad platforms of steps, a huge Grecian building of white stone, like an Athenian temple without, like a gaudy music-room within! The interior is still unfinished; but all glowing with purple and gold, without shadow, without repose, shows that in its perfection it will be a miracle of French art raised to French glory. For such a gew-gaw as this do the Parisians neglect their own holy cathedral; but no wonder: self is ever rebuked before the embodied presence of ages: Notre Dame is the grave of vanity, the Madeline will be its throne.—Sergeant Talfourd's Vacation Rambles.

For Our Young Readers.

"LITTLE JACK HORNER."

But few persons, probably, are aware of the fact, that many of the rhymes which they heard in the days of their childhood, were written very many years ago; yet this is the case. They are found in manuscripts in the British Museum, as early as the reign of Charles the First, Elizabeth, and even Henry VI. It would seem that the rhyme of Jack Horner must have been written as long ago as the time of James I., if we may judge by the quaintness of the title, which is as follows:—"The Pleasant History of Jack Horner, containing the witty tricks and pranks which he played from his youth to his riper years; right pleasant and delightful for winter and summer's recreation." There are few persons who have not heard of Jack Horner, and remember the first few lines, namely:

"Little Jack Horner sat in the corner, Eating his Christmas pie," &c.

But, further than that, little seems to be thought or known about him; and the return of Christmas shall be my apology for introducing to your readers this noble-hearted child, of whom, according to the best of my recollection, it may be stated, that when he was six or seven years old, his mother, one morning had baked a pie purposely for him and just as he was going to school, she said to him, "I will put your pie on the shelf, and you shall have it as soon as you get home." The little happy, rosy-cheeked cherub set off to school with his books and lessons, but on his way was met by a poor woman, who asked him for a little money to buy some bread. He pitied the woman, and, like a good scholar, set his mind to work to find a remedy, for he had no money, which oftentimes saves a great deal of mental labour. All at once he remembered what his mother had said as he left home; and his countenance beamed with joy as he directed the woman to go to his mother, and ask for the pie which she had laid up for him on the shelf. The poor woman thanked him, and went accordingly, and our little hero walked on to school. It was not long before his mother heard a knocking at the door. The poor woman had called. She delivered her message, and the pie was most cheerfully given to her. His mother, affected by this act of generosity, was determined to reward him, and before his school was dismissed, she had baked another pie, and put it in the place of the one he had given away. On his return, he inquired if the woman had called. "Yes," said his mother, "and I have baked another pie for you." And there is scarcely a person living in Old or New England who has not heard of that pie. The name of Jack Horner is handed down from generation to generation, while the names of many of the greatest military heroes are forgotten; and he will be remembered, and this deed of benevolence will be spoken of, when the memory of the greatest military achievements shall have passed away. Notwithstanding the laps of more than two hundred years, how pleasantly, in this little story, he and his mother pass before us! Now the poor are still with us, and there is many a woman as she was, who called forth the benevolence of Jack Horner; and there are among the young readers of the Traveller, I doubt not, many boys as deserving and as generous as little Jack. For their sakes this is written; and if extra pies are baked and put on the shelf for them, it will be a matter of real Thanksgiving.—Boston Traveller.

HON. EDWARD EVERETT.—All school boys and girls, and all who ever were such, are familiar with the "lines" beginning,

"You'd scarce expect one of my age,
To speak in public on the stage."

But all may not know the fact, that they were written by Edward Everett, when only seven years old. Thus early did his intellectual developments indicate his future greatness. He commenced his public career in the capacity of a preacher, and was settled as pastor of the Brattle street church, in this city, as the age of nineteen.—Boston Reporter.

Obituary.

For the Banner of the Cross.

Departed this life on the 11th instant, at Buckhurst near Natchez, Mississippi, MRS. JANE SARAH MERRILL, consort of Dr. A. P. Merrill, aged 41 years, 3 months, and 17 days.

The writer of this is well aware that obituary notices derive their chief interest from local associations, and therefore that to extend them to any considerable length were, for the most part, hardly just to the general readers of a public journal. Nevertheless, as one who for a period of ten years sustained to the deceased the endearing relation of a pastor, he feels impelled to pay this passing tribute to her memory. He records with melancholy pleasure the beautiful graces and virtues by which it is not too much to say her character was marked. The exemplary fidelity and tenderness with which she devoted herself to the several duties of a wife and a mother, hold a place in his memory among those reminiscences of departed worth upon which surviving relatives and friends would do well not unfrequently to ponder; and he reverts to the family over which, in her appropriate sphere, she presided, as one of the best specimens of a well ordered and happy household, which it has ever been his privilege to witness. Love it has been truly said by her disconsolate husband, love was the ruling passion of her life, love pure and undefiled, and in this she imitated our Saviour; and while the writer is penning this line, the memory of other years comes over him, and he sees before him her animated and happy countenance all radiant with smiles of welcome as he used to enter that dear domestic circle, and take his station by that happy fireside, which love made warmer and brighter and more full of cheer.

Nor was her death without a lesson of edifying humility and trust in Him who is the world's Great Hope. She died with the spirit of contrition in her heart, and its language on her lips; holy prayer in Christ's name was the solace of her last periods; and she has left to her sorrowing husband and children the blessed assurance that her ransomed spirit is now praising God in union with those of saints and angels.

The following Tuesday, in St. John's Church, Williamsboro', confirmed two persons.

On the festival of the Conversion of St. Paul, in Church of the Holy Innocents, Henderson, instituted the Rev. Donald McLeod, Rector of the same, and preached on the occasion.

On the evening of the 27th March, in St. John's, Fayetteville, preached and confirmed twenty persons. The next day, 4th Sunday after Epiphany, administered the holy sacrament, and preached three times. Officiated also the evening of following Wednesday.

On Septuagesima Sunday, officiated in the Chapel at the Rock Fish Factory, preached and confirmed fifteen persons. The self-denying efforts of the Missionary here deserve special commendation.

On the next Wednesday, and four following days, in St. James' Church, Wilmington, preached and confirmed eighteen persons.

TO THE CLERGY AND CONGREGATIONS OF THE DIOCESE OF PENNSYLVANIA.

DEAR BRETHREN:—

During the last three years an Association of Ladies, in this city, has been employed in collecting funds for the erection of a Free Church, to be placed in a populous, but neglected district of the Northern Liberties, and to be known as a MEMORIAL of the life and labors of the late BISHOP WHITE. As one of the wisest, most active, and most influential founders of our American Church, and as the first Bishop of this Diocese, this honored servant of God must ever be remembered among us, with sentiments of the deepest reverence and gratitude.

It gives me great pleasure to state, that through the untiring efforts of these ladies, an amount sufficient for the erection of the Bishop White Chapel, has at length been secured; and I would also state, that for more than two years their Missionary, the Rev. Joseph H. Smith—has been laboring in the district indicated above, with great zeal and judgment, and with the most encouraging success.

The ground, however, on which the building is to be erected, is not yet purchased; and since the solemn services to be conducted in this building are intended especially for the poor, the subscriber has felt bound to advise that no steps be taken towards its erection, till the monies collected or subscribed shall be sufficient to cover all the necessary expenses of the enterprise, so as to leave both the edifice and the ground on which it stands, free from rent. It seems due, too, to the memory of him whose services and worth we would commemorate, that in making an offering to God, in his name, we keep back no part of the price. It is, therefore, respectfully submitted to the clergy and congregations throughout the Diocese, whether an early and united effort ought not to be made to further this object.

From four to six thousand dollars will be required to secure an eligible lot of ground; and since the contributions already made towards this Monumental Church have been made almost exclusively by Episcopalians of Philadelphia, and since other Churches, for the poor, are fast rising in its suburbs, and are justly claiming their aid, it may be doubted whether years will not have to elapse, before this noble work can be accomplished, unless the efforts they have made are more promptly and liberally seconded by their brethren—both in this city and in other parts of the Diocese. This appeal, therefore, is more especially addressed to those, who have not already contributed to this good work. Bishop White, while living was the spiritual father of all alike;—his memory, now that he is dead, is their common and cherished inheritance.

Moved by these considerations, and acting with the concurrence of his Council of Advice, the subscriber affectionally recommends to all the congregations in the Diocese—but more especially to those in which considerable contributions have not been already made for this object,—that collections in its behalf be taken on the first Sunday in April, being the Sunday before Easter. This day is designated, because it is the one nearest that (April 4th) on which Bishop White was born; and we shall thus be enabled, while retracing the sufferings of our adorable Redeemer, to testify our grateful remembrance of the life and labors of one of the most useful and faithful of His servants.

A. POTTER, Bishop of the Diocese.

February 19, 1849.

N. B.—Wherever this collection would interfere materially with the stated collections of the parish, the object of this appeal may be answered, if the Rector will on the day designated, commend it to the favor of his congregation.

The Bishop of the Diocese held a Confirmation at Gloria Dei (Sweede's) church, on Ash Wednesday, when fifteen persons received "the laying on of hands."

MISSIONS IN CALIFORNIA AND OREGON.

Domestic Committee Rooms, 2 Park Place, }
Monday, 12 Feb. 1849.

The following Report from the Sub-Committee was read and accepted, and the Resolutions therein recommended—ADOPTED, and ordered to be forthwith published for general information in the Church.

CHARLES H. HALSEY, General Agent.

The Committee on Missions in Oregon and California respectfully report as follows, viz: That under the urgent demands of the case arising out of the unprecedented emigration to those distant regions, the Domestic Committee is imperiously now called on by the duties it owes to the Church, to make more enlarged and vigorous efforts in that Missionary field. That the Committee has thus far taken the lead in such action as it became them to do, limited only by their means. Of this the proofs are clear. At the meeting of the Board of Missions, in July, 1847, even before California was annexed to their province, yet in anticipation of that event, and foreseeing the great importance soon to be attached to it, the Domestic Committee, through one of its members, obtained from the Board the establishment of San Francisco as a missionary station, and immediately brought the matter before the Church for its practical action. Again, in July, 1848, its next session, immediately after the cession to the United States, California was again more solemnly recognized as missionary ground, under the earnest recommendation of the Committee, assumed at once by them as a part of their constitutional province—as "lying beyond the bounds of any organized Diocese;" and on the very first meeting of the Committee for making appropriations, the sum of $1000 was set aside out of an almost bankrupt treasury for missions on that coast—all which facts were from the earliest spread before the Church, and urged upon their attention with earnest and repeated appeals for both—for Missionaries to go out, and for enlarged means for their support. That such appeals were for so long a time made in vain, and that until the present feverish excitement, but one self-denying missionary presented himself to accept the Committee's moderate provision of $500 salary, and to brave with his family the perils and hardships of an unknown land. This surely can bring no charge of dilatoriness on the Committee, who had faithfully and promptly done their part. Such charge, if it rest anywhere, must be rather on those who, under such a call, 'held back.' But the case of unwillingness, it seems, now no longer exists—either to go or give. The great question now before the Church, is of the proper action in the premises. The following preamble and resolutions speak the views of the Committee:

WHEREAS, various missionary movements are now arising in this, and some other of our chief cities, with a view to send out and support missions in California, under private or parochial management; and WHEREAS it is all important that such movements should be systematically directed, in conformity with the established missionary organization of the Church; and WHEREAS the Domestic Committee is the only body recognized by the general authorities of the Church, as having, during the recess of the Board of Missions, jurisdiction in the management of its missions—the General Convention having, in express words, committed to it "the whole administration of the general missionary work of the Church"—therefore, RESOLVED,

1. That the number of missionary stations of the Board be and hereby are enlarged by the addition, in California, of one further missionary in the town of San Francisco, one at Monterey, one at Los Angeles, and one at Sutter's Fort and the vicinity, and one at Oregon City, in Oregon, so soon as special funds are provided for their adequate support.

2. That the Treasurer of the Committee be at once instructed to open special accounts for the above mission stations, and to pay over, as requested, all such funds in full to the missionaries at those stations.

3. With a view, at the earliest possible period, of placing the missionary work in those distant regions under its only safe and effective government—that the scheme of a "Bishop's Fund," amounting to $20,000, be at once brought before the Church under the sanction of this Committee, the Treasurer directed to open such account, and that John David Wolfe, Esq., and William H. Aspinwall, Esq., be added as additional Trustees of the same.

4. That this Committee will take action at the ensuing meeting of the Board of Missions, and in every other canonical way—to hasten the desired result of the establishment of a Bishop in California.

JOHN MCVICKAR, Chairman.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE CALENDAR.

REV. AND DEAR SIR:—

I send you herewith a letter which I have lately received from our devoted Missionary in Africa, the Rev. J. Payne. It contains a development of his views in regard to our African Mission, which I doubt not will receive the careful consideration of our Foreign Missionary Committee, and which I have thought it not improper to lay before the Church, through the medium of the "Calendar." I do not think that a sufficient number of white Missionaries can be obtained to make an effective impression on the heathenism of Africa, for many years to come. And, if the object could be attained in this way, I fear we should hardly be warranted in incurring the fearful loss of human life which must attend it, while so practicable an alternative remains to us as that recommended by our Missionary.—It has always seemed to me that the extension of Christianity and civilization through Africa could only be effected through the instrumentality of colored men. If a sufficient number of such could be found in this country, and qualified for the work, they must still suffer measurably, in the process of acclimation, and they must learn the languages, the habits and the feelings of the natives, before they would enter into their sympathies, or acquire the requisite influence over their opinions and conduct. The resource, which I suppose has mainly been relied on by our Board of Missions, is the rearing up of heathen children, converting them to Christianity, and qualified them for the work of teachers and missionaries. But a people who have been going through the process of degradation for a thousand years, cannot be renovated in a single generation; and the remarks of our Missionary in regard to native agency are worthy of grave consideration. I fully concur with him in the opinion, therefore, that our future missionaries for Africa should be sought mainly among the youth of the colony of Liberia. The process by which this object can be most effectually accomplished, is a subject well worthy of the consideration of our Board of Missions, and especially of the Foreign Committee. Divine Providence seems to have brought a portion of the colored race to this country, to be instructed in the rudiments of Christianity, and the arts of civilized life, and lately to have restored them again to their native land, and they may diffuse through its wide extent the knowledge of the civil and religious institutions which they have acquired during the hard period of their servitude. If our country has incurred guilt in bringing about what the all-wise Providence of God thought proper to permit, let us make the best amends in our power, by following the present leadings of the same wise Providence, and by devising and applying the most effectual means for diffusing the light and the blessings of Christianity through a benighted land.

OHIO.

KENYON COLLEGE.—It is already known to some of our readers, that the Rev. Dr. Bronson has resigned the Presidency of Kenyon College. His reasons for taking this step will appear in the following communication, which we insert at his request. We take occasion to state in this connection for the information of those who may be interested in the subject, that there will be no interruption in the course of instruction in the College, as the President will continue to discharge the duties of his office until a successor shall be appointed.

Messrs. Editors:—

Circumstances being such that it appeared to be my duty to place a resignation of the Presidency of Kenyon College in the hands of the President of the Board of Trustees, it seemed proper, in order to prevent inferences injurious to the Institution, to state briefly the reasons for the course which I have taken. Did it concern myself alone, I would be silent, but the present and future interests of an important public Institution are affected, and therefore explanations seem to be called for, as to the cause of my resigning my present charge. It has been done mainly for the following reasons:—

1. If the Board of Trustees should, by a different investment of the property, be in possession of a revenue sufficient to carry on the College efficiently, I wish to give them full opportunity to appoint one more suitable for the place.

2. If they should not be allowed to do so, I consider that it is the dictate, neither of interest nor duty, for me to remain.

I am aware that it may be difficult for many to appreciate these as being the motives for the step which I have taken. Hence it may be proper to say, that I have an interest in and affection for this institution such as it seems to me no one else can have. It opened to my mind the first hope of acquiring an education. At a time when Ohio was almost an entire wilderness, when I had travelled in vain more than a hundred miles in pursuit of a Latin grammar and dictionary, intelligence of this rising Institution revived my expiring hope of an education. It is my Alma Mater. Six very pleasant years of my life were spent within its walls, a part of the time as an undergraduate, and the remainder as a theological student and Tutor.

It is a Church Institution, and belongs to a church, too, to which from peculiar circumstances, few are as much indebted as I am. A church in which I was not only baptized and educated, but from which I received all the religious instructions of my earlier years.

On all these accounts Kenyon College is to me exceedingly dear, and no sacrifice that I can make will be considered too great, if only its welfare is promoted.

I do consider that under ordinary circumstances it would be a high honor to be called to the presidency of this Institution. But under the circumstances that attend my appointment, it would have been vain so to esteem it. Such was the state of the finances and such the internal condition of the College, that it was impossible to fill the place as would have been desired. I was appointed simply because the Trustees thought, and I thought, I could do the duties till a more suitable man could be appointed and sustained. Consequently I have felt, as in justice I ought to have done, a perfect willingness to yield my place whenever it should be desired for another, and yet my regard for the Institution is not in the least diminished.

For two years after entering upon my duties, the funds were sufficient to pay current expenses. So long all, I believe, were satisfied. But when the sum of five hundred dollars per annum was required in the shape of taxes, there appeared to be no possibility of avoiding an increase of debt. What then should have been done? Ought those who are chiefly concerned in expending the money, to have kept silence, and seen the Institution irrecoverably immersed in debt? The day of reckoning must sooner or later arrive, and what then must be the fate of those who had kept silence for fear of giving offence? My own conviction was, and is still, that duty to myself, if to no one else, required that the condition and wants of the Institution should be laid before the public, and if I were to suffer by doing this, it would be in the way of duty, and would at least be attended with peace of conscience. With this view I commenced a series of articles over the signature of "Alumnus." In these communications I first proposed a plan for the endowment of professorships, intending it as an intimation that if there were any willing to endow them, they might thus relieve the property of the Seminary from all responsibility on account of the College.

The next plan proposed was, to sell property to the amount of $70,000 or $80,000 which was yielding but one per cent., and so invest it that it might yield five or six per cent. and thus provide an endowment which would place all the departments of instruction beyond contingency. This was not my view alone, but that of the Faculty and a majority of the Board of Trustees. The matter in due time was brought before the Convention, a resolution offered to that effect, and a substitute for it carried, but so limited, that I fear, if executed, as indeed it must be, it will be scarcely possible to avoid encroaching upon the permanent, or what in my view ought to be, the permanent fund of the Institution. I say must be executed, for the whole domain has been sold for taxes, and there is no way of redeeming it but by making sales. At least I know of none.

As the Institution now is, the buildings need repairs, the apparatus needs renewing, a new laboratory must be provided, and there are not funds even to sustain a number of instructors sufficient to conduct the institution. I have performed an amount of labor which nothing but my love for this Institution would have tempted me to undertake. The time has come, therefore, when the Institution must have more funds, or suspend. To take the latter course would be certain ruin to the property. One half of the nett revenue arises from the rents of houses, which would be cut off as soon as the College should suspend. The balance would all be required to pay interest and taxes; and buildings, to the amount of $80,000 in value, must stand nearly idle, and go to decay for want of funds to repair them, and some one to take charge of them. Can we beg? The Convention says no; and while the Institution possesses property to the amount of at least $60,000, that is entirely idle, and growing no better, but rather worse by losing the timber, it would seem that all reasonable people would say no. To me there appears to be no remedy but to sell the land, and invest $80,000 or $100,000 in such a manner as to use only the income for paying debts and sustaining the Institution. If such a course shall be adopted, the Trustees will be able to place a man at the head of the Institution capable of doing far better than myself, and if not, there are other posts of duty more desirable even to me. Still, I repeat my love for Kenyon College will not by this step be diminished in the least, nor my willingness to render my services in any way that is consistent and right.

CAPE OF GOOD HOPE.

Everywhere there are signs of awakening interest in the Church's cause. The daily prayers at St. George's cathedral during Lent were attended by an increasing and devout congregation. The Sacrament of the Lord's Supper was administered to 218 communicants on Easter Day, being sixty more than were ever known to have communicated before.

About 350 candidates were confirmed at Simon's Town, Wynberg, Rondebosch, and Capetown, in July.

"This most important service," says the Bishop, "excited very great and general interest, and has left, I would fain hope, a wholesome impression on the minds of many. Everywhere we had full congregations. In Capetown, the street near the cathedral was full of people, and the cathedral itself was crowded."

An Ordination, also, which was held on Sunday, July 30th, excited a good deal of interest,—a Priest and a Deacon were ordained.

In August, the Bishop held a Synod of the Clergy of the Western Province, when he consulted them on several subjects of importance.

"We unanimously agreed," says he, "to establish a Church Society, that should embrace all the objects which our various Church Societies in England seek to effect, and be based upon the same principles as the North American Church Societies.

We agreed, also, to lay before the Government a draft of a Church ordinance, which will place our parishes and churches as nearly as possible upon the same footing as parishes and churches in England; and we agreed also to certain resolutions respecting education, which I undertook to submit to Government. Besides these subjects, upon which I consulted the Clergy, there were some points chiefly relating to the Public Services of the Church, upon which I felt it right to issue certain injunctions; and there were other points which, though I did not enjoin, I yet earnestly recommended to the Clergy for their adoption,—as, public catechising in church, the ministering of of baptism in the public congregation, &c.—points of great importance in a country like this, which is partly Heathen, and where very great ignorance prevails respecting Divine Truth. I am thankful to say that our meeting was a most harmonious one—a brotherly feeling prevailed throughout—God grant that we may witness many similar meetings."

The Bishop afterwards issued a Pastoral Letter to his Clergy, embodying the results of the deliberations of the Synod.

On the 24th of August, the Bishop started in a wagon on his visitation to the Eastern Province, to which allusion has been made. The history of that visitation may best be told when it shall have been completed. For the present, it will suffice to say, that great as is the extent of spiritual destitution, far greater has been the zeal and sympathy with which the Chief Pastor of the Church has been welcomed in the most outlying portions of his Diocese. Everywhere he has been encouraged to believe that the work of God prospers in his hands. He has preached to crowded and attentive congregations—has baptized children—held confirmations—and administered the Holy Communion in distant wilds which have never heard the sound of a church-going bell, and rarely before hailed the presence of a Christian Minister. The Colonists have seemed to feel deeply sensible of their destitute condition, and have expressed their earnest joy at seeing their hopes at length realized, in the completion of the constitution of the Church among them. At the Knysna, especially, gentlemen have assembled in numbers, conducted him on his journey on horseback, and accompanied him, in one instance, for a distance of forty-five miles, until he joined his wagon.

Nor, while the work of building up the Church among its own sons has thus been going on, has the conversion of the Heathen and Mahomedans been overlooked.

"On Easter day," says the Bishop, "we baptized, and I addressed sixteen Africans, trained in our schools or by Church people, our first fruits from the heathen. I felt deeply interested, for I believe them, in the main to be quite in earnest."

The Rev. Dr. Camellari, a skilful linguist, a Maltese by birth, once a member of the Church of Rome, but now a minister in our own Church, has been appointed to the Mahomedan mission, which is one of pressing urgency. For it is a melancholy fact that five emigrants, who arrived from England within three months from the Bishop's landing in the colony, became disciples of the False Prophet.

"This is not a single instance," he writes, "of such apostasy. * * * I believe, however, the Mahomedans are not now increasing. But the fact is surely very awful, as showing the low standard of religion of our people in England, and the little estimation in which Christianity is held here. I cannot satisfy my mind as to the ground of these conversions. The reasons assigned for them do not seem to me to be the true causes. People here do not appear to feel the awfulness of living in the midst of Satan's kingdom. I cannot but think that men's eyes are blinded, and their hearts become hardened through long indifference and neglect."

The mission to the Kaffirs has not yet been entered on; but on the Feast of the Annunciation, which had been appointed as a day of general thanksgiving for the speedy and successful termination of the war, and for which the Bishop had drawn up a special form of service, a collection was made throughout the Diocese towards a mission to the heathen. By the latest information it appears that the Bishop was present at a meeting between the Kaffir chiefs and Sir H. Smith at King William's Town, on the 7th of October. The account is so graphic that we are tempted to give the dialogue in extenso.

"The Governor.—Here is the Bishop from Capetown, who rode ninety miles yesterday on purpose to be at this meeting. He has been sent out by the good people of England to teach you the religion of the Queen of England. This is the man that teaches me the way to salvation, and has come to see what he can do for you in teaching you the way to be Christians. This is the great chief of teachers, yet still regards the smallest child, and the meanest man, who is good, and is a Christian, with the same regard as the 'Inkoso Inkulu.' [Great Chief.] He wishes to establish schools for the education of your children. Can none of you assist him in any way? Can none give a calf, or a little corn? Shall your daughters go about naked, and lie about in idleness in the bushes like calves? [The Governor here addressed himself to Jan Tzatzoe.] Have you nothing to say? You have been in England, seen the great world there, and you saw that no man there eats the bread of idleness; and yet, fool, you dared to join with the Kaffirs against the power of the Queen. Have you anything to say to the Lord Bishop, for the furtherance of education among your countrymen?

Jan Tzatzoe.—The Lord Bishop is a great and wise man, and the great chief has already remarked that I am a fool. How, therefore, can I give any advice upon this subject? But we certainly require teaching to remove our ignorance. The Lord Bishop will best know how to accomplish this.

The Governor.—The Lord Bishop wishes to speak a few words.

The Lord Bishop.—Chieftains, I am glad to meet you all here this day. As the great chief has just told you, I rode yesterday all the way from Graham's Town, that I might be present at this meeting, of which I only heard the day before. I am, as you have been told, the Bishop of the English Church in this part of the world—of that Church to which our Queen belongs, and I wish now to assure you of the interest, the deep interest,

* Tzatzoe was exhibited in England, a few years ago, at religious meetings, as a professed Christian; but he was foremost in the mischief of 1846-7.

which I take in you and your condition, and to tell you of my earnest desire to do you any good in my power. The great chief has talked to you about the education of your children. I am ready to assist you in this good work, for I feel that by education your own peace and happiness will be greatly promoted. I am also most anxious to send amongst you ministers of God who may teach you the way of life, and bring you to the knowledge of the true God, and Jesus Christ, whom he hath sent. Be assured that the best way to promote your own happiness in this world, and in that which is to come, is by becoming Christians—by receiving as your Lord and God that blessed Saviour in whom we, who are Christians, place all our trust and all our hope. And now I will not keep you any longer; but I repeat, I shall be glad to do you any good, and I hope you will tell me how I can do it."

Who can wonder that the cares and labours of such a Diocese have been almost too great for the Bishop's physical strength? Writing on the 2d of May, he says:—

"Were it not that there is so very much to be done—and done all at once—I should enjoy myself in this beautiful spot; but my brain is almost bursting at times with the multiplicity of things that are daily forcing themselves upon me, and the anxiety consequent upon them, and the smallness of my means, and my own unfitness for much of the work assigned me. However, I sought it not; and, I trust, as my day is, so shall my strength be. I wish I could show you the noble hills which I look upon, just before my window, the lawn, and oak trees, and rushing stream; and on my right the flats stretching out for twenty-five miles to Hottentot Hollands, where there is another magnificent range."

Soon after this, it pleased God to afflict the Bishop with a very long and painful illness. Writing on St. Peter's Day, the anniversary of his consecration, he says:—

"A solemn day for me, and one spent in much weakness and pain. I was to have taken part in our Cathedral Service on Sunday, and returned home on Monday. But God ordained otherwise. On Sunday morning I had another, not very violent, relapse, and have since been confined to my bed or room."

For two months his labours were thus interrupted, but he has since resumed them with his accustomed energy.

The infant Mission has started under happy auspices. Peace has been lately restored to the Colony. The members of the Dutch Reformed Communion are inclined to look on their English brethren with much kindness and cordiality. Their Ministers are on terms of personal friendship with the Bishop, and some of them were present as spectators of the Confirmation in Capetown, and at Wynberg. The missionaries of the Protestant Missionary Society at Paris, reduced to penury by the late Revolution, appealed to the English Bishop; he subscribed to their support, stating that he did not "support their Mission, but only Christian men who have left home and friends for Christ's sake to preach His blessed Gospel," and feeling that "it would be a great sin, and show a lack of Christian spirit, not to help them in their distress."

Men and means are still wanting for the good work. Many have gone on the simple condition of receiving food and raiment. Others have abandoned position and preferment, and family and home. A Fellow of New College, who has carried off the highest honours of his University, has offered his gratuitous services to the Bishop for five years to promote the cause of education. "Ten or twelve additional Clergy, and an almost unlimited supply of Catechists and Schoolmasters, are wanted at once." Fifty zealous labourers would find ample employment in this wide region. And the means of accomplishing so great a work are utterly inadequate. Much has been done by the voluntary liberality of Churchmen. But the work is still incomplete, and the Bishop is solely responsible for the support of every Clergyman and every Catechist whom he brings into the Colony. The Colonial Government has been liberal in its grants, and the Colonists individually are willing to contribute according to their abilities; but the main portion of the funds must, for some years, be furnished from the Mother Country. Few can give their personal services, but many may contribute out of their abundance to the spiritual wants of Southern Africa. To all such, and to the prayers of all Christian readers, we commend the Mission of the Church of England at the Cape of Good Hope.

From the Churchman.

DEAR SIR:—I take the liberty to extract, for your paper, some passages from a letter received last summer from Lady Franklin, written in London. It is with the hope that, as no intelligence has been hitherto received of the safety of her gallant husband and his companions, many may be led, on reading her words, to offer fervent prayer for them. The letter reached me the evening before the meeting of the county Clergy in my parish, and, by general consent, it was deemed proper that we should offer, in their behalf, during the public services, the "beautiful prayer" to which she alludes. If they should never be traced, or if their destruction should be ascertained, it will be a consolation to reflect on the evidence given by Sir John of his faithful adherence to the great Head of the Church, and his desire that those under command should share in his allegiance and the benefits resulting from it. What prayers have they not lifted among the fretted ice-work chancies of the North! I add to the extracts, a few simple lines of verse, written when thinking lately of their probable condition.

After mentioning the "Arctic searching expedition," three in number, sent by government, at a vast expense, she adds: "I cannot but feel deeply grateful for this noble instance of our government's humanity and generosity: but I have so vivid and painful an impression of the necessity of doing every thing that is to be done, in the course of this present summer, (for it is scarcely possible that they should survive a fourth winter,) that I cannot rest satisfied without stimulating further research in places not within the verge of government expeditions this season. I have therefore offered rewards to whalers, for looking into certain places, where, it appears to me, the ships or crews may probably be found, if disaster should have happened."

She then speaks of her own inclination to have joined one of the Searching Expeditions, from which she was withheld by the urgency and advice of her friends, partly on the ground of her feeble health, and partly that her husband might return while she was absent, and their separation be thus prolonged. "So," she says, "I have resolved to stay, and bear up against this terrible suspense at home. May the Almighty, in his mercy, give me strength to bear it! I am sure we shall have your prayers, your private prayers, if not your ministerial ones, for, not being of your congregation (though of your communion,) I do not know whether we can partake of its privileges. There is a beautiful prayer in your Liturgy, which is not in our own. I was pointing it out lately to the Bishop of Tasmania (Van Dieman's Land,) as he was on the eve of returning to his Antipodean Diocese: and I sent an American Prayer Book by him to the Archdeacon of the Colony. The good Bishop sympathized with my feelings, and told me, that, on the 16th of July next, if he did not previously hear of the safe return of the Expedition, the prayers of the Church would be offered up in every Church and Chapel in the Colony, which my husband so long governed, and where his memory is so cherished, for the safety of himself and his companions, and the expeditions to be despatched in search of them." . . . "I think you may like to know where my husband in the first instance will be sought after. His instructions for his own course, were, that, after entering Lancaster Sound, or Barrow's Straits, he should continue in about the 74th parallel of latitude, till he came to Cape Walker, when he was to turn Southward, and pursue a S. W. direction toward Behring's Straits; or, if entirely baffled in this direction, he was to retrace his course to Barrow's Straits, and see if he could find a clear channel between Devon and Cornwallis Island. Sir James Ross thinks the passage will never be found in the quarter to which my husband's instructions have probably led him; and that the ships will probably be found shut in among the ice-packs and islands of the Arctic Archipelago, somewhere about 73° N. and 105° W.;—but who can tell?

I hope there is no violation of delicacy in publishing these extracts,—and that they may induce thousands to lift up hearty prayers for the safety of the various expeditions.

FRANKLIN'S POLAR EXPEDITION.

Where are they? Where the Frost-king rules supreme Entrenched 'mid battlements of polar ice;
Where crystal piles of many a quaint device,
Marking his wealth magnificently gleam.
How fare they? All is yet a doubtful dream
To man's weak judgment.—Whether, as the price
Of their adventurous quest, stern cold's strong spice
Embalms their corpses till the last day beam;
Or, clinging still to life, by Hope sustained,
They deem their cup of trial well nigh drained,
Cheered by presentiments of succor near,
Thou alone knowest who hast ne'er disdained
The voice of prayer: O God! our cry now hear,
Bring them safe back to friends and country dear.

FROM BISHOP DOANE'S SERMON AT THE CONSECRATION OF GRACE CHURCH, NEWARK.

"O, worship the Lord, in the beauty of holiness." Beauty, consecrated beauty, is only then acceptable to God, when it is made the ACCESSORY OF WORSHIP. God hath made nothing in vain. He hath made nothing, for a perishable use. He hath done nothing, but to teach His truth, and magnify His mercy, to mankind. The fair and fertile earth; the glorious arch of heaven; ocean, with the deep diapason of its water pipes; all, but the lower temple of His Majesty Divine. They do but serve as the Cathedral, for that worship of the race, for which they were all created, and to whose use they are all subjected; which is to fit them for the Temple of the Heavens. Nothing, in all that they contain, from the first daisy, that records the Spring, to the great day's eye, in the heavens—which it reflects, in modest beauty, while it makes the name domestic and familiar to our childhood—but tends to this great end. David proclaims this truth, with matchless power and splendour, in the nineteenth Psalm: "The heavens declare the glory of God, and the firmament sheweth His handy work; day unto day uttereth speech, and night unto night sheweth knowledge; there is no speech nor language, where their voice is not heard: their line is gone out through all the earth, and their words to the ends of the world." And, again, in the one hundred and forty-eighth Psalm, where, from the angels and the hosts of God, down to the flying fowl and creeping thing, whatever God hath made, or does, of work on earth, or influence from heaven, "fire and heat, snow and vapour, wind and storm, fulfilling His word," is called upon, to praise Him. "Let them praise the name of the Lord; for His name only is excellent, and His glory above all the heavens." And, when St. John reveals, in words, that pass our comprehension, the unutterable glories of the unseen world, it is for worship, that it uses all exist; and every voice, that swells a note in the full hallelujahs of its never ceasing chorus, and every golden harp, that saint or seraph wakes, in harmony with it, is still attuned to worship: "Holy, holy, holy, Lord God Almighty, Which was, and is, and is to come; Thou art worthy, O Lord, to receive glory, and honour, and power, for Thou hast created all things, and for Thy pleasure they are, and were created." That which is true of all, is true in every part. The lesson of the whole creation is a lesson for every creature. Beauty is only beauty, as it ministers to the Creator's praise; and consecrated beauty only then acceptable to Him, when it is made accessory to the religious worship of His Son. "And I beheld, and lo, in the midst of the Throne, stood a Lamb, as it had been slain; and He came, and took the book out of the right hand of Him that sat upon the Throne; and, when He had taken the book, the four living creatures, and the four and twenty elders fell down before the Lamb, having every one of them harps, and golden vials full of odours, which are the prayers of saints; and they sang a new song, saying, Thou art worthy, for Thou wast slain, and hast redeemed us to God, by Thy blood, out of every kindred, and tongue, and nation, and people, and hast made us, unto our God, kings and priests. Worthy is the Lamb, Which was slain, to receive power, and riches, and wisdom, and strength, and glory, and blessing." Vainly, in any hope of acceptance before God, the tallest minister shall be reared, that ever towered to heaven, if it proclaim not Jesus Christ; and Him, as crucified for sinners. Vainly, in any thought of acceptance before God, the costliest altar is set up, and covered with fine gold, that is not wet with His propitiating blood. Vainly, in any thought of acceptance before God, will he present himself before the mercy seat, who has not, in his heart, His humbling and transforming Cross. He only, who, subdued to penitence, and moulded to submission, by the meek and matchless beauty of that suffering Lamb, draws near, with faith, to take this Holy Sacrament, fulfils the precept of the text, and worships the Lord, "in the beauty of holiness."

THANKSGIVING AND PRAYER.

In the Virginia House of Delegates recently, Mr. Scott submitted the following, which he desired, for the present, to lie upon the table. He would call it up and give his reasons in a few days:

The General Assembly of Virginia being sensible that virtue is the surest foundation of social and political prosperity, and recognising it as the duty of all persons entrusted with the administration of affairs to promote, by all the proper means, religion and morality, as the indispensable support of those dispositions and habits which lead to its cultivation and growth, and deeming it to be the duty of every community, publicly to acknowledge the Providence of Almighty God, the beneficent author of all good, and humbly to implore his protection and favor.

Be it therefore resolved, by the General Assembly: That the Governor be requested to recommend annually to the people of this Commonwealth, a day of public Thanksgiving and Prayer, to be observed, by acknowledging with grateful hearts the many and signal favors of Almighty God bestowed upon us as a people; and especially for the tranquillity, peace and plenty we have enjoyed; for the success with which we have been enabled to establish constitutions of government for safety and happiness; for the civil and religious liberty with which we are blessed, and the means we have of acquiring and diffusing useful knowledge; and in general for all the great and various favors which he has been pleased to confer upon us.

KEEPING THE LORD'S DAY.—When Commodore Stringham was at Rio Janerio, in command of our squadron, some months ago, a great parade in behalf of the Emperor, occurred on Sunday. The Brazilian ships and men of war fired a grand salute, but the American ships were silent. The next day, Captain Stringham sent an explanatory note to the proper minister of the court, saying that the Sabbath was observed in his country and he hoped that it would be deemed a sufficient reason for not having fired the proper salute on that day, but that, with the kind and respectful feelings which he and his countrymen entertained toward Brazil, he would have the happiness of giving a salute on Monday, to which Capt. S. received a friendly reply. The salute was fired and the affair ended with perfect harmony. —Jour. of Reform.

ILLUSTRATION OF FAITH.

"Father," said a little Welsh boy to his parent, who had been explaining the Scriptures to his family, in the hall of what was once the Manor-house, but which was then occupied by a farmer,—"Father, you said you would one day, when I was old enough, teach me what faith is. Am I old enough now?" "Well I think you are, Willy; come to me," said his father, rising from his chair.

The boy had no sooner approached, than his father raised him from the ground, and set him on the top of a double chest of drawers that stood beside the wall. The child's color went and came, and he was evidently afraid to stand upright in so unusual a situation.

"Now, Willy," said his father, placing himself at a little distance, and holding out his arms,—"Now, Willy, stand upright and jump into my arms." The child's position and the father's command were alike calculated to produce alarm, and did produce it; but the father's look was calm, and kind, and serious, and the child had invited the lesson—so he had nothing for it but to turn his mind to compliance.

Raising himself somewhat, at length he made an effort to jump, but his heart failed him, and he drew back, and stood further from the edge of the drawers.

"Ah, Willy," said his father, "thou hast no faith—try again." Willy thought for a moment and perceived the nature and drift of his father's experiment. He came again to the edge, and this time he did make the spring; but so imperfectly, and with so divided a mind, that he would have fallen, but for a beam of the ceiling just above him, on which he clapt his hands, and recovered himself.

His father smiled, and said, "Willy, thou hast no faith yet; but that was better than the last. Come, try once more."

The look of quiet love in the father's face, and his still open arms, at length assured our hero that there was really no danger; or it may be, that he saw so much to reverence and trust in that parental smile, that he forgot the danger. Be this as it may, this third time little Willy stood bolt upright, and jumped over the dreaded gulf into his father's powerful arms. He looked up with a smile; and his father, setting him on the floor, said, "There, Willy, that was faith. There is the gulf of hell between you and eternal life, but your heavenly Father holds out for you the arms of his love; and has sent his only Son to die, and prove it to you. Trust Him, as you have trusted me, and you will save your soul."—Church of Eng. S. S. Quarterly Magazine.

"Humility is so noble a virtue, that even pride itself puts on its upper garment. We do like those who cannot endure to look upon an ugly or deformed person, and yet will give a great price for a picture extremely like him. Humility is despised in substance, but courted and admired in effigy."—Bishop Taylor.

THE LENTEN FAST.

The reasons for this solemn observance, the authority by which it is enjoined, and the spiritual benefits resulting, have been so often set forth to our readers, that we forbear the present reiteration of them.

There are peculiar causes, we trust it will be remembered, which now invite especial attention to this wise appointment of the Church. One of these we need only mention. Although in the mercy of God, that fearful pestilence which so fiercely began the work of death in our land, has been stayed, there is no sure reason to think that its deadly mission has yet been accomplished. Past experience rather excites the apprehension, that this is but a pause in its relentless activity, and that the voice of spring will awaken its slumbering energies. Whether it be so or not is only known by our Omniscient Father. The result may, in His wisdom and mercy, be suspended upon our conduct. As our sins provoke His judgments, so may our repentance and supplications, efficacious only for the merits of our Redeemer, secure His mercy. Is it too strong a thought for these days of little faith to say, that this issue may depend upon the manner in which we observe this present season of humiliation which comes, with timely intervention, perhaps to avert from those who faithfully employ its gracious opportunities, this visitation of the destroyer?

Is there not a parallel case left upon everlasting record, for the instruction and warning of God's people? Are not the number of days appropriated to this Fast borrowed, in part, from the period intervening between the warning of God's messenger and the threatened destruction? "And Jonah began to enter into the city a day's journey and he cried, and said, yet forty days, and Nineveh shall be overthrown." Has not the voice of premonition come to the people of this land, not from a living messenger, but in the more solemn, though silent, warnings which echo from the sepulchre and the tomb? Is it not our wisdom then to follow the example recorded by the Hand of mercy, for our imitation? "So the people of Nineveh believed God, and proclaimed a fast, and put on sackcloth, from the greatest of them to the least of them."

By thus acting we may secure the same gracious result. "And God saw their works, that they turned from their evil way: and God repented of the evil, that He had said that He would do unto them; and He did it not."

The manner in which this holy season is to be observed, need not be declared by any individual authority. It is expressed in the commands of Scripture, interpreted and applied by the "Witness, and Keeper of Holy Writ," and sustained by the appointment and usage of the Church Catholic, "through the ages all along."

The manner of this observance is declared in the portion of Scripture, appointed "for the epistle," on Ash-Wednesday. "Turn ye even to me, saith the Lord, with all your heart, and with fasting, and with weeping, and with mourning. And rend your heart, and not your garments, and turn unto the Lord your God; for He is gracious and merciful, slow to anger, and of great kindness, and repenteth him of the evil." "Blow the trumpet in Zion, sanctify a fast, call a solemn assembly; gather the people, sanctify the congregation."

And in those earnest words of supplication, with which minister and people join in solemn invocation, we thus speak—"Be favorable, O Lord, Be favorable to thy people, Who turn to thee in weeping, fasting, and praying." If we mourn not, with "godly sorrow," over our sins; if we do not fast, "not as the hypocrites," not as a meritorious work in itself deserving any thing, but using such abstinence that our flesh may be subdued to the spirit: if we do not pray more fervently and frequently, both publicly and privately, how can we kneel before the heart-searching God with that supplication upon our lips? Let us strive so to act in accordance with our prayers, that God may not say to us, "Out of thine own mouth will I judge thee." It is to be feared that those who have the benefit of our spiritual and primitive Liturgy expose themselves to such judgment, by the inconsistency between their prayers and their conduct. May this Lenten season, blessed by a worthier and more faithful practice, help to avert all the judgments which our sins have provoked, and may every one who is thus led to dwell in the secret place of the Most High, and to abide under the shadow of the Almighty, realize the promise, "Surely He shall deliver thee from the snare of the fowler, and from the noisome pestilence."

TO THE EDITOR OF THE BANNER OF THE CROSS.

DEAR SIR:—

Your interesting account of "Davies and one," in your last Banner, brought to my mind a similar anecdote recently told me by a friend, which may gratify some of your readers.

A clergyman at the South, going one night in winter, to officiate in a distant Church, found no one there but the negro, who had charge of the stove, and who after kindling the fire took his seat in a pew near the door. The clergymen went through the regular service, and preached. As he passed down the aisle, the negro took him by the hand and said, "Oh, master, that was the very best sermon I ever heard;—it did me so much good;—it seemed as if every word of it was intended for me."

Having indulged in the unusual editorial luxury of "telling a story," we may be excused if we follow the fashion of these private historians, with whom it is usual to say, "That reminds me, &c."

Our learned correspondent's pleasant addition to "Davies and one," reminds us of the remark made by a parishioner, showing how little the generality of sermon-hearers apply to themselves the truths they hear. Having set forth some very plain practical duty, in a subsequent interview with a "hearer" who neglected the duty enjoined, this remark was made by him. "I took what you said last Sunday to myself, though it did come from the pulpit! This, perhaps, explains the cause of that curious fact stated so quaintly by George Herbert—"there be some sermon-hearers that be like those fishes that always live in salt water, and yet are always fresh."

CHURCH OF THE CRUCIFIXION.—An acknowledgment by the Rector, of sums received for the erection of a building may be found in the usual place. This Church, known also as the Bedford street Mission, has strong claims upon the charity of Philadelphia Churchmen. Having referred to it before, we need only briefly notice it now. Those who are familiar with this portion of our city, and we congratulate all who are not, must know that it is peopled by numbers of colored persons, of the lowest class, and many of them sunk in the lowest depths of moral degradation. Their physical condition is no better than their spiritual. In dens, and dark and hideous lurking-places, vice revels upon the husks which swine would refuse, and poverty hides its most squalid pictures of hunger and nakedness.

We speak advisedly when we say that the state of things there is a stigma upon the good name of this city. To uplift this class of immortal beings from their low condition, to reclaim them from their misery, compared with which the hold of a slave ship is happiness, is the object of the enterprise which now demands the bounty of our citizens. We rejoice to say that much has already been done. Devoted Laymen, and we honor and respect them for their self-denying work, have for some time past been doing good service here. A zealous Missionary has given his Ministry, in this more like the office of mercy than highest dignity could make it, to this blessed use. There are now twelve Communicants attached to this Congregation, and a late visit to officiate there enabled us to witness the attendance and the interest manifested by those who assemble there. The present room is very inconvenient. They wish to erect a plain and simple Church, at small expense, to unseal the fountains of mercy amid the haunts of sin's foul pollutions. They ask help. Some has been cheerfully accorded, and twice blessed is the mercy which has prompted the offering. Will not many more be ready to share this blessing? Even these poor outcasts shall return upon their helpers that benediction of our gracious Saviour, "Inasmuch as ye have done it unto one of the least of these, my brethren, ye have done it unto Me."

THE EDITOR OF THE BANNER wishes it to be distinctly understood that he has nothing to do with the business arrangements of this paper. Subscriptions, payments, and advertisements, must be directed to the PUBLISHERS.

CALIFORNIA.—We hope the following promise will provoke others to good works, so that the sum required to make this good will soon be made up. We are happy to see that Christian ladies are feeling an interest in this matter. We have the confidence that if their gentle but powerful sympathies are thoroughly enlisted in this good cause, an impulse will be given from which much may be expected.

We do not think it necessary to say much more on this subject. The time has come for doing, and the case, in all its urgency, is fully before the Church. We hope the nine,—it is a sacred number,—will not long be wanting.

To the Editor of the Banner of the Cross.

REV. AND DEAR SIR:

As there is no time to be lost, will you give notice in the next Banner, that an Episcopal female Communicant will cheerfully give $100 towards the California Mission, as a grateful and humble acknowledgment for the religious blessings we enjoy; provided nine other ladies will give a similar sum.

We take the following interesting article from the New York Courier and Enquirer:—

THE CHURCH IN CALIFORNIA.

Those who have paid any attention to the names and character of the emigrants to California, cannot fail to be struck with the fact, that as a body they are different in all respects from the class of men who usually emigrate to new countries. The simple fact, that no man who has not a certain amount of means can procure an outfit and a passage, in itself confines the emigration to those whose prudence and industry have secured to them such means; then, no man who is not naturally enterprising and energetic, would dream of the adventure. So that in the very nature of things, the emigration to California, is composed of a set of men superior to any class of emigrants ever known to us; and those who are familiar with the subject, will agree with us in the remark, that while nineteen-twentieths of all who have left, or are about leaving, the Atlantic for the Pacific coast, are men of good character and industrious habits, a very large portion of their number are young men of good education, of more than ordinary intelligence, and occupying high social positions. Among the list of emigrants may be found the names of every old family in the City and State, graduates from all our colleges, and members from almost every parish in full communion with the Church.

That such an emigration cannot fail to prove highly beneficial to California, all will admit: and we do not doubt but it will also prove beneficial to those who have thus, in a commendable spirit of adventure, and with an enterprise worthy of our people and our age, boldly rushed into the land of promise. We bid them God speed, not doubting their success; and we hold that it is the duty of the country thus sending forth its youth of promise, to plant our institutions and our language on the shores of the Pacific, to send with them the basis of all good government—the Christian religion. It is not enough for us to wish them success or to administer to their bodily wants. We must do more. We must send with these men the religion of their childhood; and give them in a new and strange land, the means for a continuance of the religious instruction in which they have been nurtured, and to which they owe their high moral character and their promise of future usefulness. We rejoice, therefore, to hear that the Presbyterians, the Methodists, the Baptists, and the Roman Catholics, have all promptly raised the necessary funds, and sent out missionaries to labor in this new Vineyard; and we especially rejoice to learn, that the Episcopal Church in this city, after some unnecessary delay, arising from an apprehension that a general effort might interfere with the action of the Committee on Domestic Missions, have energetically set to work, to do their duty in the premises. What that duty is, admits of no question. That it has been too long delayed—so long that all who have the welfare of the Church at heart, have just cause of complaint—is equally certain. But the day of hesitation is past; the time for action has arrived; and wealthy as the Church is known to be in this city, no body can doubt that success—triumphant success—will be the result of the movement now commenced.

An Executive Committee was appointed some time since, to take in charge the all-important matter of devising a plan to raise the necessary means to plant the Protestant Episcopal Church on the shores of the Pacific; and at a meeting held in the Sunday school-room of St. John's church on Tuesday evening, it was agreed that application should be made to all the rectors of churches in this city and Brooklyn, to take up a collection in their respective churches on Sunday the 18th inst. in aid of this great work. We append the circular* agreed upon on the occasion; and we will not for a moment doubt the success of the measure. Every clergyman in the two cities, will most cheerfully embark in this labor of love; every pulpit will resound with thrilling appeals to the hearts and the purses of those who take an interest in the welfare of Church or the present happiness and future prosperity of California; and prompt and effective will be the response.

In connection with the foregoing, we have received from one of our eminent Divines, the following communication. Such an appeal cannot pass unheeded. A sound and enlightened policy, the imperative demands of patriotism, and the plainest dictates of duty, alike require from those who have of this world's goods, to give freely and promptly.

Messrs. Editors of the Cour. & Engr.

Of the much that is said and written, and done in this community, in relation to our new possessions in California, it is to be regretted that so little has any bearing upon the morale of the great subject. Surely if this possession is a good thing—we owe some token of thankfulness to the bountiful Providence that bestowed it—and there are positive and stern responsibilities resting upon us in respect to the present and future social condition of a land—vast, fruitful, and as we are informed full

THE POWER OF CHRISTIANITY EXEMPLIFIED BY ITS EFFECT UPON DISTINGUISHED MINDS.

Were it necessary to urge examples instead of reasons, or advert to men of science among the laity, who have publicly avowed their conviction, after investigating, with all seriousness and accuracy, the grounds on which their faith was built, it might suffice to refer to Pascal, Leibnitz, M'Laurin, and Euler, the first mathematicians of their time; to Boerhaave, Zimmerman, Mead, Lydenham, Cheyne, Hartley, and Haller, among the physicians, and many other eminent members of that faculty, who were not only accomplished in all that was known in their art, but entertained the profoundest reverence for religion, and rendered it an essential service in their writings; to the moralists, Steele, Addison, and Johnson; to the poets, Milton, Cowley, Gellert, Gesner, Young and Cowper; to the lawyers, Hale, Forbes, Hailes, Blackstone, and Jones; all men of the most exalted and capacious minds, and stored with the richest treasures of ancient and modern lore.

Or to mention others still more celebrated, and whose authority may carry greater weight; where are greater names to be found than those of Bacon, and Newton, and Locke, the fathers of philosophy, who broke through the barriers of ancient prejudice, and laid the foundations of modern science on the solid basis of induction and experiment? Had there been any flaw or artifice perceptible in the claims of revelation, none were better qualified to expose the imposture. The same bold and vigorous intellect, which abandoned the beaten paths of error, and destroyed prejudices in science, was equally capable of detecting and overthrowing fraud in religion. Yet these men were Christians, devoted much of their time to study the Scriptures, and confessed the more they read, the more decided was the persuasion of their truth, and the greater their admiration of their excellence. Their belief was founded on the most diligent and exact researches into its history, the authenticity of its records, the completion of its prophecies, the character of its evidences, and the arguments of its adversaries.

Where are the infidels, it may be asked, who can bear a comparison with these illustrious philosophers, either in extent of learning, depth of penetration, solidity of understanding, seriousness of mind, or respectability of moral character? Here is obviously a greater preponderance of evidence on the side of belief than infidelity; a more splendid array of names, all equally distinguished in science, and more unquestionably superior in virtue and piety, to which no stigma of superstition, no reproach of melancholy or intellectual imbecility can possibly attach. The opinion of so many competent and unprejudiced witnesses, all verging like rays towards the same centre—this harmony of minds, so highly gifted beyond ordinary nature, separated by distant ages, and different pursuits, yet joining as it were in unison to celebrate the truth of Christianity, and presenting at its altars the homage of their immortal wisdom, affords a remarkable proof of the unity and identity of that principle which forms the basis of their common conviction. Against this concurrence of learned testimony, it will not be the crude and random cavils of ignorant declaimers; the artful objections of sophistical reasoners; the sneers and unmeaning ridicule of profane wit; the shallow arguments of profligates and libertines, or any set of men under the dominion of passions which religion condemns; that will have any weight with reasonable men, or stagger their belief in the authenticity of that religion, which claims the reverence and obedience of mankind.

Christianity courts the light, and has nothing to apprehend from the most subtle and ingenious of its learned adversaries. It has gained fresh lustre from their discoveries; and those sciences, such as astronomy, anatomy, and geology, which in their infancy were supposed to threaten its existence, and brought men of genius to the dungeon or the stake, have, in their advanced state, proved magazines and armouries to supply new proofs of its truth.

The virtuous and eminent philosopher Boyle, whose name is an ornament to his country, and claims the veneration of all posterity, who has seldom been equalled for the variety and extent of his researches, and who is never mentioned but with compliment and encomium in the history of almost every branch of experimental philosophy, at an early period of his life was perplexed with doubts about the certainty of the Christian revelation: but once confirmed in the truths of revelation, he bent his whole study to vindicate and recommend them to others. The greater part of his life and fortune were expended in illustrating their beauties and their usefulness, and in diffusing their influence. He was anxious to show the world, that a knowledge of nature was not incompatible with a firm belief in religion, and that it was possible for an experimental philosopher to be a sincere and zealous Christian.

At an early age his desire of knowing the truth was only exceeded by his inflexible regard to it, both in his words and actions. So strict was his veracity, and so contrary to his nature were falsehood and dissimulation, that his father often affirmed he never detected him in a lie in his whole life.

An eminent philosopher said that nature had formed him as an exemplar, or pattern of the highest perfection to which humanity can attain.

In a little tract, which may be regarded as one of the ablest defences of theology, against the objections of scientific sceptics that was ever penned, he shows that a deep insight into nature, instead of alienating the mind from religion, tends to confirm a man in the belief of it, and to increase his veneration for the Divine Author.

Considering the feebleness of his constitution, and the weakness of his eyes, the quantity of his reading, writings, and experiments, must appear astonishing. The simplicity of his diet was remarkable, and to all appearance, was that which preserved his life so long. Though inclined naturally to be choleric, he had gained a perfect ascendancy over this passion. His modesty was such that he did not dictate to others, but proposed his own sentiments with due distrust, and was ready to hearken to what others suggested. When he differed from any, he expressed himself in so humble and obliging a manner, that he was never known to treat with neglect, or offend any person in his whole life, by any part of his conduct. He could not be warm, when there was a proper occasion for warmth, that is in the cause of truth, which he always vigorously defended; but in his reproofs, he never used angry or reproachful expressions. He was particularly careful never to speak ill of the absent.

His character and reputation for learning went far beyond any of his contemporaries, and has seldom been equalled in any age. He made philosophy the business of his life, from the two noblest motives that man could possibly conceive; the desire of being serviceable to his kind, and of manifesting the goodness of his Divine Creator. There is no profession or condition among men, but may be benefitted by his discoveries. The merchant, the mechanic, the scholar, and the gentleman, are all under equal obligations to him. There is scarcely an art or profession, or production in nature, that has not derived some valuable advantages from his experiments and discoveries. He was at immense pains and expense in making his inquiries; he spared no time, no money, no diligence in pursuing discoveries for the public advantage, without any view to increase his own fortune, which he happily thought sufficient of itself. His soul was as great and as noble, as his genius was comprehensive; for he made the world a generous present of all the fruits of his labours, without the least expectation of a reward. He charged posterity to consider him but as a beginner, and not to stop short with his observations, but to pursue their researches through all the regions of nature, in the full assurance, that the further they inquired into the works of the Universal Architect, the more beauty and harmony, the greater use and satisfaction they would find among them. He was a great master of the Greek language, and read the New Testament in the original with such attention, that he could have quoted it almost as readily as the English version. He carried the study of the Hebrew tongue very far into the Rabbinical writings—he learned likewise the Chaldee and the Syriac, to be able to read the divine discourses of our Saviour in his own language. The Bible was his constant study, and he had read over a vast number of commentaries on the Scriptures. He had gone with great exactness through the whole controversies of religion, and had a just idea of the entire body of divinity. To his vast and incredible acquirements, he added the character of a sincere and exemplary Christian; so that we are at a loss which to admire the most, his extensive knowledge, or his exalted piety. He was regular in the exercises of devotion; and most constant and serious in his secret addresses to the Deity. He had the profoundest veneration for the great God of heaven and earth; so that the very name of God was never mentioned by him, without a pause and a visible stop in his discourse. He considered religion as a system of truths, which ought to purify the hearts, and govern the lives of those who embraced it. His charity to all who were in want was quite extraordinary. Great sums were freely distributed by him without the partialities of sect, kindred, or nation. He took care to do this so secretly, that even those who knew all his other concerns, could never discover the channels of his bounty. For some years his charity went beyond one thousand pounds per annum. He caused at his own expense a translation of the New Testament to be made into the Malayan tongue, which was printed and distributed over all the East Indies. He expended £700, on the edition of the Irish Bible, which he caused to be disseminated in Ireland. He was a very liberal benefactor to the Highlands of Scotland, in contributing towards the Gaelic translation of the Scriptures for their use. He caused 500 Bibles to be printed in Irish, and sent about 200 into Scotland: which made one book for each parish in the Highlands, and printed 3000 Catechisms and Prayer-books for their use, with some passages of Scripture, containing the principle heads of the Christian religion. He gave £300 to spread the Gospel in America, and in his Will set apart £100 more for the relief of poor Indian converts. The most memorable proof of his regard for the interests of revealed religion, is the foundation of The Theological Lecture in London, that bears his name, and which has given occasion to so many eloquent and able defences of revelation. Considered in every point of light, as a man, a philosopher, and a Christian, he came as near perfection as the defects of human nature would allow; and though he was unambitious of fame, yet the most universal encomiums, both at home and abroad, were conferred on him while living, and have constantly attended his memory. His single example is the simplest and most convincing of all arguments, what human nature is capable of, and what the Christian religion can add to it,—how far it can both exalt and reward it,—and how divine and pure a thing it must be in itself, which produced so long a series of great effects, through the whole course of this shining life, which must ever be considered as a pattern for imitation, and among the master-pieces even of that Great Hand that made it.

CAPTAIN WILSON.

Captain Wilson is well known as the able and enterprising conductor of the first Christian Mission to the South Seas, in 1796. His life was marked by a strange variety of changes and misfortunes, and furnishes a narrative, which for diversity of circumstances, affecting incidents, and striking illustrations of the happy influence of religious principles, has but few equals. It affords, at the same time, a beautiful and remarkable development of those kind but mysterious operations of Providence, which often makes events that we consider adverse or accidental, to terminate in some wise or salutary result, and accomplishes the most momentous changes in our lives, by means of the most unpromising instruments. In the early period of his life, the perils, imprisonments, and almost incredible sufferings he endured, throw an air of romance over that part of his history, which makes it resemble more the adventures of a fabulous hero, than a literal detail of truth and fact. During all the perils and sufferings he had undergone, his heart appears to have remained as insensible as the nether millstone to any thing like feelings of gratitude or devotion. No humiliation, no prayer, no recourse to the blood of a Redeemer, no regard for the future welfare of his soul, ever seems to have entered his thought, or alarmed his conscience. His mercies had no better effect than his chastisements and afflictions. He returned to life and health with the same callous propensities, the same stubborn nature, the same forgetfulness of God, and the same insensibility to those manifestations of divine care, that had, in such a wonderful manner led him by a way which he knew not—preserved him in deaths oft—in hunger and thirst, and nakedness,—in journeyings and in prisons,—in perils of waters, in perils in the wilderness, in perils by the heathen; and after all these dangers, crowned his labours with uncommon success, by means which appeared almost miraculous. But the plans of Omniscience are inscrutable; and while they are directed by infinite wisdom they are also characterized by benevolence. His Divine Master bore with his ignorance and rebellion, and was gradually preparing him, by a series of providences, for that peculiar work, in which he afterwards embarked with so noble and disinterested a zeal. Who have looked for a convert in a haughty unprincipled Indian merchant; or for a commander of a Christian Mission, in an Infidel sailor chained in a prison at Seringapatam? Who could expect the Deist, who returned from India contradicting the faith of Christ, and blaspheming the cause of the Cross, within five years afterwards on the quarter-deck, in the midst of prayer and praise, carrying the everlasting gospel to the isles of the Pacific ocean?

The conversation and exemplary conduct of his niece were instrumental in diffusing a preparatory religious influence over his mind. He was favoured with the acquaintance and friendship of Captain Sims, who had studied the Scriptures with great care, and represented to him the dangers of infidelity, and endeavoured to impress his mind with a conviction of the truth of a divine revelation. He invited the Rev. Mr. Griffin to spend a few days with him in the country and introduced him to Captain Wilson, and he answered all his objections against the authenticity of the sacred Scriptures. While reason and conscience suggested that he ought patiently to investigate the matter, and if found to be truth, to embrace and acknowledge it; the notion of enthusiasm, and the dread of becoming an object of ridicule, returned with increased force, and determined him to resist the current. The painful remembrance of former sins, and the fearful apprehensions of futurity, recurred to aggravate this internal conflict. He now became exceedingly pensive and thoughtful: the Bible and religious books formed his constant, and almost his only companions. Most of the principal works on Christianity he studied with great attention; until he had obtained such a firm persuasion of the truth of revelation, as to declare that nothing in the world, nor even Satan with all his principalities and powers, could persuade him that the Bible was not the word of the Most High; neither could any thing have weaned him from his errors, so completely as that precious volume had done. He read the Scriptures daily with better understanding, and with increased delight. As he was naturally of an active and benevolent turn of mind, and perceived clearly that the design of God in imparting divine grace to the heart, was not only to save the individual, but to make him the means of saving others, it began to be a subject of considerable anxiety with him, and even an evidence of his being a true Christian, whether, and how far his faith would induce him to exercise this benevolence in behalf of others. And to such reflections as these, is to be ascribed the reason for his offering himself to the Missionary Society, to conduct their first expedition to the islands of the Pacific Ocean. He solicited an interview with one of their leading members, and intimated with great modesty and diffidence that if the Society could not find a better conductor, the service should not be impeded for lack of nautical skill, and that he was ready, without any other reward than the satisfaction resulting from the service, to devote himself to the work. He was surprised that any who were not bound by circumstances, and had felt the power of truth, and knew the state of the heathen world, could remain quietly in England, while millions abroad were perishing for lack of knowledge. On the 23d of September the Duff, in company with more than fifty others, weighed anchor at Spithead, where Captain Wilson joined her and took command; wafted by propitious winds, and under the auspices of the effectual fervent prayers of many thousands of British Christians. After traversing more than twice the circumference of the globe, passing through climates so different, they not only escaped dangers and indispositions, but arrived at the various destinations, in better health than when they quitted their native shores. By this experiment, the way was opened up, into the innumerable groups that cover the Southern Ocean; and the facilities for extending missionary labours, greatly increased. After Captain Wilson's return from the South Seas he suffered from frequent bilious attacks. In this state of body, he possessed great patience and comfort of mind. He felt that he had lived to accomplish an important object, and was not unwilling to die. He lived for twenty years afterwards, and in 1799 married a most tender and affectionate wife, with whom he got a considerable addition to his fortune, which was deemed by many, a providential compensation for the noble sacrifice of time and property he had made in the missionary voyage. Circumstances occurred, however, which taught him an experimental lesson, on the mutability and uncertainty of human possessions; and tended to wean his heart from placing an undue attachment on gifts merely temporal and earthly. His family afflictions, and frequent personal indispositions, produced retired and domestic habits. He not only read but studied the Scriptures, and when he had arrived at the age of 46, and had begun to experience a failure of sight, the idea struck him, that he might perhaps become wholly unable, to read the sacred volume. Under this impression, he set himself to learn by heart whole chapters, and even books. The pleasure and advantage of this, he felt when laid on a sick-bed; and when incapable of reading, he drew from those sacred treasures an inexhaustible fund of consolation. He had cherished a steady attachment to the ordinances of religion, and his punctual attendance at divine worship, as well as his humble, unassuming deportment there, were attested by all who knew him. He debated the matter of his personal religion as in the sight and under the immediate eye of God. Considering the ease with which a man may deceive himself, and impose upon others, by an empty and unprofitable form of godliness, he was desirous of availing himself of every assistance in ascertaining the truth of his condition. He engaged assiduously in examining the grounds and evidences of his conversion. His nights, which for the most parts were sleepless, he passed in prayer, and in the recollection of those passages of Scripture that were familiar to his mind. He derived the utmost solace and refreshment from the many portions of sacred writ, which he had committed to memory, and enjoined his children, and recommended to his young friends, to copy his example in this respect; only to begin much earlier than he did. Until within two or three hours of his dissolution, he was blest with the continuance of his intellectual faculties; when the powers of nature being completely exhausted, the unfettered spirit was allowed to take its joyful flight. Who would have looked for a convert in a haughty unprincipled Indian merchant; or for the commander of a Christian Mission, in an Infidel sailor chained in a prison at Seringapatam? Who could expect the Deist, who returned from India contradicting the faith of Christ, and blaspheming the cause of the Cross, within five years afterwards on the quarter-deck, in the midst of prayer and praise, carrying the everlasting gospel to the isles of the Pacific ocean? Yet such are the mysterious ways of Providence, such the irresistible influence of truth, and such the power and efficacy of Christian principles.

THE DAILY SERVICE.

"Tua sunt omnia DOMINE, et de Tuis dabimus Tibi."

"By the daily incense of prayer and praise privately and publicly offered, and continually burning upon the Altar of the Temple; by acts of solemn and daily Intercession in our own behalf, and in behalf of the world; by the daily confession of our Faith; by the daily visitation of the sick and the afflicted; by the daily dispensation of self-denying charities to the poor and the destitute; by the daily instruction of the young and ignorant, not giving them up to the pollutions of the world, but educating them ourselves as members of CHRIST, and children of God; by the daily discipline of the mind, and the affections in the service of our LORD; by the daily warning of the wicked and the impenitent out of the Holy Scriptures; by the daily administration of the Rites and Sacraments 'as need shall require and occasion be given'; by all these authorized and appointed means, we are to preach the kingdom of God."—Rev. J. A. BOLLES.

"Let those who forsake 'the assembling of themselves together,' and avail at the restoration of the practice as pertaining to the things that have passed away, call to mind that it was in the Temple, their SAVIOUR taught daily—that it was to the Temple the halt and the blind and the lame came to seek Him—that it was in the Temple, after the descent of the Holy Spirit 'the Apostles continued daily with one accord'—that it was to the Temple the Disciples repaired after the Ascension of their Lord, to offer their praises and thanksgivings unto God, Who in raising up Jesus from the dead, had given them the assurance of their own immortality."—Rev. W. A. ADAMSON, A.B.

The Prophetic Psalmist of Israel looked forward through the distance and darkness of ages, to the bright dawn of the Messiah's advent, to the coming of the Son of God, to the establishment of His kingdom, Whose Name was to endure forever—whom all nations were to hail as blessed—to "whom prayer also was to be made continually," and who was "daily to be provided."

"He looked beyond the Temple ceremonies of the first Testament and beheld in the Morning and Evening sacrifices under the law—the type and shadow of those oblations of broken and contrite hearts, which, in times future, were to be presented by the congregated thousands of 'all tongues and climes and people,' who, in the daily service of the Church, were to 'worship and fall down, and kneel before the Lord their Maker.' Ibid.

"Are we then alone on holy ground,
Most gracious Father? Are we then alone,
Because the world regards not, and is gone?
Where are the solemn dead which lie around,
Are they not with us? Are Thy courts not crown'd
With spiritual hosts about, while the sweet tone
Still lingers round Thine Altar? Are they flown, Bearing no more to see their God disowned?
Has the Great Michael left us, mighty arm,
Gabriel, our fortitude, and the blest charm
Of Raphael's healing name? In my heart's fear
I heard a voice, 'Be still, and lowly bend;
While two or three remain, thy Lord is here,
And where His Presence is, His hosts attend.'"

MR. EDITOR:

Will you publish, for the information of your readers, the following extract from the thirty-first Canon of 1832?

"No Clergyman belonging to this Church shall officiate, either by preaching, reading prayers, or otherwise, in the Parish or within the Parochial Cure of another Clergyman, unless he have received express permission for that purpose from the Minister of the Parish or Cure, or, in his absence, from the church wardens and vestrymen, or trustees of the congregation. When Parish boundaries are not defined by law or otherwise, each city, borough, village, town or township, in which there is one Protestant Episcopal Church or congregation, or more than one such Church or congregation, shall be held for all the purposes of this Canon, to be the Parish or Parishes of the Protestant Episcopal Clergyman or Clergymen, having charge of said Church or Churches, congregation or congregations."

The words I have quoted are all so simple that it seems to me they cannot easily be mistaken. They will admit of but one construction. And yet I have known a Presbyterian of our Church to go a distance of well nigh twenty miles to perform a ministerial act within the Parish of a brother Presbyterian. And though that act was performed within sight of this brother's residence, yet no permission is asked, and no apology is afterwards presented. Alas! that Christian Ministers should ever forget the courtesy which is due from one to another! Nay, that they should ever be unmindful of that golden rule, "Do unto others as ye would they should do unto you." X.

Miscellaneous.

From Dr. Chalmers's Scriptural Readings.

DEBORAH'S SONG OF VICTORY.

"This a truly sublime ode, and its effect is greatly enhanced by the rude and distant antiquity whence its utterance is poured forth upon us. It is interesting to mark the primitive tendencies to song in the different ages of the world—proving how poetry and music are bound up, as it were, with the first elements of the human constitution. The instance before us is one of the most powerful and picturesque that has come down to us from any of the older periods of the world. The invocation to God is truly magnificent; and the representation of the state of Israel, one of the most graphical that can well be imagined, when the Philistines lorded it over the country, and the people had to take shelter in hiding-places. 'The mother in Israel' sets before us a most venerable and impressive figure. The blessing ascribed to God because of the people's willingness is an homage to His ascendancy over the hearts of men. He made them willing in the day of His power. O God, make me willing for every service Thou mightest be pleased in Thy providence to assign for me. It marks the simplicity of these ages, when the dignitaries of the land rode on white asses; and how exquisite are the descriptive touches, as that of the archers taking aim at the people when congregated at the wells. The rapid sketch of Israel by its tribes is highly poetical, and the pen of the ready writer has descended to us from one of the notabilia of this song; and so has the utterance that characterizes those who came not to the help of the Lord against the mighty. On the other hand, we are revolted by it, as a trace of the barbarism of these earlier times, when, in the recital of what took place, highly poetical though it be, we read the eulogy of Jael. But there is nothing in Ossian to equal the description of Sisera's mother looking forth with her ladies through the lattice, and waiting the return of their victorious lord. We may here note the licentiousness of war,—'Why are thy chariot wheels so long in coming?' ranks also among the notabilia of Scripture. And what a mighty imagination is that of the stars in their courses fighting against Sisera. We may pass two reflections on this chapter—first, how much of the memorable and great, both as acted in reality and set forth in history, may take place on a theatre of small material extent. Both Judea and Greece, and I should say Rome, when limited and surrounded by little states, give examples of this. Second, what attractions of eloquence, and beauty, and grandeur, are mixed up with religion, as exhibited in that Book which is the record of its doctrines, and also of the doings that took place in the world, viewed in the peculiar light of its being God's world."

With the exception of the kings Sihon and Og, whose territories are specified, we have nothing more of the other kings than mere nomenclature. Yet could we but realize their history—the busy play of their interests—the families under them—the fulness and amount of that living consciousness which is now extinguished, or at least swept off from the earth, embracing tens of thousands whose very names are unknown, saving only a bare and barren catalogue of kings whose names are all which remain to us; such a contemplation might well bring home the lesson of our own insignificance—sharing alike with the men of past generations in the brief and ephemeral character of our own little day; and hastening onward, like as they did, to the deep oblivion of death, and leaving room for a posterity who shall forget us and all our doings. O that we could contrast aright our own subordination and vanity with the greatness of Him who liveth for ever—who standeth at the head, and is the originator of this mighty series of changes—whose counsels embrace not only all nations, but all worlds; and whose grand design in creation reaches forward from everlasting to everlasting. There is a wisdom, a profound and at the same time a practical wisdom, to be gathered from this retrospect of the antiquity that is now rolled by. We think it should loosen our hold upon time. It should teach us a wider and a nobler survey than is taken by those whose views reach no further than to the evanescent objects of an evanescent world. It should inspire a wisdom as much higher than that of this world as eternity is greater than time—as the life that is to come is greater than the life that now is. Give me, O Lord, experimentally to realize of Scripture that all of it is profitable. Let me not think lightly of any of its informations. Teach me a supreme veneration for Thine own perfect and immaculate word; and when I read therein of nation succeeding nation, and add thereto the instruction that might be gathered from the book of experience—with what speed and certainty old families give place to new ones; and when I am led to refer all to the power and providence of God, who in judgment, and according to his own pleasure, roots out one and builds up another—when thus looking to myself as the tenant of a short-lived existence, and to the living God who presides over all the changes and movements of a universe, whereof himself is both the parent and the upholder—let me thus be borne aloft to that transcendental and more ethereal region in which he breathes who hath set his affections on the things which are above, and lives by the powers of a coming eternity.

"Then the rod of suffering turns into crowns and sceptres, when every suffering is a precept, and every change of condition produces a holy resolution, and the state of sorrows makes the resolution actual and habitual, permanent and persevering. For as the silk-worm eateth itself out of a seed to become a little worm; and then feeding on the leaves of mulberries, it grows till its coat be off, and then works itself into a house of silk; then casting its pearly seeds for the young to breed, it leaveth its silk to man, and dieth all white and winged in the shape of a flying creature: So is the progress of souls. When they are regenerate by Baptism, and have cast off their first stains, and the skin of worldly vanities by feeding on the leaves of Scriptures, and the fruits of the vine, and the joys of the Sacrament, they encircle themselves in the rich garment of holy and virtuous habits; then by leaving their blood, which is the Church's seed, to raise up a new generation to God, they leave a blessed memory, and fair examples, and are themselves turned into angels, whose felicity is to do the will of God, as their employment was in this life to suffer it. Fiat voluntas tua to our daily prayer, and that is of a passive signification;—Thy will be done upon us,—and if from thence also we translate it into an active sense, and by suffering evils increase in our aptness to do well, we have done the work of Christians, and shall receive the rewards of martyrs."—Bishop Taylor.

FALSE CHARITY.

There are some other ways of the world, in this matter of charity, which proceed, I think, upon false principles and feelings,—charity dinners, charity balls, charity bazaars, and so forth; devices (not even once blessed) for getting rid of distress without calling out any compassionate feeling in those who give or any grateful feeling in those who receive. God sends misery and misfortune into the world for a purpose; they are to be a discipline for his creatures who endure, and also for his creatures who behold them. In those they are to give occasion for patience, resignation, the spiritual hopes and aspirations which spring from pain when there comes no earthly relief, or the love and gratitude which earthly ministrations of relief are powerful to promote. In these they are to give occasion for pity, self-sacrifice, and devout and dutiful thought, subduing—for the moment at least—the light, vain, and pleasure-loving motions of our nature. If distress be sent into the world for these ends, it is not well that it should be shuffled out of the world without any of these ends being accomplished; and still less that it should be made the occasion of furthering ends in some measure opposite to these; that it should be danced away at a ball, or feasted away at a dinner, or dissipated at a bazaar. Better were it in my mind, that misery should run its course with nothing but the mercy of God to stay it, than that we should thus corrupt our charities.

Let me not be misunderstood. Feasting and dancing, in themselves and by themselves, I by no means disparage; there is a time and a place for them; but things which are excellent at one time and occasion, are a mere desecration at another. It is much more easy to desecrate our duties than to consecrate our amusements; and better therefore not to mix them up with each other.

Another modern mode is to raise a subscription by shillings or pennies,—fixing the contribution at so low a sum that nobody can care whether they give it or not, and collecting it in the casual intercourse of society. This is a less vitiated mode than the others, being of a more negative character; but, if the others are corrupted charity, this is no better than careless charity."—Taylor's Notes from Life. pp. 20, 21, 22.

A WISE MAYOR.—The Mayor was an old friend of mine, of whom I have bought many a pair of stockings. One day a man was brought before His Worship accused of breaking into a neighbour's garden, and stealing thence a large quantity of fine ripe gooseberries. His worship was very wroth: he said to his clerk, "Fetch down from that there shelf 'Burns' Justice,' and 'Blackstone's Cotemporaries.' Now, sir, (O, you rascal, I'll punish you!) now, sir, look out 'Gooseberry'—look out 'Gooseberry,' (I'll punish you —)" The clerk looked through the index of each book. "Please your Worship, there's no 'Gooseberry' here—I can't find 'Gooseberry.'" The Mayor looked himself, but "Gooseberry" was not to be found! "Ah!" said the Mayor, "you've escaped this time; but I'll speak to the Parliament, and I'll take care a law shall be made, and I'll have no stealing of gooseberries for the future." Now, all this is true; and it is true that the said Mayor was met in the meadows at Oxford taking a walk. "How d'ye do, Mr. Mayor?" "Pretty well, I thank ye; but I was very ill yesterday, so I took an exotic, and I am now taking a spontaneous walk"—meaning, it was conjectured, solitary, for His Worship was alone.—Bishop Sandford's Memoirs.

"So I have seen young and unskilful persons sitting in a little boat, when every little wave sporting about the sides of the vessel, and every motion of the dancing barge, seemed a danger, and made them cling fast upon their fellows; and yet all the while they were as safe as if they sat under a tree, while a gentle wind shook the leaves into a refreshment and a cooling shade: And the unskilful, unexperienced Christian shrieks out whenever his vessel shakes, thinking it always a danger, that the watery pavement is not stable and resident like a rock; and yet all his danger is in himself,—none at all from without; for he is indeed moving upon the waters, but fastened to a Rock. Faith is his foundation, and Hope is his anchor, and Death is his harbor, and Christ is his pilot, and heaven is his country; and all the evils of poverty, or affronts of tribunals and evil judges, of fears and sad apprehensions, are but like the loud wind blowing from the right point,—they make a noise, and drive faster to the harbor; and if we do not leave the ship, and leap into the sea; quit the interests of religion, and run to the securities of the world,—cut our cables, and dissolve our hopes,—grow impatient, and hug a wave, and die in its embraces,—we are as safe at sea,—safer in the storm which God sends us, than in a calm when we are befriended with the world."—Bishop Taylor.

"The heart of man is strangely proud. If men commend us, we think we have reason to distinguish ourselves from others, since the voice of discerning men hath already made the separation. If men do not commend us, we think they are stupid, and understand us not; or envious, and hold their tongues in spite. If we be praised by many, then fame is the voice of God. If we be praised but by few, then we cry,—these are wise, and one wise man is worth the whole herd of the people. But if we be praised by none at all, we resolve to be even with all the world, and speak well of nobody, and think well only of ourselves."—Bishop Taylor.

The following proves that admiration of white-wash is a heathenish taste.—ED. BAN.

CURIOUS COSMETIC. The Rev. J. Williams, the well known and philanthropic missionary, so long resident in the South Sea Islands, taught the natives to manufacture lime from the coral of their shores. The powerful effect it produced upon them, and the extraordinary uses to which they applied it, he thus facetiously describes:

"After having laughed at the process of burning, which they believed to be to cook the coral for food, what was their astonishment, when in the morning, they found his cottage glittering in the rising sun, white as snow. They danced, they sung, they shouted, and screamed, with joy. The whole Island was soon in a commotion, given up to wonder and curiosity, and the laughable scenes which ensued after they got possession of the brush and white-wash tub, baffle description. The bon ton immediately voted it a cosmetic and a kalydor, and superlatively happy did many a swarthy coquette consider herself could she but enhance her charms by a dab of the white brush. And now party spirit ran high, as it will do in more civilized countries, as to who was, or who was not best entitled to preference. One party urged their superior rank and riches; a second had got the brush, and were determined, at all events, to keep it; and a third tried to overturn the whole that they might obtain some of the sweepings. They did not even scruple to rob each other of the little share that some had been so happy as to secure. But soon new lime was prepared, and, in a week, not a hut, a domestic utensil, a war club, or a garment, but what was as white as snow—not an inhabitant but had his skin painted with the most grotesque figures—not a pig but was similarly whitened, and even mothers might be seen in every direction, capering with extravagant gestures, and yelling with delight at the superior beauty of their white-washed infants."

A FACETIOUS CLERGYMAN. Clergymen sometimes indulge in a little quiet humor as well as other people. We have been much amused with the following specimen, which has the advantage of not being without its moral.

A country parson, who was not over promptly paid by his parishoners, on entering the church one Sabbath morning, met one of the most wealthy of his flock, and asked the loan of a dollar.

"Certainly," said the man, at the same time handing over the coin.

The parson put it into his pocket, and preached his sermon in a most capital style; and on coming down from the pulpit, handed the identical dollar to the man from whom he borrowed it.

"Why," exclaimed the lender, "you have not used the money at all."

"It has been of great service to me nevertheless," replied the clergyman; "I always preach so much better when I have a little money in my pocket."

The hint was taken, and the balance of his salary was collected on the following day, and paid over to him.

THE FRIGATE BIRD. At a meeting of the members of the Ipswich Museum, the Bishop of Norwich said: He had sent to the Museum that day a specimen of the frigate bird, which was literally a tenant of the air; it lived in the air, slept in the air, and never came to the shore except in the breeding season. The explanation of this extraordinary phenomenon was as simple as possible. It was admirably constructed for the purposes of its existence. It had an enormous pouch beneath its throat, its skin was loose, its bones and arteries were like air vessels; and with an extraordinary expansion of tail and wings, it could, by imbibing a quantity of air, and rarefying it, within its body, become, in fact, an air balloon. In this manner it floated in the air even during sleep.

ALABAMA.

St. Stephen's Church in Eutaw, Ala., a handsome and very church-like building, with seats for two hundred and fifty persons, was consecrated by Bishop Cobbs on the 25th of November last. The religious services were continued three days: present, the Bishop, the Rev. Messrs. Wm. Miller, J. S. Marbury, M. J. Ellis, and the Rector, J. H. Ticknor. This is a bit of news I have seen in none of the Church papers; and it may be as well to remark, that under Bishop Cobbs' administration, the Church is steadily flourishing in Alabama.

Clerical Changes.

Rev. S. M. Rice has removed from Camillus to Jordan, Onondaga Co., Western New York, and requests his letters and papers addressed accordingly.

The Rev. Thomas B. Flower has received and accepted a unanimous invitation to the Rectorship of All Hallows' Church, Snow Hill, Maryland.

All letters and papers intended for him, will be directed accordingly.

We make the following extract as a fair specimen of the Third Part of Laneton Parsonage:—

"Long before, indeed, they could have told in words the nature of the Holy Sacrament to which they were to be admitted; but words too often are a hindrance rather than an assistance to our feelings; and preparation for a first communion is something widely different from the weekly repetition of the explanation of the subject given in the Church Catechism.

"So Madeline felt as she was spending some time alone, a few days after Ruth had sent her letter to Florence. She was trying to examine her own heart; trying to discover her faults; trying to realize her true condition upon earth, and the state of her preparation for heaven. A little book of self-examination lay open before her. It contained but few questions; and those, it would have seemed, soon answered. But each question suggested to Madeline's true and most conscientious mind subject for reflection and deep regret. The life, which to others appeared unspotted, was, then viewed in the presence of God, stained with innumerable sins.

"But Madeline would not shrink from the sight. One by one, the faults of which she was conscious from former self-examination were enumerated and confessed, with a fervent prayer for forgiveness and help; and then, the particular point upon which she had fixed for that day's inquiry was dwelt upon more minutely. It was vanity—a fault which Madeline saw in herself, although those who knew her best would have hesitated to acknowledge that she had it. She was vain of her personal appearance, and she began her self-imposed task by examining in what details this defect showed itself. Too much time, she knew, was spent in dressing; that was one sign: she was too particular in choosing her dresses; too anxious to hear remarks made upon herself and Ruth, which indirectly paid them compliments; she always observed carefully what other persons wore, and how it was put on; she was not pleased when others were called pretty; that approached to envy: but the groundwork was vanity. These things were indeed in themselves slight, but they were indications of a temper of mind to be guarded against, and Madeline had learned to look, not at her outward conduct only, but at her heart. When the offence was thus thoroughly perceived and acknowledged, the next step of importance was to see it in its true light—in its real deformity; to view it as it must be viewed by God. Madeline was vain of her appearance, and fond of admiration in general; yet, in a few years (so she had been taught always to carry on her thoughts to the end of life) her body must be laid in the grave, an object of dread to those who most loved her, with the worm spread under her, and the worm covering her. Where would then be room for vanity?

"She thought once more—there was a world, sinless and glorious, where saints cast their crowns of glory at the foot of the throne of God, and angels cover their faces with their wings in awful adoration of His majesty. Madeline tried but for a few moments to imagine what that world must be. She read of it in the Bible, and strove to bring before the eye of her mind some faint perception of its awfulness. She imagined herself standing among the hosts of heaven; she, the ignorant and weak, and vain—how would they feel towards her? How would they bear her presence? More than all, how would her merciful Saviour regard her? The holy and undefiled, how could He look upon the guilty? Vanity in heaven! Even to connect the ideas seemed a profanation. No, it must be striven against—crushed, uprooted. Were it to cost the labour of a life, and the watchfulness of every hour, still it must be conquered. Amongst the many sacrifices of pleasant sins to be made at the altar of her Saviour, vanity must unhesitatingly be numbered.

"The consciousness of perfect sincerity, blended with the depth of Madeline's repentance and humility, and with the confidence of a child asking help from a father, and the simple, reverent love of a sister trusting to an elder brother, she knelt once more in prayer, and felt that prayer was happiness. Then, as she rose to return to her usual employments, she dwelt for a few moments longer upon the probable temptations which would be awaiting her, especially with regard to this one fault. It was not often that she left her room without casting one look in her glass, as much from habit, perhaps, as from vanity. Now she turned away, not because it would be wrong to look, but because it was the first little opportunity which presented itself of proving her own sincerity; and the trifling act, scarcely to be termed self-denial, was the seal of her resolution and the earnest of future victories.

"Ruth spent some time also that day in self-examination; but she could not fix her mind like Madeline. The expectation of the answer from Florence Trevelyan was constantly recurring to her; and she found herself repeating the very words in which she supposed Florence would express a willingness to be entirely guided by her. It was rather surprising that she had not heard before; and an uncomfortable feeling rose at the thought, that, for the first time, she should receive a letter which she must ask her mother not to read. Still Ruth began the task which she had imposed upon herself, without being exactly conscious of what is called unreality; or, in other words, without seeing that she was keeping back from any known duty. Ruth's mode of self-examination differed from Madeline's. It had respect to the future more than the past. Where persons have long accustomed themselves to strictness of life, this may be a desirable mode of striving to improve. It is not well to think too much about our own minds, or even about our motives. It is better to dwell upon our Saviour's infinite love, and our own privileges as members of His Church; and then try and show our gratitude by thinking of all we can do to please Him. But, at certain times, especially whilst we are as yet unacquainted with our own dispositions, and must endeavour to become thoroughly humble as a preparation for the Holy Communion, it is absolutely necessary to examine our consciences closely; to look back upon the past, that we may learn to guard against the future. Ruth thought that she had done this, because on a former occasion she had read through and answered a certain set of questions; and now, like Madeline, she chose, as her papa had recommended, one particular fault to guard against. Madeline, as we have seen, began by a careful inquiry as to the little ways in which her defects showed themselves. Ruth, on the contrary, was satisfied with knowing, partly from having been told, and partly from her own conscience, that she had certain faults; and there the inquiry rested. Her self-examination was vague; what was gone by was in a manner forgotten; and her character was, in consequence, never truly viewed. So, in the present instance, self-conceit in general was, she well knew, what she had to struggle against; and she resolved not to speak of herself, not to put forward her opinion more than could be helped; to remember generally that self-conceit was wrong; and they were very good resolutions; but if we do not know the instances in which we have before failed, we cannot tell what we are bound to guard against. Neither were they resolutions founded upon Christian humility—a heathen might have made them. There was no remembrance of the lowliness of the Saviour of the world, no consideration of his perfect purity, no real desire to be humble, because so she might be like Him. Ruth strove against her faults, more because they lowered her in the eyes of her fellow-creatures, than because they were hateful in the eye of God; and when we look at our sins only in this way we never have a true view of them. Nothing will give us a real feeling of unworthiness but the consideration of our Saviour's perfection and yet of his unspeakable love; and nothing will really enable us thoroughly to root out sin except the wish to please Him, as we would wish to please our parents, and the certainty that He will accept the very least endeavour, and forgive our falling away, even until seventy times seven. Madeline's efforts were a pleasure; Ruth's were a burden; yet Madeline had a much greater sense of her own helplessness and guilt than her sister. The one thought of her Saviour, the other of herself.

"Meanwhile, Madeline returned to the duties of her daily life with the feeling of love urging her to watchfulness and energy. Ruth returned to hers, with the thought that she had done what was right, and was therefore better prepared for confirmation and the holy communion.

We have received a copy of the Messrs. Appletons' republication of this Part, in a style uniform with Parts I. and II. We take this method of presenting the work to the favorable regard of our readers. The reputation of the Authoress is too well established to need our endorsement, and we have little time for such reading, agreeable as it is.—[ED. BANNER.]

"God hath many ends of providence to serve by the hands of violent and vicious men. By them He not only checks the beginning errors and approaching sins of the predestinate; but by them He changes governments and alters kingdoms, and is terrible among the sons of men. For since it is one of His glories to convert evil into good, and that good into His own glory, and by little and little to open and to turn the leaves and various folds of providence; it becomes us only to dwell in duty, and to be silent in our thoughts, and wary in our discourses of God; and let Him choose the time when He will prune His vine, and when He will burn His thorns:—how long He will smite His servants, and when He will destroy His enemies."—Bishop Taylor.

THE NARROW WAY.

Believe not those who say
The upward path is smooth,
Lest thou shouldst stumble in the way,
And faint before the truth.

It is the only road
Unto the realms of joy;
But he who seeks that blest abode,
Must all his powers employ.

Bright hopes and pure delights
Upon his course may beam;
And there, amid the sternest heights,
The sweetest flowerets gleam.

On all her breezes borne,
Earth yields no scents like those:
But he that dares not grasp the thorn,
Should never crave the rose.

Arm, arm thee for the fight!
Cast useless loads away;
Watch through the darkest hours of night;
Toil through the hottest day.

Crush pride into the dust,
Or thou must needs be slack;
And trample down rebellious lust,
Or it will hold thee back.

Seek not thy honor here,
Waive pleasure and renown;
The world's "dread laugh" undaunted bear,
And face its deadliest frown.

To labor and to love,
To pardon and endure,
To lift thy heart to God above,
And keep thy conscience pure,—

Be this thy constant aim,
Thy prayer and thy delight;
What matters who should whisper blame,
Or who should scorn or slight!—

What matters—if thy God approve,
And if, within thy breast,
Thou feel the comfort of His love,
The earnest of His rest?

ACTON BELL.

As some of our readers have been disposed to think the Banner has been a little dry in the discussion upon church music, we are tempted to give them the following as a set off. We must say our sympathies are entirely with the Deacon. We think he did good service in confounding the ambitious choir. His principle is the right one. "Singing is praying," or rather it is a part of God's worship. It is the duty of all who have the ability to join in it. The reason so few are able, is, that they are not trained in early life to this part of God's service. Another reason is the great variety and difficult kind of music selected by choirs. For ourselves we would prefer the Deacon's stubborn vociferation to the more stubborn silence of those who can and wont sing. The modesty of the choir, at whose permission individuals should alone be permitted to sing, is worthy of note. However fine their music may have been in human ears, the Deacon's honest hearty discord, we doubt not was more harmonious in the ear of Heaven.

SOME PASSAGES IN THE

LIFE OF DEACON GOODMAN.

Wherein is shown the inconvenience of not having the "Musical Ear."

Deacon Goodman was extensively known, not merely in his own parish, but through several miles of the surrounding country, for his amiable disposition, active benevolence, and unquestioned piety. So thoroughly was the Deacon's character established, that when the people of the neighboring towns saw him passing by, they would say—"that man was rightly named, for if there ever was a good man, he is one." And from this there was no dissenting voice. Nay; I am wrong in saying that; for there are some who never hear any body praised without an interposing and qualifying "but;" "He may be well enough on the whole," they will say, "but," &c. &c.; and then they will go on and make him out "any thing but a clever fellow."

The qualifying "but" must be interposed even in the case of Deacon Goodman. He had a fault. He would sing in meeting. "Call you that a fault?" saith the reader. Well then, kind reader, call it a misfortune. "But why a misfortune?"

I will tell thee. Nature has so formed us, that some have the "musical ear," and others not.—Now this "musical ear" has nothing to do with real character, moral or intellectual; but yet the persons who have not the "musical ear" ought never to sing in meeting. If they do, they will be sure to annoy others, and make themselves ridiculous. Deacon Goodman had not the "musical ear." Whether it were the "Messiah," or the "Creation," or Jim Crow and Zip Coon, it was all the same to him, so far as music was concerned; it was just so much singing. Whether the artist were Savori, or Ole Bull, or poor old John Casco, it was just so much fiddling. He had not the "musical ear," and still less, if possible, the musical voice; but yet he would sing in meeting. And the gentle and respectful remonstrances of the choir leader were met with the unvaried reply, "Singing is praying: you might as well ask me not to pray; I shall sing in meeting."

It is now proper for the biographer to hint at another trait in the good Deacon's character. He was rather "set in his way;" or in other words, he was dreadfully obstinate in what he thought a good cause: and he was generally correct in appreciating the merits of the cause.

We all know that musical people are apt to be sensitive and sometimes a little capricious; and who has ever known a theatrical orchestra, or even a village choir, that had not a regular "blow up" at least once a year? Beyond all doubt, Deacon Goodman's singing was a very serious grievance to the choir, and no small annoyance to the congregation. Yet in consideration of his great merits he was indulged; and his regular Sunday performances, often drew forth the remark, that if music murder was a sin, Deacon Goodman would have much to answer for. But there is a point beyond which forbearance is no longer a virtue. Great pains had been taken by the choir in getting up a new anthem, (selected from Mozart) for Thanksgiving day, and the very gem of the piece was a solo, which had been assigned to the sweetest voice, and the prettiest little girl in the village. All who attended the rehearsals were perfectly delighted with the solo as sung by "little Mary." It was very difficult. It was marked from beginning to end, "Andantino," "Dolce," "Affettuoso," "Crescendo," "Piano," "Pianissimo," with changing keys, and flats and sharps, springing out from unexpected places; but she had conquered it all. Three or four accomplished singers who had come from Boston, to pass Thanksgiving in the country, and who attended the last rehearsal, were in raptures with little Mary's singing. They had heard Tedesco, and Biscaccianti, and Madam Bishop; and yet they say, "for a country girl, she is a prodigy."

In due time, Thanksgiving day arrived; and while the "second bell" was ringing, news came to the village that a very serious accident had happened to the Universalist minister. His horse had thrown him, and either his leg or his neck was broken; the boy who had brought the news had forgotten which. "I hope it is not his neck," said the rich and charitable old church member. When Deacon Goodman heard that remark, he held up his hands and exclaimed "I never!"

Now the Deacon dearly loved good preaching, and the meeting-house was to him a "house of feasting." But his religion was of a very practical kind, and although he thought but precious little of his good works, he took care to do a good many of them, and was far from believing with Amsdorf, that "good works are an impediment to salvation." So, said he to Mrs. Goodman, "do you go to the house of feasting, and get all the good you can, and I will go to the house of mourning, and do all I can." And away he went to see, and if possible, to relieve the Universalist minister.

In the mean time the congregation assembled, and the worship proceeded in the usual way.

Now, Deacon Goodman always made it a rule, when any accident had detained him until after worship had commenced, to come in very softly. How different from the fashionable flourish! All were intent on the solo. None heard, and but few saw Deacon Goodman enter his pew, and take up the sheet on which the words of the anthem was printed.

Unlike that of many singers, the articulation of "little Mary" was perfect.—The Deacon soon found the place; and to the astonishment of the congregation, indignation of the choir, and the perfect horror of "little Mary, he 'struck in,' and accompanied her through the whole solo. Accompanied!! "Off in the stilly night," accompanied by Captain Bragg's battery, would give some notion of it. Poor little Mary was sick a fortnight. "Why don't you cut that old fellow's tongue off?" said one of the Boston singers. "What good would it do?" said the choir leader, "he would howl through his nose." They were all very cross. As for the Deacon he looked around as innocent as a lamb, and thought he had sung as well as any of them.

Immediately after meeting, the choir leader called on the minister. "Sir," said he, "this must stop. If Deacon Goodman sings again, I do not."

"Oh I know it," said the minister, "I have long felt the difficulty; but what can we do? Deacon Goodman is a most excellent man, and his only faults are that he is rather set in his way, and will sing in meeting."

"But Deacon Goodman is a reasonable man," said the choir leader.

"On most occasions," replied the minister.

"Do go and see him, sir, for my mind is made up; if he sings in meeting, I do not."

"Deacon Goodman," said the minister, "I have come on a delicate errand; I have come to present the respectful request of the choir that you would not sing in meeting."

The Deacon was thunderstruck: but he soon recovered. "Singing is praying," said he. "They may just as well ask me not to pray: I shall sing in meeting." And on the next Sunday, sure enough he did: louder, and if possible, more inharmonious than ever. The men singers looked daggers at him; the girls hid their smiles behind their music books. Little Mary was not there.

"This shall stop," said the choir leader. "I will go and see him myself."

"Deacon Goodman, we all most highly respect you, as you must well know: but you have not the musical ear nor the musical voice, and it is the earnest wish of the choir, and many of the congregation, that you do not again sing in meeting."

The Deacon was again thunderstruck, but soon recovered. "Singing is praying," said he, "and they might as well tell me not to pray. I shall sing in meeting."

The good Deacon was dreadfully set in his way, and so it went on again week after week, in the same old way.

But an incident occurred, which contributed much to bring this singular case to a crisis. About two miles from the Deacon's comfortable dwelling, there was a wretched hovel, which imperfectly sheltered the wretched wife and children of a still more wretched drunkard.

On one of the most inclement evenings of a New England January, the Deacon and his family were cheerfully and thankfully enjoying a glorious hickory fire; Mrs. Goodman was sewing for the family, and her daughters for the missionary society. His son was reading the Massachusetts Ploughman, and the good man himself was just finishing off a sermon by a distinguished divine of his own denomination, when bang went the front door, and in came his good neighbor and own beloved and respected minister. "Why! I never!" said Deacon Goodman, "what has brought you along in such a night as this?" Now, this minister had his peculiarities as well as the Deacon. Among others, he was very close mouthed about his own good deeds: He merely answered, "I have been about my duty, I hope." The fact was he had been to visit, and to talk, and pray, with a poor dying negro. "Seems to me you are rather crusty," said the Deacon, "but I suppose you are half frozen, and so sit down and thaw yourself out." "I thank you," said the minister, "but I merely called to tell you that I have just left a scene of misery; and I want you to go there as early as you can in the morning. On my way here and home, I passed that wretched hovel which we all know so well. I felt it my duty to stop and learn the cause of the terrible uproar within. I found the wretch beating his wife; and her screams, and his horrid oaths made my blood run cold."

"Put old Mag in the wagon." "Deacon, don't go to-night," said Mrs. Goodman. "Do wait till morning," said all his daughters. "Let me go," said his son. "Mind your own business," said the Deacon to all of them, "I shall go to-night." When it came to that, they knew there was no more to be said. He was dreadfully "set in his way." He took a bag and a basket, and went down cellar. He filled the bag with potatoes. He took a piece of pork from one barrel, and a piece of beef from another, and put them in the basket. He went to the closet, and took a brown loaf and a white one. He went to the wood pile, and took an armful of wood, and told his son to take another. All was put in the wagon; he not forgetting six candles and a paper of matches. Deacon Goodman needed no secondary motive to Christian duty; yet historical truth demands the concession, that the wife of the poor drunkard was his first love. She jilted him; or as we Yankees say, "gave him the mitten," in favor of the abject wretch who was now become her tyrant. And this was the way he "fed fat the ancient grudge" he owed her! The truth is, Deacon Goodman knew nothing about grudges, ancient or modern. The old Adam would occasionally flare up, but he always got him under before sun-down.

All was ready, and in five minutes the Deacon was "exposed to the peltings of the pitiless storm." But what did he care for the storm? "I am going on God's errand," said he to himself. "I am going to visit the worse than widow and fatherless." The next thing he said was, "Oh, get out." That he meant for the promptings of his own proud heart.

THE BROTHERHOOD OF THE CHURCH.

In an article on this subject, which appeared in our columns a few months ago, we expressed ourselves somewhat strongly in defence of the principle, that the sympathies and affections which have been wreathed by a hand divine round the Brotherhood of the Church, are intended to exist without regard to local, national, or political distinctions. This interesting topic has been brought back to our minds by some remarks upon the martyrdom of king Charles the First, which we have read in the Calendar, one of the ablest of our Church contemporaries in the United States. We give below the brief, but most judicious notice of the Royal Martyr, so that our readers may see how it breathes the spirit of living unity and genuine Church feeling. Most gratifying it is to see that Churchmen in the States can most cheerfully and most lovingly do ample justice to the precious memory, and the truly dignified and pious character of the unfortunate monarch; not passing over, or as some might do, blackening his exalted virtues because he was a king. The time is gone by when even loyal-hearted Britons could extenuate, much less vindicate, the manifest political errors and indiscretions of the ill-fated Stuart family, in whose hereditary weaknesses the best of the whole family (Charles the First) was, to his own misfortune, a participator. But if he needed prudence and knowledge to wear his crown in security and peace, it was not so with his faith. As to that he was, indeed, "thoroughly furnished" with the Christian panoply; for he held his faith with firmness, with intelligence, and in prayer; and he seemed to be equally well fitted to defend the doctrines of his Church, to live up to her system, and to die for her sake. Yes! so long as the "Brotherhood of the Church" abideth, Churchmen all over the world, though in natural or political position they may be wide as the poles asunder, will cherish and revere the memory of the king, who was shamefully done to death by cruel oppressors, because he would not betray and renounce the beloved Church, to whose service, as he had consecrated his writings, so he offered up his blood.

"Tuesday last, (says the Calendar) was the 200th anniversary of the Royal Martyrdom; to English and to American Churchmen a glorious anniversary, marking the goodness of God in preserving, for two centuries, that Apostolic succession, for the preservation of which Charles the First consented to death. As a king, Americans may not feel immediately concerned in his history and sufferings; but as a son of the Church and a witness for the truth, we cherish his memory; and the more we study his political life, the more we are convinced of the injustice and tyranny of those who slew him. That under God his blood was the rescue of the Church of England from extinction, is simple history; and let him be gratefully remembered by all who love her prosperity. 'In the sight of the unwise he seemed to die, and his departure was taken for misery. But though he was punished in the sight of men, yet was his hope full of immortality. How is he numbered with the children of God, and his lot is among the Saints!'"

A Review of Oliver Cromwell's history, suggested principally by Mr. D'Aubigne's most dishonest work, "The Protector, a Vindication," was published in the Church Review for October, 1848. This contribution is characterized by the usual ability of the Magazine in which it appears, and has been written in the same excellent spirit as the extract which we have given from the Calendar.

It will scarcely be considered foreign from our subject to quote from the Church of England Quarterly Review, the following touching allusion to the scene of the king's imprisonment in the Isle of Wight:—

"Above the village of Carisbrook (Isle of Wight) from the remains of the fortress which held for a time imprisoned the fallen majesty of England, and within whose walls, where royalty groined captive, is perpetrated the repeated desecration that attends the noisiest of pic-nics. It is a desecration only second to that attendant upon these joyous assemblies when they meet to enjoy their saturnalia, or their gladness, within the ruins of walls that have been consecrated once and forever to the service of God. At Carisbrook was the dungeon, and in Newport is the grave, of one whose fate was, perhaps, even harder than that of Charles—we allude to the terrible destiny of his young and accomplished daughter, the princess Elizabeth. The men who slew her father pleaded cause, but they had no argument but the common argument of the caprices of tyranny, for slowly murdering this exquisite child by inflicting on her youthful timidity all the horrors of a prison. She was but thirteen when her father was judicially assassinated; and for nearly two years after that period the Republican government kept her immured in the strong fortress of Carisbrook. Clarendon describes her as one of distinguished parts, great observation, and early understanding; but for these qualities the frantic king-slayers cared as little as the murderers of Marie Antoinette cared for those of her child, the dauphin. They turned away with a jeer from the offers made by European courts to afford a home to the royal child; and they added torture to the other cruelties inflicted upon her by intimating that it was their intention to apprentice this, the grand-daughter of Henri Quatre, to a Round-head, prick-eared, button maker of Newport! The poor girl sunk beneath her accumulated indignities, and she was buried, walled up, and nearly forgotten, till her sad story was again rendered fresh in men's minds by the discovery, in October, 1793, of her coffin in a vault near the altar. There could be no mistake as to the identity of the remains; for, above the bosom of the martyred child of a martyred father, some hand had inscribed "ELIZABETH, 2ND DAUGHTER OF YE LATE KING CHARLES, DECE'D SEPT. 8, MDCL."

As we have sallied out on a peace making excursion, and are glad to pick up every gleaming of brotherly love and kindness on the way, we must crave forgiveness from our readers for being enticed into a rambling strain, and will venture to wind up the "wanderings" of our discursive pen with the following passages from "a New Ballad to Columbia," by Martin Farquhar Tupper:—

"I claim your love for Britain,
In spite of every wrong!
I claim it for—your mother,
Your sister and your spouse,
Your father, friend, and brother,
The "Hector" of your vows!

* * * * *
O yes! your recollections
Look back with streaming eye
To pour those old affections
On scenes and days gone by;
Your Eagle well remembers
His dear old island-nest,
And sorrow stirs the embers
Of love within his breast.

Ah! need I tell of places
You dream and dwell on still?
Those old familiar faces
Of English vale and hill,—
The sites you think of, sobbing,
And seek as pilgrims seek,
With brows and bosoms throbbing,
And tears upon your cheek.

Or, should I touch on glories
That date in ages gone,
Those dear historic stories
When England's name was won,—
The tales your children thronging
So gladly hear you tell,
And note their father's longing
And love that longing well!

For language, follies, fashions,
Religion, honor, shame,
And human loves and passions,
Oh! we are just the same:
You, you are England, growing
To Continental state,
And we Columbia, glowing
With all that makes you great.

Yes, Anglo-Saxon brother,
I see your heart is right,—
And we will warm each other
With all our loves alight;
In feeling and in reason
My claim is stowed away,—
And kissing is in season
For ever and a day!

* * * * *
So let whatever threaten
While God is on our side,
Columbia and Britain
The world shall well divide,—
Divide?—no! in one tether
Of Anglo-Saxon might,
We'll hold the world together
In peace and love and might."

FROM A SERMON ON "CALIFORNIA,"

BY REV. S. R. JOHNSON, (D.D.)

And with our wishes and our prayers, let our doings correspond. Send with them, or send after them, as soon as may be approved and faithful ministers of the Church of Christ. And as circumstances are very peculiar at present, and the mechanic arts not yet exercised there, or with exorbitant expense, secure with provident anticipation, all that can be conveniently prepared of houses of worship, of parsonage, and of sacred furniture. Send out largely, Bibles, Prayer Books, Tracts, useful publications, and all needed things.

And as the late history of this region of California is a very remarkable and interesting one, a wonderful closing chapter of this last year's wondrous volume of the world's life—a great event in the world's great history—since not hundreds, but thousands and tens of thousands of our citizens are proceeding thither;—since a mighty nation is growing up there in a year, and the foundations of States are to be laid, which will loom up to the eye of the coming generations;—since the event is so strange, so startling, so momentous, so romantic, well nigh bordering on the miraculous:—let your sympathy, your exertions, your benefactions, be correspondent in their nobility and their largeness. I speak not of your "offerings" this very day, or just at this season, though it were well that these "first fruits" be generously bestowed;—but keep your eye of succor and munificence on this country and on the Church within its borders: and while they need your help, give it with most unstinted generosity. Prove by deeds of love and bounty, that we in the old homestead of our land, and on the beaten tracks of common industry, can do as much as they might hope to do with their gathered stores of golden grain and sand—and more. Yes, let them experience that old Long Island with her sands, has still her own high value and great power, and can accomplish much for good; and that the two rivers of our pride near by, can convey treasures which shall benefit even them more than all that is covered by the Sacramento and the Gila. Though if high clear duty sent me there, I would not turn my back, and might in time learn to prize them more, yet as I now feel, I confess I would not for real value, give the Hudson, the river of my boyhood and my youth, nor the Wabash of the West, (on whose banks I passed my best eleven years,) with the vast accumulated burden of its grain,—I would not give the one or the other for them both.

When the children of Israel were about settling the promised land, the tribes of Reuben and Gad, and the half of Manasseh, preferred to settle on the wrong side of the Jordan, because they "had a very great multitude of cattle, and behold the place was a place for cattle." Their plea was allowed, and for this property or pecuniary consideration, the original plan of settlement was altered. Moses indeed charged them to strict fidelity to their duty, and adherence to their religion and their covenants; and that then they should be "guiltless before the Lord and before Israel." "But if ye will not do so, behold ye have sinned against the Lord; and be sure your sin will find you out." And they were bound and enjoined to keep to the TRUE INSTITUTION AND ONE GREAT ALTAR AND TABERNACLE OF JEHOVAH. And they said, "God forbid that we should build an altar for sacrifice beside the altar of the Lord our God that is before his tabernacle!" And so, with kindly interchange and devout offerings, they both helped to build up the One true cause of Zion, and to maintain the service of her sanctuary. We must do the same. We are one. However widely separated we may be, we are one. Who can tell what a change ten years may make, bringing us more nearly together, binding us more closely to each other; and enriching that extended waste of territory with all the fine products of Christian and cultivated life! In the year 1834, I stood on Rock Island in the Mississippi, and besides the military post, and one Indian trader's house, I could see nothing but the magnificent scenery of the mighty river, and its natural terraces of the opposing shore:—charming to the eye were the river banks in their native beauty; but no white man trod among those ornamented groves, or amid those open lawns. Six years passed, —and from the very spot might you see all the signs of Anglo-Saxon civilization. The fields were waving with grain. The hum of human industry was heard every where around. The houses of the farmer showed themselves frequent, standing out upon the open space, or peering out amid the trees;—while on either side, two large towns with their thousand population, spread out their public streets, and mansions, and their private homes. And the voices of Christian preachers were heard on the Christian Sabbath—the blessed day of our blessed Lord—Methodist, Presbyterian, Baptist. And low and faintly fell upon the listening ear of our disheartened wanderers, the voice of a devout Churchman, an elderly layman, reading the Church prayers in a lowly dwelling.

Brethren of the Atlantic coast, we did not do our duty to the West. We gave not at God's altar offerings enough to speed out the ministry of the Church to its sacred and healthful work, and to sustain it there. We did not do our duty then—we have not done it yet. Let us make one great, memorable exception to our thoughtless, shall I not say, our heartless oversight. Let us, if need be, pour out our thousands and tens of thousands, and provide for our brothers of the Pacific, the great Church of God's appointment, and of his electing love. Time may show that they distribute their gathered stores and golden treasures throughout this the mother region, enriching it far more than their own less favored coast. But eternity will make mention, that we have given them the infinitely greater treasure of the two, a treasure for earth—a treasure for heaven. For oh! the Church of the Living God, with the faith of our Lord Jesus Christ, our Mediator and Redeemer, with its high grace, and precious gifts, and blessed consolations, and its glorious immortality, surpasses all—all known, gathered, or imagined—and can be mentioned with none other! "It cannot be valued with the gold of Ophir, with the precious onyx or the sapphire! The gold and the chrystal cannot equal it!"—a Universe of diamonds is "a fool to it!"

* A collection was made to be sent to the Treasurer of the Committee for Domestic Missions, to be given to aid in the earliest special effort for the Church in California, to which the Committee may feel at liberty to appropriate it, whether such effort be made through that Committee or otherwise.

SHORT PRACTICAL READINGS FOR LENT.

From Law's Serious Call.

Some people will perhaps object, that all these rules of holy living unto God in all that we do, are too great a restraint upon human life; that it will be made too anxious a state, by thus introducing a regard to God in all our actions; and that by depriving ourselves of so many seemingly innocent pleasures, we shall render our lives dull, uneasy, and melancholy.

To which it may be answered:—

First, That these rules are prescribed for, and will certainly procure a quite contrary end. That, instead of making our lives dull and melancholy, they will render them full of content and strong satisfactions. That, by these rules, we only change the childish satisfactions of our vain and sickly passions for the solid enjoyments and real happiness of a sound mind.

Secondly, That as there is no foundation for comfort in the enjoyments of this life, but in the assurance that a wise and good God governeth the world, so the more we find out God in every thing, the more we apply to him in every place, the more we look up to him in all our actions, the more we conform to his will, the more we act according to his wisdom, and imitate his goodness, by so much the more do we enjoy God, partake of the divine nature, and heighten and increase all that is happy and comfortable in human life.

Thirdly, He that is endeavoring to subdue and root out of his mind all those passions of pride, envy, and ambition, which religion opposes, is doing more to make himself happy, even in this life, than he that is contriving means to indulge them.

For these passions are the causes of all the disquiets and vexations of human life; they are the dropsies and fevers of our minds, vexing them with false appetites, and restless cravings after such things as we do not want, and spoiling our tastes for those things which are our proper food.

Do but imagine that you some where or other saw a man that proposed reason as the rule of all his actions, that had no desire but after such things as nature wants and religion approves, that was as pure from all the motions of pride, envy, and covetousness, as from thoughts of murder; that in this freedom from worldly passions, he had a soul full of divine love, wishing and praying that all men may have what they want of worldly things, and be partakers of eternal glory in the life to come.

Do but fancy a man living in this manner, and your own conscience will immediately tell you that he is the happiest man in the world, and that it is not in the power of the richest fancy to invent any higher happiness in the present state of life.

And on the other hand, if you suppose him to be in any degree less perfect; if you suppose him but subject to one foolish fondness or vain passion, your own conscience will again tell you, that he so far lessens his own happiness, and robs himself of the true enjoyment of his other virtues. So true is it, that the more we live by the rules of religion, the more peaceful and happy do we render our lives.

Again; as it thus appears that real happiness is only to be had from the greatest degrees of piety, the greatest denials of our passions, and the strictest rules of religion, so the same truth will appear from a consideration of human misery. If we look into the world, and view the disquiets and troubles of human life, we shall find that they are all owing to our violent and irreligious passions.

Now all trouble and uneasiness is founded in the want of something or other; would we therefore know the true cause of our troubles and disquiets, we must find out the cause of our wants; because that which creates and increases our wants, does in the same degree create and increase our troubles and disquiets.

God Almighty has sent us into the world with very few wants; meat, and drink, and clothing, are the only things necessary in life; and as these are only our present needs, so the present world is well furnished to supply these needs.

If a man had half the world in his power, he can make no more of it than this: as he wants it only to support an animal life, so is it unable to do any thing else for him, or to afford him any other happiness.

This is the state of man, born with few wants, and into a large world, very capable of supplying them. So that one would reasonably suppose, that men should pass their lives in content and thankfulness to God, at least that they should be free from violent disquiets and vexations, as being placed in a world that has more than enough to relieve all their wants.

But if to all this we add, that this short life, thus furnished with all that we want in it, is only a short passage to eternal glory, where we shall be clothed with the brightness of angels, and enter into the joys of God, we might still more reasonably expect, that human life should be a state of peace, and joy, and delight in God. Thus it would certainly be, if reason had its full power over us.

But alas! though God, and nature, and reason, make human life thus free from wants, and so full of happiness; yet our passions, in rebellion against God, against nature and reason, create a new world of evils, and fill human life with imaginary wants and vain disquiets.

The man of pride has a thousand wants, which only his own pride has created; and these render him as full of trouble, as if God had created him with a thousand appetites, without creating any thing that was proper to satisfy them. Envy and ambition have also their endless wants, which disquiet the souls of men, and by their contradictory motions, render them as foolishly miserable, as those that want to fly and creep at the same time.

Let but any complaining, disquieted man tell you the ground of his uneasiness, and you will plainly see that he is the author of his own torment; that he is vexing himself at some imaginary evil, which will cease to torment him, as soon as he is content to be that which God, and nature, and reason, require him to be.

If you should see a man passing his days in disquiet, because he could not walk upon the water, or catch birds as they fly by him, you would readily confess, that such an one might thank himself for such uneasiness. But now if you look into all the most tormenting disquiets of life, you will find them all thus absurd; where people are only tormented by their own folly, and vexing themselves at such things as no more concern them, nor are any more their proper good, than walking upon the water or catching birds.

What can you conceive more silly and extravagant than to suppose a man racking his brains, and studying night and day how to fly? wandering from his house and home, wearying himself with climbing upon every ascent, cringing and courting every body he meets, to lift him up from the ground, bruising himself with continual falls, and at last breaking his neck? and all this from an imagination that it would be glorious to have the eyes of people gazing up at him, and mighty happy to eat, and drink, and sleep, at the top of the highest trees in the kingdom. Would you not readily own, that such an one was only disquieted by his own folly?

If you ask, what it signifies to suppose such silly creatures as these, as are no where to be found in human life?

It may be answered, that wherever you see an ambitious man, there you see this vain and senseless flyer.

Again; if you should see a man that had a large pond of water, yet living in continual thirst, not suffering himself to drink half a draught, for fear of lessening his pond; if you should see him wasting his time and strength in fetching more water to his pond, always thirsty, yet always carrying a bucket of water in his hand, watching early and late to catch the drops of rain, gaping after every cloud, and running greedily into every mire and mud, in hopes of water, and always studying how to make every ditch empty itself into his pond. If you should see him grow grey and old in these anxious labors, and at last end a careful thirsty life, by falling into his own pond, would you not say that such an one was not only the author of all his own disquiets, but was foolish enough to be reckoned amongst idiots and madmen? but yet foolish and absurd as this character is, it does not represent half the follies and absurd disquiets of the covetous man.

I could now easily proceed to show the same effects of all our other passions; and make it plainly appear, that all our miseries, vexations, and complaints, are entirely of our own making, and that in the same absurd manner, as in these instances of the covetous and ambitious man. Look where you will, you will see all worldly vexations, but like the vexation of him, that was always in mire and mud in search of water to drink, when he had more at home than was sufficient for an hundred horses.

ADVANCEMENT SOCIETY OF PENNSYLVANIA.

Having given an abstract of the thirty-seventh Annual Report, in a notice of the anniversary meeting of this Society, we did not refer to the Report upon its publication. We do not think that we can notice it more effectively than by republishing the following article from THE GOSPEL MESSENGER, of Western New York.

We omit the names of the several Churches, because our object in the republication of the article is, not to injure the feeling of any, but if possible to direct attention to a most important practical subject. We challenge any one to show a single reason why this Society, in the administration of its responsible trust, is not entitled to the confidence of the whole diocese. If it can be proved unworthy of confidence, then let proper support be withdrawn from it. But as it now is, a Diocesan Institution recognized as an organ by the Convention, and commended by the Bishop, and applying its funds without partiality to their legitimate object, we see not cause for any distrust.

In publishing the following article, the Editor of the Banner, shows a willingness to share its censures.

Circumstances, which shall never be allowed to have the same effect again, prevented this usual collection, during the past year, in the Church of which he is Rector. It is his determination to try and make up the deficiency during the present year.

We do not assent to the implication in the following article, that one department of Missions interferes with another. The Church is solemnly bound to discharge her duty to all, and her members can do it, if they will. That this principle is true practically, is shown by the fact stated below, that those Churches which have done most for Diocesan Missions, have done most also for Domestic and Foreign. The heart which is shut against one evident claim of charity, is apt to be shut against all. We are "to do good unto all men," and "especially unto them that are of the household of faith."

CURIOUS FACTS—MISSIONS.

MR. EDITOR:—A friend has sent me the thirty-seventh Annual Report of the Trustees of the Society for the Advancement of Christianity in Pennsylvania, an examination of which has filled me with some surprise. This Society was instituted under Bishop White, is a voluntary Society containing the following article in its Constitution:

Art. IX. "This Society being intended to assist, but not in any degree interfere with, or entrench upon the established authority of the Church, in promoting her interest and advancement in Pennsylvania, it is hereby declared that in whatever shall be done, that authority shall be recognized and conformed to."

Bishop Potter is the President of the Society. It is the great source of Missionary support to the feeble Churches in the Diocese of Pennsylvania. It has employed the past year twenty-one Missionaries, "They officiate in about twenty-five organized congregations, embracing nearly 700 families, and at 17 other places, in some of which there is encouraging prospect that Parishes will be formed. They have officiated 1700 times on Sundays and 450 times on week days. They have baptised 27 adults, and 248 infants; 97 persons have been confirmed under their ministry, and 124 added to the Communion; the whole number of their communicants is upwards of 800—and the Lord's Supper has been administered about 150 times."

The Education department of the Society, extends aid to four candidates for Orders.

In its appeal for aid the Report states that—

"Many of our interior counties (of Pennsylvania) are entirely without the ministrations of the Church, and a great work rises up before us on every side even as we cross our threshold."

In Bishop Potter's Address to the Convention, he states—

"I desire to record again my grateful sense of the important aid which is rendered to the Church in this Diocese by the Society for the Advancement of Christianity in Pennsylvania."

"We have to plant our Church in twenty-five counties of Pennsylvania, where as yet it has neither Minister, nor sacred edifice."

"Not much more than half, certainly not so many as two-thirds of the congregations in this Diocese are self-supporting. Of the remainder many are feeble."

The whole expense of the Society as charged upon its receipts is $111,28.

Now the points which have struck me with surprise are the following—

1. The small amount of its receipts from Churches, viz., $2,619. The Churches in Pennsylvania gave as reported last year, in the Spirit of Missions, to Domestic and Foreign Missions, $6,712.

2. The small number of contributing Churches to the Society, twenty-three. The whole number in the Diocese is one hundred and twenty-eight.

3. The small number of city Churches (in Philadelphia) which contributed to this Society, only seven. The whole number reported as existing in the city and suburbs, is twenty-seven.

4. That of the whole amount of income from Churches in the Diocese, which is $2,619. Seven city Churches contributed $1,858. And none of the other twenty city Churches, has contributed a single dollar.

5. That of the amount received from the Churches out of Philadelphia, viz.; $761, the sum of $534 came from Trinity Church, Pittsburgh, $50 from St. James' Church, Lancaster, leaving $177 contributed by fourteen country Churches, which is about $13 each.

6. That the seven city Churches above named, which contributed $1858 to the Diocesan Society contributed also about $1,200 to Domestic and Foreign Missions, while the 20 city Churches which contributed nothing to the Diocesan Society, contributed but $1643, to Domestic and Foreign Missions.

The conclusions which I have reached from considering the above facts are—

I. That our Diocesan system of monthly collections in western New York, thoroughly sustained, is the cheapest and best system. It cost $15 last year.

II. That if the Clergy cease to advocate and sustain Diocesan Missions, our Dioceses cannot grow in strength and numbers.

III. That the demand for Diocesan Missionary enterprise, even in our largest Dioceses, is very pressing.

IV. That the feeble Churches in our larger Dioceses, must look for support mainly to those Clergy and Churches who feel an interest in Diocesan Missions.

V. That the warm supporters of Domestic and Foreign Missions as of primary importance, do not evince an adequate, or even a proportionate interest in Diocesan Missions which are laboring to sustain the feeble and struggling brethren of their own immediate household.

VI. That the claims and interests of Diocesan Missions throughout our country demand more zeal, more prayer, and more liberality from us all.

EDITORIAL CHANGE.—The Rev. Dr. SEABURY, who has for so many years, and with such ability and faithfulness, edited the NEW YORK CHURCHMAN, it will be seen from the following valedictory, has resigned this office. We have received this information with deep regret.

Under Dr. Seabury's able management, the New York Churchman has taken a high position as a Church Journal, and even if it could not obtain the approbation of all, it has secured general respect.

Few men have, in our day, brought to the editorial office greater talents, learning, and zeal. Honest, fearless, and devoted to the maintenance of fixed principles, the editorial course of Dr. Seabury, has been a direct one. Whatever judgment may have been formed of the views advocated, all must accord to the late Editor of the Churchman the credit due to a firm, decided, and unwavering supporter of the opinions which he considered to be true.

It must be remembered that Dr. Seabury's Editorship has passed through trying times. And the position of the Churchman has not allowed the Editor, even if his decided views had permitted, to pursue a neutral course.

For one, we honor and respect him for his manliness, we thank him for the instruction we have derived from his teachings, and for the good he has done to the cause of truth by his labors. We hope in the discharge of the high and holy duties, to which his whole powers are now to be devoted he may enjoy that peace which is seldom an Editor's lot. Fifteen long years of such weary labor deserve a period of rest; and we are happy that our brother Editor passes from his more trying sphere, to so goodly a parish, of which he may truly say "the lines are fallen to me in pleasant places."

We are informed that the Rev. Wm. Walton has consented to take the post vacated by Dr. Seabury. We are confident that, under his editorial control, the New York Churchman will maintain its position as one of the ablest Journals of the Church.

The present number of the Churchman terminates its connection with its present editor.

For some time past, as must have been apparent to the readers of the paper, the editor has been unable to devote that attention to it which he formerly gave it, and which its interests require. The cause of this change in the editorial department, and the immediate occasion of the editor's entire withdrawal at the present time, may be inferred from the following extract from the minutes of the Vestry of the Church of the Annunciation.

"At a meeting held at the house of the Rector on Monday evening, February 5th, 1849, it was, on motion of R. D. Weeks, Esq., unanimously.

"Resolved, That, while this Vestry fully appreciate the zeal and ability of the Rector of this Parish in the able discharge of his duties as Editor of the Churchman, and bear testimony to the highly acceptable manner in which he has advanced and sustained the interests of the Church during his connection with that paper; yet they are constrained to believe that, in view of the increased and increasing demands upon his time as Rector of his Parish, a due regard to his own health and the prosperity of this Parish require a relinquishment of his Editorial duties."

Resolved, That the Rector be respectfully requested to take the matter into consideration; and if he should deem it consistent with his duty to the Church to devote his undivided services to this Parish, it will be highly gratifying to the Vestry, and, as they believe, most acceptable to his Parishioners."

With the duties of a growing parish absorbing more and more of his time and attention, and with no exciting question or important measure, for the result of which his columns are pledged, now pending in the Church, the editor has felt entirely at liberty to gratify a wish which he has long cherished, and which the Vestry of his parish have kindly anticipated. He therefore relinquishes the editorial charge of the Churchman in favor of one who can devote to it more care than it is in his power to bestow, and who will infuse into it that zest and freshness which can hardly be expected, even under the most favorable circumstances, from one who has spent years in its service.

In retiring from his post, the editor desires to embrace the occasion to renew the avowal of his deep and abiding conviction of the truth and essential importance of the principles which the Churchman was established to promote, and which he has laboured, however imperfectly, to uphold and diffuse.

In the application of these principles to the many new and eventful questions, both of a speculative and practical nature, which have arisen during the term of his editorship, the editor has been always left to his own independent judgment; in the exercise of which he is not conscious of having been biassed by any sinister or indirect considerations. On all these questions the course which he has adopted and pursued still approves itself entirely to his settled and deliberate judgment; although in the manner of maintaining it he is painfully conscious that that there has been great room for improvement.

The support on these occasions, and in general throughout his editorial trials, which he has received from the friends both among the clergy and laity—of the principles with which the Churchman is identified, merits and receives his warm and lasting gratitude. In a sense of the approbation of those who understand and love the Church, as the divinely appointed means of propagating the truth and holiness of the Gospel, and who desire to uphold her testimony in opposition to the errors of Rome on the one hand, and the more fearful and destructive errors of radicalism and infidelity on the other, and in their generous and spontaneous expressions of sympathy and support, he has found, next to the approval of his own conscience, the richest solace of his labours.

To the correspondents of the journal (among whom are names both lay and clerical which would do honor to any journal) he tenders his most grateful acknowledgements. Their contributions have been, to a degree perhaps unprecedented in a weekly journal, not less a source of gratification to the readers, than of relief to the editor, and of honest pride and satisfaction to all who are concerned in the prosperity and reputation of the Churchman. In this acknowledgment the poetical contributors, especially of past years, are by no means forgotten.

To the Bishop of the Diocese in particular, for his uniformly kind treatment and indulgent forbearance, he owes a debt of gratitude which no words can express, and the remembrance of which, while memory lasts, no events can efface from his heart. He has always found him, a firm and sympathizing friend and a wise counsellor: and as the lapse of years has given him a higher and juster appreciation of the relations in which he stood to his Bishop, so has it made the discharge of those relations more of a pleasure than a duty, by continually revealing such qualities of head and heart as have increased his love and reverence for the man. More than this he could not say to his Bishop in prosperity, less than this he will not say to him in his hour of adversity.

To the many who have differed from him in opinion and who have, either orally or in print, condemned his editorial conduct of the paper, the editor also owes a certain debt of gratitude which he desires to discharge. Their censures have been always pointed either at real or imaginary faults; on the former supposition, they have excited him to search for, with a view to amend, whatever might be amiss in his temper or his pen; on the latter, they have prompted him (and in this way have proved to him a real benefit) to shun the appearance of evil by adapting his style more to the tastes and capacities of those who found in it occasions of offence. In either view his censors are entitled to his thanks; and he hopes that the beneficial account to which he has endeavoured to turn their animadversions will be accepted as a sufficient requital of them.

To the gentleman who is to succeed him in his editorial labors the editor also desires to direct the attention of the patrons and subscribers of the Churchman. They will find him an accomplished writer, a ripe scholar, and a sound divine; and in continuing to him the support and patronage which they have extended to the present editor, they may rest assured that their confidence will not be misplaced.

In charity, as he trusts, with all his readers, and in the fervent prayer that they and all Christians may be so joined together in the unity of the Spirit and the bond of peace, as with one heart to desire the prosperity of the Holy Apostolic Church, and with one mouth to profess the faith once delivered to the Saints, the Editor bids them most respectfully and affectionately—FAREWELL.

CALIFORNIA: a Sermon preached in St. John's Church, Brooklyn, N. Y., on Sunday, February 11, 1849. By Samuel Roosevelt Johnson, D. D., Rector.

An extract from this excellent sermon will be found in our columns. Dr. Johnson is eminently qualified, from his long service in a new country, to give counsel on the subject of this sermon, and his precepts are such as we might expect from his practice.

THE PRINCIPLE OF SUCCESSION IN THE MINISTRY, requiring that he who ordains should himself have been ordained, not consistently held, unless the unbroken chain reach to the first ordination by the Great Head of the Church. A Sermon, at an Ordination to the Diaconate, by the Bishop of Tennessee; in St. John's Church, Knoxville, 23d July, 1848. Preached by Rev. Jno. Wheat, D. D., and published by request.—"Prove all things; hold fast that which is good."—1 Thess. v. 21.

This sermon fully and clearly develops its important theme. The discussion of such questions is of great use in regions where the claims of the Church are little known. Dr. Wheat, it seems to us, makes out a plain case, and states it in so forcible a manner that his Discourse must impress every unprejudiced mind.

We have received several Sermons and Publications, the notice of which must be deferred.

MR. NEWMAN AND HIS COMPANIONS.—A correspondent of the Oxford Herald says: "Having mentioned Mr. Newman's name, let me inform you of another rupture which rumour ascribes to his influence, in conjunction with that of some of his brother 'perverts.' They have not, it seems, quite disavowed the efficacy of the English Church. They still maintain that there is virtue in her sacraments—that her baptism is a means of spiritual regeneration, and her communion a vehicle of saving grace. They not only profess, but preach this, it appears; and for so grave an offence in the eyes of Rome, it is said that their spiritual superiors have interdicted them from preaching at all, until they recant so fearful a heresy. Be this as it may, there is no doubt that these Anglican 'perverts' are likely to give the Romish hierarchy, if not that Church generally, a great deal of trouble; and as they are still restless spirits, it is not at all improbable that they may yet revolt from Popery, and return again, as others have done, to the bosom of the Church they have deserted and scandalized!

Foreign Intelligence.

The English Churchman of Feb. 8th has devoted a whole page to "the Floating Church of the Redeemer." In the first place they have taken the pains to copy the engraving of the Church in beautiful style. A full description of the Church is appended, with the account of the ceremonies attending the excursion to bring down the church, the Bishop's appropriate lines, &c. and added to this the notice of the consecration. The account which the English Churchman attributes to its namesake the N. Y. Churchman was copied, and duly credited by that paper, from the Banner.

We do not wonder that this noble enterprise has secured such marked attention in England. It is strange that we should be permitted to set an example in this respect to a nation by whom those stirring lines are appropriated.

Britannia needs no bulwark,
No towers along the steep,
Her march is o'er the mountain waves,
Her home is on the deep.

Yet this is the manly acknowledgment of "The English Churchman."

"Our brethren of the Church in the United States have lately set us an example, which we sincerely hope will be followed in many of our large sea-ports. They have not been content with 'fitting up' some old, condemned, and unserviceable vessel, and calling it a 'Floating Church,'—with few or no visible signs and tokens of its holy purpose, to invite and impress the sailors and boatmen of the port; but they have built, for the express purpose, an actual Church, with tower and spire, and have solemnly set it apart, and dedicated it to the public worship of God, as a Sanctuary, wherein 'they that go down to the sea in ships, and occupy their business in great waters,' may 'praise the Lord for His goodness,' and be 'glad because they are at rest,' and in 'the haven where they would be.'"

And this kind notice concludes with the following friendly words:—

"Most heartily do we congratulate our transatlantic brethren on the completion and consecration of this 'blessed bark,' by which they have hallowed, in an especial manner, the waters, as their numerous Churches on terra firma have hallowed the land of their country. We repeat our earnest hope that their good example may excite a spirit of holy rivalry in this country. God grant that, for the future, the only contest between the two countries may be confined to the two Churches, and that with them the only struggle may be, which shall—on land and on water—raise most Temples to His service—which shall most honour His holy Name, His Word, and His Sacraments—which shall most worthily 'praise the Lord for His goodness, and declare the wonders that He doeth for the children of men.'"

ROME.

JAN. 27.—The Capitol and its approaches are while I write being decked out with Oriental splendour, for the purpose of the proclaiming of the twelve Deputies of Rome this evening. For four days the scrutineers have been at work examining the 250,000 names returned (each voter having inscribed twelve candidates on his ticket), and to-night we shall know the result. At Viterbo, Bonaparte Canino has been returned by 4,500 votes; at Trosinone, Sterbini, elected by 3,000 suffrages; at Spoleto, the War-Minister, Cambello, by 6,677 votes. The number of voters at Bologna is calculated over 19,000; at Foligno, 5,000; at Macerata, 4,000; Terni, 3,040; Perugia, 8,400; even at Albana, 950 came to the poll. Comparing the relative populations, France did not speak out more emphatically on a late occasion.

There is a decree out this morning, signed by the Ministry and by Prince Corsini, as head of the Roman town council, laying a treble land tax on every acre of the Campagna which the owner chooses not to cultivate.

On the 5th of February the Constituent Assembly is sure to meet in full force, and until then the fate of the Pope's future position in these territories cannot be positively known. But even with foreign intervention it is totally impossible to reinstate him as absolute autocrat here, and his political status must necessarily undergo a very radical modification. He will not probably be quite shorn of temporal influence in worldly matters, for even now the State pays him 50,000 dollars a month (civil list), which he will continue more or less to enjoy as the revenue of his archbishopric.—Express.

To which the English Churchman adds the following:—

"At Rome the face of our BLESSED SAVIOUR on the veil or handkerchief of St. VERONICA is said to have shone for three days with the greatest brilliancy. This has been magnified into a great miracle. When will Romanists be wise enough to abandon 'pious frauds,' which can only serve the cause of infidelity?"

INDIA.—At the first native confirmation held in the cathedral of Calcutta, eighty-five males and seventy-five females, from Baripur, Thakapukur, Ramnagar, Mirzapur, and Agarpura were confirmed. The Bishop delivered an address on the occasion, which was translated into Bengali by the Rev. T. Sandys.

"If the governor of Samaria had crucified Simon Magus for receiving Christian Baptism, he had no more died a martyr, than he lived a saint. For dying is not enough, and dying in a good cause is not enough, but then only we receive the crown of martyrdom, when our death is the seal of our life, and our life is a continual testimony of our duty, and both give testimony to the excellencies of religion, and glorify the grace of God."—Bishop Taylor.

Communications.

For the Banner of the Cross.

REV. AND DEAR SIR:—

I ask the favor of a small space in your paper—certainly less than "two columns," for I respect editorial as well as all other law—to reply to your correspondent M. H. in the Banner of the 17th inst. I thank you for reminding him, and your readers, that I "proposed merely an abstract case." As an abstract case I shall continue to treat it; for my object is to elicit the truth and the right, in a matter of general concern to every diocese alike. The canon of the Diocese of New York quoted by your correspondent, it seems to me, has nothing to do with the case, nor the canon of any other diocese, unless it can be shown that diocesan canons are of paramount authority to the canons of the General Convention, the recognized supreme law of the Church under our Federative Ecclesiastical organization. I have some doubts, however, whether the framers of that canon in 1841, or the amenders thereof for the purpose of meeting the anomalous condition of that diocese, in 1845, contemplated any such "discipline" as that in question. But admitting they did, and admitting further, that they had expressly mentioned the peculiar duties of "the Ordinary" as constituting a part of "the discipline" spoken of, would this give the Standing Committee the right to perform such duties in the absence of any enumeration thereof among the "purposes" for which the canon of the General Convention "declares" the Standing Committee, under certain circumstances, to be "the Ecclesiastical authority"? and much less in the face of the general canon, which defining "the Ordinary" to be the Bishop, virtually and effectually, as I have inferred, inhibits any other than a Bishop from performing such duties? I will not occupy space at the risk of violating law, in designating the several general canons which "declare the purposes" for which a Standing Committee is "the Ecclesiastical authority." The canons are accessible to your readers. Suffice it to say, that not one of these canons "declare" expressly or impliedly, the duties of "the Ordinary" to be among those "purposes." The inference I draw from this entire silence of the canons, in connection with the express and significant definition of Canon XLII., "the Ordinary, that is, the Bishop," is, that all others who may exercise ecclesiastical authority in a diocese, except the Bishop or a Bishop, are excluded from acting as "the Ordinary" under any circumstances, and that such was the design of the framers of that canon. The comment of your correspondent on the phrase "the Bishop," and his argument founded thereupon, appears to me entirely inconclusive. It is an attempt to get rid of a difficulty which he feels, which after all he does not get rid of, but rather increases. If the term, "the Ordinary," is "a phrase new to the canons"—and I rather think it is as old, if not older, or rather prior to, the phrase "Ecclesiastical authority"—I do not perceive how that affects the matter at issue. Nor do I perceive that its introduction "parenthetically" to describe a person known as the Ordinary" helps the matter in any way favorable to the inference he would seem to draw. "Parenthetically" or not, the definition is a definition restrained by his own showing to one person and that person the Bishop, and does not apply to persons, be the same more or less, such as a Standing Committee. And as to his assumption—for it remains to be proved—that the phrase "the Bishop" means "the Bishop when there is one," as well might he argue, that the canonical provision, founded on our distinctive principle touching the Episcopal office, in relation to the pronouncing of sentence of suspension or degradation on a clergyman, restraining that duty to the Bishop, means only "when there is a Bishop"; and when there is not, that duty—somewhat akin to confirming a repulsion from the communion—devolves on the Standing Committee. The "result" which he describes, and alleges will "demonstrate the fallacy" of my argument, is by no means necessary. It may be avoided by the course suggested in my former communication, that of devolving the "discipline" in question, which according to our principles, naturally, as well as canonically, pertains to the Episcopal office, on the Provisional Bishop, or on the Bishop performing Episcopal services in the diocese for the time being, on the invitation of the Standing Committee. That would fully, as well as canonically, meet the difficulty.

Your correspondent has not adverted to one of my interrogatories, which bears on the principle of the discipline in question. I repeat it, therefore, with an addition. The lay members of a Standing Committee are not necessarily communicants themselves. The canons enjoin no such qualification for the office. They usually are, but they may not be, and in some dioceses have not been. Are laymen who may, or may not, be communicants, authorized to, and is it right and proper they should, act and decide in a case, involving the privation of a spiritual privilege, conferred originally and according to our principles, necessarily, by a spiritual person—spiritual in the official sense—and continue the privation of, or restore this purely spiritual privilege; a privilege, which if they are not communicants themselves, they show by that very circumstance, they undervalue, or are indifferent to, or willfully refuse or neglect?

"God hath set the world in their heart." ECCLES. III. 11.

MR. EDITOR:

Allow me to submit to your inspection and better judgment the following almost impromptu remarks on this passage.

On reading such a declaration of the wise king, we are nearly tempted to ask, whether he was not more of a worldly philosopher than expert in gracious principles and the gracious mind. That the "world," in its bad sense, is in the "hearts" of men, is beyond contradiction: the young themselves begin early to know the degrading fact, and old age finds no reason to question or to qualify it. But that the Creator "put" the evil world there, that He poured this overwhelming flood of worldliness into the hearts of the "sons of men," is but the sneering allegation of the infidel, or the presumptuous wisdom of the fatalist. And as Solomon ranks not with these, we instantly take for granted that he employed the expression "world," in a wholly different

Rev. G. Upfold

sense: of which assumption there is final proof, conclusive with the believer in the holy volume,—“God cannot be tempted with evil, neither tempteth He any man,”—and He who commanded, “love not the world, neither the things that are in the world,” never can have “set the (morally bad or dangerous) world in the heart” of His creatures.

Hence we are sure that “world” has here a good meaning. The original word, having the significations, eternity, age, world, is translated “eternity” by Michaelis, “set eternity in their hearts,” which ought to imply the proper “world to come:” that however is not in men’s hearts, but only a vague hope of immortality,—no natural heart longs for an immortality of purity and love, for these must be gained here to be desired hereafter. “Eternity,” then, in this text, would sound largely yet mean little. Possibly for that reason, i. e. because such is here the true sense, the Hebrew word is, in the Greek, rendered “age,” i. e. the “world,” or the creatures and affairs, of one of the grand periods of the vast duration in which occur all the presumed creative acts of God, all the expanded periods of created existence, each a “world” in itself, from the unfathomable commencement of all things, to their unfathomable termination. These “ages” are the “worlds” named in Scripture, and likewise in the Nicene Creed, the (unnumbered, we may say,) formations of successive orderly masses, for purposes inscrutable by us, out of the materials which God originally brought out of nothing. Also, the “worlds” may be the countless habitable orbs now existing, the sun and planets of our system, and the exceeding many suns and planets of the teeming starry system. The former view, that of a succession of “worlds,” was dwelt upon by the old sages, and may still be discerned in geological speculations: in the latter, of a million of now co-existent “worlds,” or in the two notions combined, moderns largely repose their preference. The phraseology contains, in general terms, a vast and almost unimaginable truth: we may justly question whether philosophy, ancient or new, has penetrated far or serviceably into its august particulars.

Practically then, of all these “worlds,” successive or co-existent, man knows nothing available, and surmises little, except of the one “world” to which he belongs. To this earth he is limited; here are all his interests, all his hopes, all his feelings, except as they extend beyond this whole universal system called the “worlds,” to that ulterior “world” of infinity and eternity which will be his portion hereafter, “the world to come.” To the “worlds” he bears no known relation, but only to this one “world,” the scene of his present life, and of his probation for the future everlasting existence,—and called therefore, as pre-eminently so to him, “THE WORLD.”

And here, I think, we find the explanation of the passage before us, “He hath set the world in their heart.” The Almighty hath given us all needful understanding of this “world” and its affairs, all wholesome affection for it, whether for its fitness, its ties, or its material loveliness; which understanding and affection are among the deep motives for the love of life, the strongest instinct of our nature. In this sense, and in its utmost comprehension, “God hath set the world in our heart;” like takes to like, as is the due result of His creating all things “very good.” That men have made the world bad, and set their own hearts upon its bad uses and enjoyments, is no objection to this view of the passage; for there is nothing beneficial conferred on man that he does not pervert, even to the last and most diabolical extreme of corruption,—just as he continually perverts himself, for “God hath made man upright, but they have sought out the many inventions” of depravity.

With this key the verse may be readily expounded. “He hath made every thing beautiful in his time,”—all creation, all the “worlds” in their order and place, and all they contain that comes from Him; the declaration being parallel with that in Genesis, “God saw every thing that He had made, and, behold, it was very good.” “Also, He hath set the world,” this earth, “in their heart,” in the heart of “the sons of men,”—this “world” only, as the only one they are concerned with, the only one with which they have any effectual acquaintance, as their safe, and honourable, and graceful home, if safely, and honourably, and gracefully used. And men have but one home, never two at the same time. “So that,” for want of this ‘setting in the heart,’ this knowledge and endearment, for want of domiciliation, “no man can find out” the other worlds, “the work that God maketh from the beginning to the end,”—from the awful distance of past “ages” and their past creations, to the awful distance of “ages” yet to be evolved and creations yet to appear.

Philadelphia, Feb. 22, 1849.

P. S. From the few Commentaries within my reach, I extract the two following interpretations. The first is from Lord Bacon, and is characteristic; see Bishop Hobart’s (D’Oyly and Mant’s) Bible. “God has framed the mind of man as a mirror, capable of the image of the whole world, not only delighted in beholding the variety of things and the changes of times, but ambitious to find out and discover the immovable and settled laws and decrees of nature.” The other is loftier and better; it is quoted by M. Henry from Pemble. “God hath not left Himself without witness of His righteous, equal, and beautiful ordering of things, but hath set it forth to be observed in the book of the world, and this He hath set in men’s hearts. . . so that if men did but give themselves to the exact observation of things, they might in most of them perceive an admirable order and contrivance,” meaning, divine wisdom and divine superintendence.

The explanation I have submitted has a broader basis, and appears to suit and satisfy more completely the entire passage.

“He that suffers in a good cause, let him be sure to walk worthy of that honor to which God hath called him;—let him first deny his sins, and then deny himself, and then he may take up his cross and follow Christ;—ever remembering, that no man pleases God in his death, who hath lived perversely in his life.”—Bishop Taylor.

THE CALIFORNIA MISSION.

REV. AND DEAR SIR:

It seems very strange to me that the Domestic Board of Missions should wish to extend their liabilities farther, when they have not wherewith to meet the present demands. There is hardly a missionary now under the appointment of that Board who is not suffering, some I might say starving, from the unavoidable failure of their salaries. These pioneers of the church go to the wilds of our inland country to spread the faith once delivered to the saints, on the assurance they will be supported by a regular annual stipend. This annual sum, in many cases, by far too small, is very seldom, if ever paid when it should be, and thus the faithful missionaries are in a measure left to themselves. Yet in the face of all this—can it be credited?—it has been resolved to establish six other missionaries, as well as a fund for the endowment of a Bishopric, (for which the contributions of the charitable are solicited and implicitly relied on,) for another part of our widely extended continent; a part which I am ready to acknowledge with the most enthusiastic on the subject, is perhaps of more importance than any other station. But, sir, when we are told to preach the gospel to every one, we are not allowed to go in debt, which we are certainly doing now. Most gladly would I see a missionary diocese on our Pacific coast, with a Bishop at its head, established on a permanent footing, but I do not think it right—nor can any one, who gives it reflection—when we are so far in arrears to our present labourers, to increase our indebtedness. It is urged on the importance of the object; true, none more so; but when we have repeated appeals from our Church Society to sustain it in its operations, how can it be expected that we can both relieve it from its present condition, and at the same time increase the necessity for these appeals. It appears to me that the Missionary Society has retrograded instead of progressing in its great charge; instead of recovering itself from its difficulties it sinks deeper into the mire.

How is it? this is the question: but so it is, and we have an example immediately before us. Is it right for the church thus to be crippling its best efforts, doing what is done imperfectly, and leaving no impression in proportion to the exertions used? Apart from the intrinsic wrong of the matter, in what light do we appear to the sects surrounding us, who are ever seeking occasion against us? There is a great fault somewhere, and the only way to cast it off, is for the Society to keep as it now is, not extending itself in any place as long as the claims upon it are too heavy to bear.

The money for the California Mission, it is said can, all be raised by a simultaneous appeal all over the country, but it is a sum which cannot be easily raised, and in the end the Mission will be left for the poor—I say poor, for it is poor—Society to pay. It might be said that California will be able to support its own clergy, but is it not a proverb, that mining countries are always the poorest? The only way for us now to do, Mr. Editor, is to turn our undivided support to the present operations; let an universal interest be raised all over the land, let that spirit be roused which seems to sleep the longest in churchmen, and we will then be able to settle the demands of the past and the present; and if there is more than enough, then let that go to this mission; but not one cent should it have until our reproach be cast off. There would then be no doubts or fears, but all confidence and hope; we would then go forth boldly in our work, turning neither to the right nor to the left, neither looking behind.

However, if the California Mission is to be carried out, there is but the one way to do it, and that is through the church as a body, and not by individual efforts.

Respectfully yours,
M. H. T.

“BEFORE THE ALTAR.”

MR. EDITOR:

In looking over the two Liturgies of Edward VI. a few days since, I met with a Rubric which is so conclusive of the interpretation which I so lately advocated of the above phrase, that I trust your readers will not find fault with me for sending, or with you for inserting it. The Rubric occurs in “The Form of the Solemnization of Matrimony,” and is the same in both Liturgies, and also in the Office as it now stands in the English Prayer Book, saving that the word “table” was substituted in the second, for “altar.”

“The Psalm ended, and the man and woman kneeling afore the altar, the Priest standing at the altar, and turning his face toward them, shall say.”

I doubt not your readers will agree with me in taking it for granted that “the man and woman” were not intended to go round to the east side of the altar, and consequently that “afore” means not the east side, but in all probability, the west.

“Do not trouble yourself by thinking how much you are afflicted, but consider how much you make of it. For reflex acts upon the suffering itself can lead to nothing but to pride, or to impatience, to temptation or apostasy. He that measures the grains and scruples of his persecution, will soon sit down and call for ease, or for a reward,—will be apt to complain of his condition, or set a greater value upon his person. Look not back upon him that strikes thee, but upward to God that supports thee, and forward to the crown that is set before thee. Then consider if the loss of thy estate hath taught thee to despise the world:—whether thy poor fortune hath made thee poor in spirit; and if thy uneasy prison sets thy soul at liberty, and knocks off the fetters of a worse captivity.”—Bishop Taylor.

“The state of the Gospel is a state of sufferings, not of temporal prosperities. Christ was the Captain of our sufferings.”—Bishop Taylor.

THE POWER OF CHRISTIANITY EXEMPLIFIED BY ITS EFFECT UPON DISTINGUISHED MINDS.

HALLER.

He was one of the most voluminous writers, and universally informed men in Europe; and his profound erudition is apparent to all who are the least conversant with his works.

He preserved his senses and composure to the last moment, meeting death with the calmness of a philosopher, and what is transcendently superior, with the lively faith of a Christian.

REV. RICHARD CECIL.

Mr. Cecil became an early convert to licentiousness, notwithstanding the best parental example and instruction; and to excuse his wickedness he took shelter behind infidelity. But no sooner had he begun to feel the littleness and unsatisfying nature of worldly pleasures, than his prejudices declined, and he not only became a proselyte to the faith of the cross, but one of its most devoted and intrepid advocates. He said, “When I was sunk in the depths of infidelity, I was afraid to read any author who treated Christianity in a dispassionate, wise, and searching manner. He made me uneasy. Conscience would gather strength.” Having gone all the rounds of a licentious life, and tasted every pleasure which the world can afford, he found that they could not confer anticipated happiness, and he thus began to feel the meanness and degrading nature of every object, which engages the attention of vicious men. He said, “I was one who, carried away first by the love of sin, hoped the Bible might not be true. I then listened to such as were hardened enough to assert that it was not true, till at length I believed my own lie; and the vanity of appearing something like a philosopher, who had thrown off the traditions of the nursery, set me on propagating that lie.” A heavenly light broke in upon that mind which was darkened by the clouds of error, and Mr. Cecil, from an enemy and disbeliever, became a sincere convert to the truth, and a zealous preacher of that gospel he once endeavoured to destroy. His heart and views underwent a total revolution, and he now became as remarkable for his pious and sober deportment, as he had formerly been for his profligacy and licentiousness. His learning was solid and extensive, and there were no important points in morals or religion, on which he had not read the best authors; nor could any topic be started in history or philosophy, on subjects of art or science, with which he was not generally conversant. With the works of our elder divines he was familiar, and he was in the daily habit of reading the Scriptures in the original.

The celebrated Earl of Rochester lived a heinous sinner, but died a most exemplary penitent, and left this as his dying message to those whom he had drawn into sin by his example and encouragement:—

“From the bottom of my soul, I detest and abhor the whole course of my former wicked life; that I think I can never sufficiently admire the goodness of God, who has given me a true sense of my pernicious opinions and vile practices, by which I have hitherto lived without hope and without God in the world; have been an open enemy to Jesus Christ, doing the utmost despite to the Holy Spirit of grace. And that the greatest testimony of my charity to such is, to warn them, in the name of God, and as they regard the welfare of their immortal souls, no more to deny his being or his Providence, or despise his goodness; no more to make a mock of sin, or condemn the pure and excellent religion of my ever blessed Redeemer, through whose merits alone I, one of the greatest of sinners, do yet hope for mercy and forgiveness.”

LORD LYTTLETON.

The character of Lord Lyttleton stood deservedly high, both on account of his public conduct and the fame of his literary productions. In early life his companions, although they did not succeed in making him a confirmed infidel, sapped the foundation of his faith and impressed his mind with scruples and objections that remained with him for years. But amidst all his scruples he kept himself open to conviction. A conversation with his friend West, produced that happy resolution which set him to study and investigate the scriptures, whether or not they contained the words of eternal life. He conversed with learned and religious friends on the subject. He examined with attention, the evidences and doctrines of Christianity; and his researches being honest, ended in conviction.

REV. JOHN NEWTON.

We have in the life of the Rev. John Newton, who acted such a conspicuous part as a member of the Church for forty years, a deplorable example of early depravity, and of inveterate moral corruption. His excellent mother had taken particular care, both by example and instruction, to season his mind with virtuous principles, and impress it with a veneration for every thing sacred. But his corrupt propensities had at a very early age, gathered sufficient strength to break through these wholesome restraints, and to obliterate from his memory every trace of piety or parental admonition. His infidelity originated chiefly in the depravity of his own heart, and with but little assistance from the arguments or example of others; while his conversion appears to have been effected, partly from his own reflections on the many remarkable deliverances he had experienced in the course of his voyages, and partly from occasional examination of the scriptures, and the peculiar discoveries that by degrees broke in upon his mind, both of his own guilt and the remedy for its expiation. The truths which had proved instrumental in working out his recovery he laboured throughout his ministry to inculcate and establish.

JOHN BUNYAN, from being the most wicked of his profligate companions, was transformed, through a knowledge of the gospel, into one of its most distinguished preachers. As an useful and entertaining writer few will stand pre-eminent to him, and it may be questioned, whether any in modern times, have diffused more widely so important instruction in so pleasing a form (as the Pilgrim’s Progress,) or contributed more to promote and recommend religion to the world.

M. DE LA HARPE.

This elegant and voluminous writer, was one of the fraternity of literary infidels who flourished at the time of the French Revolution. The disciple and eulogist of Voltaire, he had early imbibed the tenets of that blasphemous school; and was long one of the most distinguished members in the brilliant and fashionable circles of atheistical philosophy. He became not only a believer in the truth of the gospel, but one of its most courageous assertors, maintaining its principles in the face of persecution, imprisonment and exile. During that dismal reign of philosophy and reason, which confounded the distinctions of moral and social order, and overspread the face of revelation with a total eclipse, leaving atheism and anarchy to perform on a darkened theatre, their fearful and bloody tragedy, La Harpe had the misfortune to be marked out as one of the victims of revolutionary fury. It was in the dungeons of the Luxembourg, that the light of truth paid him an unsought and unexpected visit; that those scriptures which he had taken up, merely with the view of finding some amusement for his imagination, in the sublime beauties of their poetry, first opened his eyes to the folly and the danger of his infidel principles. The sincerity of these impressions he afterwards evinced in the most open and undaunted manner; not only defending Christianity with his pen, but like Paul on the hill of Mars, boldly proclaiming it in the midst of death, from the public tribunals of the capital; and warning his deluded countrymen no longer to pay their superstitious adorations at the altar of an Unknown God.

He wrote his apology for Religion, without consulting a single book, but the scriptures, on the subject. It was from this sacred armoury alone, that he drew those arguments, with which he so ably opposed the philosophers. He possessed advantages beyond many of his predecessors. He had been long their accomplice. He had passed nearly his whole life in the enemy's camp, and knew where the strong or the weak points of their doctrines lay. This perfect knowledge of their mysteries, furnished him the means of unmasking their hypocrisy, and exposing the bad faith of his adversaries. He expressed his regret that he did not live to finish it; as for several years of his life, the hope of being useful, and of rebuilding what he had once destroyed, was his only ambition on earth. He was sensible that his end was approaching, and prepared to meet it without anxiety. In the midst of the greatest sufferings, he showed a resignation which was both edifying and impressive; and totally opposite to the natural impetuosity of his temper. He spoke to his friends of the consolations of religion, but without any affectation of courage and showing any of that theatrical levity or indifference, which was the fashionable death among the philosophers.

BARON HALLER.

Haller is one of those distinguished literary characters, who have been not more illustrious in the republic of letters, than venerable as the advocates and the ornaments of religion and virtue. The number and variety of his labours have rendered his fame universal; and such was the versatility of his genius, and the indefatigable activity of his habits, that he has gathered laurels of unfading renown in almost every region of natural and moral science. In early life, "he had his doubts," as he himself expresses it, and was unsatisfied with some of the doctrines and evidences of the Christian revelation; but these scruples were dispelled by a more profound insight into the works of nature, and an impartial examination of the sacred oracles. Like Newton and Boyle, in proportion as he explored with success the mysteries and wonders of creation, he felt his breast warmed with devotion to its great Author and Governor. In an age when so many illustrious men prostituted their talents and their fame, in making unprovoked attacks upon religion, he stands a splendid and honourable exception, and furnishes a most memorable instance of learning and philosophy lending their combined assistance to the cause of revelation, instead of being misemployed in supporting sceptical tenets by artful and pernicious sophistries. In the structure and fabric of the material universe, he never failed to trace the visible footsteps of its Divine Architect—to discover more convincing tokens of his existence, and brighter apprehensions of his attributes. The world was both his library and his oratory—a volume which he found every where replete with the lessons of piety and wisdom. Scarcely an object could present itself to his inquisitive eye, from which he did not draw useful and innocent instruction, or strike some spark of ecclesiastical fire to kindle and cherish his devotion. How applicable to him is the language of the great father of inductive philosophy, in one of his addresses to the Deity: "Thy creatures have been my books, but thy Scriptures much more. I have sought Thee in the courts, fields, and gardens; but I have found Thee in Thy temples." These impressions and sentiments in favour of revealed religion, he used every endeavour to communicate and impart to others, not only in his works, but by his example; for his general character was not more an ornament to science, than to human nature; and may be considered as able a defence of Christianity. Amidst the most incredible variety of his other pursuits, the study of theology, natural and revealed, had always occupied a conspicuous place. His doubts like those of Boyle appear to have been purely philosophical, and not assumed in vindication of any depravity of principles, or licentiousness of manners. They arose from his inability to comprehend the mysteries, or account for the miracles of the Gospel, especially the divinity and incarnation of Christ, his resurrection from the dead, &c.—subjects which have always been found revolting to the confidence of learning, and the pride of human understanding. The complete extirpation of his unbelief he ascribes to the study of natural science and an impartial investigation of Scripture; the first by purging his soul, he said, of arrogance and pride, filled it with that poverty of spirit which of all the Christian graces, first enters into the kingdom of heaven; the second convinced him, that the divine revelation conveyed in the Sacred Oracles, was a boon worthy of the merciful Author of our nature to give; and such as was fit for guilty mortals to receive, with humble gratitude and reverence. Of these truths he proved himself, both in his life and writings, a zealous friend and an able advocate. He early seized the numberless opportunities which his medical profession gave him, of pressing them on the conviction of all with whom he had intercourse. To his own mind they were continually present. In a thousand incidents, which passed unheeded by the vulgar, he could discern the image and perfections of the Deity; and in whatever company or circumstances he happened to be placed, he never heard the Great Name mentioned, without some pious expression, and with his eyes or hands lifted up to heaven. He published an extract from Ditton's "Truth of the Resurrection," which he acknowledged to have first cleared any doubts he entertained on that subject. He said he received infinite satisfaction from the study of the New Testament, because he was never more certain of holding converse with the Deity, than when he read his will in that divine book. His acquaintance with languages was very remarkable. He spoke and wrote Latin, French, German, English, and Italian, and carried on an extensive correspondence in them all, and except Prussian and Polish, he was so well acquainted with other European tongues, as to converse with the natives in their respective idioms.

Sir JOHN PRINGLE, a celebrated British physician, when he travelled abroad allowed his mind to be seduced by the libertine philosophy of the continent. But it was not consistent with his candid and inquisitive disposition, to rest satisfied in his doubts and difficulties, with respect to a matter of such high importance. He therefore set himself to study the scriptures and read books on divinity. The result of his investigations was, a full conviction of the divine origin and authority of the gospel. In conformity with these discoveries, and with the religion he found to be true, he regulated the whole tenor of his conduct.

GILBERT WEST was an elegant and amiable writer, but the corrupt conversation of his uncle Lord Cobham, had imbued him with sentiments hostile to revelation; more especially to the Christian religion. In the solitude of his closet he could not stifle those principles which maternal care had impressed on his youthful mind; they rose up before him, with their importance heightened by a recollection of all the tenderness and solitude with which they were inculcated. These early impressions not only prevented him from becoming hardened in infidelity, but led him to examine the truth of that religion from which they were derived to inquire into the foundation upon which it was built; and his inquiry, as in all cases when conducted with candour and honesty, was rewarded with a full conviction of its truth and importance. Thus confirmed in the truth of the Christian religion, Mr. West conceived that he could not be a consistent believer, unless his life corresponded with its pure dictates, and hence the piety which marked the whole tenor of his conduct, of which he has given us the strongest proof, by his defence of that fundamental article of Christianity, The Resurrection of Christ from the dead. He was regular and exemplary in his habits of life, attentive to the public ordinances of religion, as well as to the performance of personal and family devotion—duties which he considered to be binding on all who profess Christianity, and which he felt to be connected with his own present and future happiness, with domestic peace and tranquillity, as well as the good order and welfare of society.

COUNT STRUENSE, prime minister of Denmark under Christian VII., was a man of libertine principles and infidel opinions. From an obscure adventurer he rose to the very pinnacle of court preferment, and political preferment, but was soon disgraced, thrown into prison and executed. After his conversion he said, "My unbelief and aversion to religion were founded neither upon an accurate inquiry into its truth, nor upon a critical examination of those doubts that are generally made against it. They arose from a very general superficial knowledge of religion, and much inclination to disobey its precepts, with a readiness to entertain every objection which I discovered against it." He said, "although now in my fetters, and near a disgraceful end, I am by far more happy than I was in my former grandeur. My temporal prosperity never procured me that true tranquillity of mind which I now enjoy in prison and in bonds."

Miscellaneous.

We are happy to see in the Christian Remembrancer the following well written eulogium:

From America we have received one of Bishop Doane's kind and genial packet's—his addresses to the twin establishments of Burlington College and St. Mary's Hall; a remarkably sensible collection of addresses delivered at the commencement of St. James' College, Maryland, by the Rector, Mr. Kerfoot—a very real and vigorous character, judging from his works. And 'America and Great Britain,' Bishop Doane's address at Burlington on the 4th July, the annual Declaration of Independence. The bishop in his own fervid way, expands the theme, that brothers are better friends for thrashing each other: and the feeling seems reciprocal.—Churchman.

MORAL COURAGE.

Have the courage to discharge a debt while you have the money in your pocket.

Have the courage to do without that which you do not need, however much your eyes may covet it.

Have the courage to speak to a friend in a 'seedy' coat, even though you are in company with a rich one, and richly attired.

Have the courage to own you are poor and thus disarm poverty of its sharpest sting.

Have the courage to make a will, and a just one.

Have the courage to tell a man why you will not lend him your money.

Have the courage to "cut" the most agreeable acquaintance you have, when you are convinced that he lacks principle. "A friend should bear with a friend's infirmities," not his vices.

Have the courage to show your respect for honesty, in whatever guise it appears; and your contempt for dishonesty and duplicity, by whomsoever exhibited.

Have the courage to wear your old clothes until you pay for new ones.

Have the courage to obey your Maker, at the risk of being ridiculed by man.

Have the courage to take a good paper, and to pay for it annually in advance.—Calendar.

JEHU'S DRIVING.

This redoubtable Captain it would seem had a reputation of his own, among his contemporaries, for "going ahead." The watchman of the wounded king, Joram, knew it well—for as he looked from his tower, across the plain, and saw a troop approaching he recognized at once its headlong leader: "The driving is like the driving of Jehu, the son of Nimshi, for he driveth furiously."

There are plenty of these sons of Nimshi, still in the world, whose ideas of driving are of the true Jehu-type. They need a wide track to avoid accidents; making as they are prone to, a much more laborious use of the hand which carries the whip, than of that which guides the team.

Our anti-conservatives are these men.—By conservatism, is not intended a dead fixity, but a just regard for things as they are, until they can be not only tumbled into pieces, but set up better. A man must be very blind, to say that all things are as they should be around us; and he, a very unbelieving one, who thinks that what is wrong cannot be righted. Some things which are "crooked," it may be, "cannot be made straight;" yet most of them can, and must be. But to break a stick into fragments, in trying to straighten it, is possibly to do a worse thing than to let it alone.

Now it is in endeavoring to set things to rights, in this world, that we are so often reminded of Jehu's famous charioteering. Reform is the word.

"Of old things, all are over old;

Of new things none are new enough;

We'll show that we can help to frame

A world of other stuff!"

Society, the church, the family, all human organizations, are full of abuses—poverty and crime crushing "the masses;" slavery trampling on the rights of millions; a thousand grievances are crying for redress, impatient at the slow movement of Christian benevolence. Forth steps some ardent spirit, with more zeal than discretion—a good man, perhaps, but perhaps not—and mounts the car of progress.

"Crack, goes the whip, Round go the wheels."

Old landmarks vanish in a twinkling, in the dusty distance; speed becomes flight; the wondering crowd looks on in fear, or doubt, or admiration, according to their ideas of the driver's skill. There is enough of stir and rattle to accomplish a long journey, and yet it may all end in a capsize, and a broken head.

This is no caricature. A good many who started even thus, have not yet shaken off all the dust, and healed all the bruises of a downfall like this. "But what are you driving at?" asks a reader.

Precisely this: Not that we should tie up at the old fastenings, where former generations were content to stand, and attempt no onward movement. The world is moving—and that team is poorly fitted for the road, which is harnessed, now-a-days, with nothing but a breaching. All holding-back is almost as bad as all running-away. We are for progress, at a good round trot. Beyond this, "haste makes waste." John Gilpin gained nothing by riding so "furiously," that he was obliged to ride back again, to pick up his hat and wig.

THE DYING INDIAN BOY.

The missionary, on visiting him, says: "I found him dying of consumption, and in a state of the most awful poverty and destitution, in a small birch-rind covered hut, with nothing but a few fern leaves under him, and an old blanket over him, which was in a condition not to be described.—After recovering from my surprise, I said:

"My poor boy, I am very sorry to see you in this state; had you let me know, you should not have been lying here."

He replied, "It is very little I want now, and these poor people get it for me; but I should like something softer to lie upon, as my bones are very sore."

I then asked him concerning the state of his mind, when he replied that he was very happy; that Jesus Christ, the Lord of glory, had died to save him, and that he had the most perfect confidence in him. Observing a small Bible under the corner of his blanket, I said:

"Jack, you have a friend there; I am glad to see that: I hope you find something good there."

Weak as he was, he raised himself on his elbow, held it in his attenuated hand, while a smile played on his countenance, and slowly spoke in precisely the following words:

"This, sir, is my dear friend. You gave it me. For a long time I read it much, and often thought of what it told. Last year I went to see my sister at Lake Winnipeg, [about two hundred miles off,] where I remained about two months. When I was half-way back through the lake, I remembered that I had left my Bible behind me. I directly turned round, and was nine days by myself, tossing to and fro, before I reached the house, but I found my friend, and determined that I would not part with it again, and ever since it has been near my breast, and I thought I should have buried it with me; but I have thought since, I had better give it to you when I am gone, and it may do some one else good."

He was often interrupted by a sepulchral cough, and sunk down exhausted. I read and prayed; the hut hardly afforded me room to be upright even when kneeling.—Bishop of Montreal's Journal.

ORDINATION.—On Friday, March 2d, (Ember Day,) in St. Peter's Church, Philadelphia, the Bishop of the Diocese admitted Mr. J. A. Merrick to the Holy Order of Deacons.

The candidate was presented by the Rector, the Rev. Mr. Odenheimer, and the address made by the Bishop.

ST. MARK'S CHURCH, PHILADELPHIA.

We understand that the Rev. J. P. B. Wilmer of Virginia, has accepted the Rectorship of St. Mark's Church.

Mr. Wilmer's accession to the Clergy of Philadelphia will be hailed, with pleasure, by his brethren, and his acceptance of the Rectorship is an earnest of success for this new and important Parish.

DIOCESE OF NEW JERSEY.

The Bishop of the diocese, though, by God's benignant answer to the prayers of His faithful people, nearly recovered from a second, and far more serious illness—for which he humbly asks that they will join their thanks with his—is not permitted to make himself responsible, as yet, for the customary appointments of the Vernal Visitation. The most of it, he hopes to make, as heretofore, in April; and the remainder, as soon after as may be. What he asks of his reverend brethren is, that they will pardon his omission (for the first time in nearly seventeen years,) of the canonical notice; and allow him to arrange with them, for his several services, by letter: the preparation for catechising, confirmation, and the like, going on as usual. He further asks the continuance of the prayers, for which he feels himself so much indebted; that, with renewed and re-invigorated health, new measures of devotion to the Master's service may be granted.

ST. MARY'S HALL AND BURLINGTON COLLEGE.

The Catalogues of these two Institutions, for the Winter Term, contain the names of 160 pupils, at the Hall; and 127 at the College.

The Summer Term, at each Institution, opens on Tuesday, May 1, (St. Philip and St. James.) Prompt and punctual attendance is strictly required. Numerous applications for admission have already been received.

Domestic Missions.

MISSIONS IN CALIFORNIA AND OREGON.

CHURCH MISSIONS.—DOMESTIC COM., }
No. 2 Park Place, Feb. 20, 1849. }

At a stated meeting of the Domestic Committee, held on the 19th Feb., 1849, the Secretary was requested to give publicity to the following:

1. That the Com. have appointed a second Missionary to California, at a salary of $500, whose name is, for the present, withheld, until he can reply to the Committee.

2. That the Rev. John L. Ver Mehr, LL. D., Ph. D., Missionary to San Francisco, with his family, sailed for his destination on the 7th February, ult., in the ship George Washington. And that the thanks of the Com., in the name of the Board of Missions, have been tendered to William P. Furniss, Esq., of the City of New York, for a free passage, including all stores for the voyage, given by him, in said ship, to the Missionary, his wife, four children and nurse.

3. That the Treasurer is prepared to receive funds for the support of two Missionaries at San Francisco, one at Monterey, one at Los Angeles, and one at Sutter's Fort and vicinity—and one in Oregon, at Oregon City. And that the Com. will proceed to the appointment of Missionaries, at all the above stations, as soon as funds are provided for their support.

4. That it will be necessary to provide for the outfit and support of the Missionaries, until they reach their destination, and can be aided by residents there. And that the salary of $500, to each of the Missionaries now appointed, although inadequate, is all that the present state of the Treasury will allow. The Committee appeal to the churches, generally, but with peculiar emphasis and great earnestness to those which have sent forth their members and representatives to that distant region, for funds to carry the above objects into effect.

By order of the Committee,
CHARLES H. HALSEY, Sec., &c.

N. B.—The Committee also give notice, that a free passage, for two Clergymen, has been tendered them, by the President and Members of an Association, expecting to sail in their own vessel, from this port, for San Francisco, within the next month.

MANUAL LABOR AND MISSION SCHOOL

AMONG THE CHICKASAW INDIANS.

The Domestic Committee give notice that, in behalf of the Board of Missions, they have accepted the proposal made by the Government, at the request of this nation, to establish a Manual Labor and Mission School; and have appropriated funds to cover the expenses of a proper agent to visit the Country, and, in conjunction with the agent of Government and of the Indians, to select suitable grounds for the establishment of the Mission.

That Government offers to advance, at proper periods, $5000 towards the erection of suitable edifices, to appropriate as much land as may be necessary for the Mission, and $1000 towards fencing, tilling, and stocking the farm, &c. And to pay $50 per annum for each boy actually received, clothed, fed, and educated at the School, not exceeding one hundred, nor less than eighty, in number, during the year, and will continue this payment during twenty years.

For the efficient execution of the plan, the Committee believe the following persons will be requisite, namely:

1. A Superintendent and Wife. The Superintendent to be a Layman, and, if possible, a Physician.
2. A Clergyman and Wife, as Teachers of the School. He being Chaplain, and having charge of the Establishment during absence of the Superintendent.
3. A young man, as Assistant Teacher.
4. A farmer and Wife.
5. Two females, to superintend the wardrobe of the boys, and to aid in household affairs.
6. A Blacksmith.
7. A Carpenter.

That the chief expense to the church, it is believed, will be incurred during the first year, in erecting buildings, and placing the Farm under cultivation, which will cause an outlay of $3500. And that, with prudent management, this sum can be refunded, and the Mission made to sustain itself, with the aid of the Government appropriation, within six years from its commencement. The Committee repeat their conviction that this is one of the most favorable opportunities which has ever been presented, to establish Missions among the Indians west of the Mississippi. And they again present the subject, in the hope that it may awaken an interest in the Church, arrest the attention of persons suitable for the enterprise, and draw forth the means necessary for its support.

By order of the Committee,
CHAS. H. HALSEY, Sec. and Gen. Agt.

CONNECTICUT.

CALIFORNIA MISSION.—We are authorised by the Bishop of this Diocese to state that he is now ready to receive the names of Clergymen who desire to go as Missionaries to California; and to receive from parishes and from individuals, pledges for the support of those who may be sent. On account of the great expense to be incurred, as well in reaching the Missionary field, as in living there, the Bishop will give the preference to unmarried clergymen.

The Bishop wishes it to be understood that the proposed Mission to California should be regarded as an extra effort, and a special work; and he earnestly hopes that it may in no degree interfere with the ordinary monthly collections, and other contributions, for the support of the Foreign and Domestic departments, of our general Board of Missions.

The sudden and immense emigration to the new Territory of California constitutes a singular era in the history of our country, and presents a most interesting subject of reflection to the friends of pure religion.

The thousands of deserving young men from the midst of us, who are turning their backs upon their relations and friends, and upon the religious institutions in which they were reared, and rushing into this new region in the eager pursuit of worldly gain, while they may deserve our respect for their enterprise, command still more strongly our sympathy for the spiritual destitution to which they must be exposed, amidst the dangers which will surround them, and the temptations which will beset them. Let us follow them, then, with faithful monitors, who, in the midst of their toils and wanderings, will remind them of the uncertain and transitory nature of worldly pursuits, and of the important realities which pertain to the eternal state. Such admonitions will not fail to bring up the remembrance of home, of the family fireside, and of early religious impressions, contrasting strongly with the turmoils in which they are engaged, and with hearts softened by the recollection, they may be rendered susceptible to the influences of divine grace, and be induced to lay hold on the blessed hope of everlasting life in the world to come.

William T. Lee, Esq., of Hartford, has consented to act as Treasurer for the receipt of whatever funds may be contributed, to be disbursed under the direction of the Bishop, according to the wishes of donors.—Calendar.

NEW HAMPSHIRE.

CENTRAL CONVOCATION.—This Convocation met at St. Paul's Church, Concord, on the 22d ult. The exercises were conducted under the direction of the Rt. Rev. Carlton Chase, D. D., Bishop of the Diocese. The first service was held on Thursday evening. Prayers were read by the Rev. John Kelly, of St. Michael's, Manchester, and a sermon was preached by the Rev. Edward F. Putnam, of St. Andrew's, Hopkinton.

On Friday forenoon, the clergy assembled at the Rector's study, and spent the time in conference, receiving from the Bishop many valuable suggestions as to the manner of discharging their parochial duties, and as to measures suitable to advance the cause of Christ and his Church in their several parishes. In the afternoon, a service was held in the Church. The Rev. Edward F. Putnam read prayers, and the sermon was preached by the Rev. John Kelly. In the evening, the Rev. John Kelly read prayers, assisted in the lesson by the Rev. Edward F. Putnam, and the Bishop preached.

The attendance of the congregation upon these several services, indicated that there was some just appreciation, by the people, of the privilege which they enjoyed. The preaching was practical and impressive, well suited to arouse the mind to a sense of the importance of personal religion, and a life of solemn consecration, and sincere and earnest devotion to the glory of God. Very excellent singing by the parish choir, at the several services, added much to their interest. It is to be hoped, that the good example set by the members of this choir, in a punctual attendance upon all the public services, will be followed in the parishes in which the Convocation shall, hereafter, hold its meetings.

In this Diocese, our soil is hard and our climate cold, morally as well as physically; but our Church is for no particular latitude; and we believe that the time will come, by the blessing of God, when many bleak hills of New Hampshire will be crowned with her temples. But that she may enlarge her borders, her clergy must be men of stout hearts, willing minds, and self-denying tempers; and her laity must hold up the hands of their ministers by great sacrifices.

WESTERN NEW YORK.

NEW CHURCHES.—We learn, with much pleasure, that new Church edifices are nearly completed at Niagara Falls, Niagara county, at Clayville, Oneida county, and one in progress of erection at Nunda, Livingston county, at McLean, Tompkins county; and that subscription papers are, or are to be, in circulation to erect Churches at Pulaski, Oswego county, at Vienna, Ontario county, at Mexicoville, Oswego county, and at Cortlandville, Cortland county.

CONFIRMATION.—Bishop DeLancey held a second confirmation for St. John's Church, Vienna, on Sunday morning, Feb. 25th. The services were held in the School House in East Vienna. Prayers and the confirmation preface were read by the Rev. Mr. Wheeler, the Missionary of the station, and the Bishop preached, and confirmed five persons. The Bishop preached also in the afternoon.—Gospel Messenger.

Clerical Changes.

The Rev. Charles E. Phelps, having resigned the rectorship of St. Matthew's Church, Moravia, and having been appointed the Missionary at Homer, Cortland county, Western New York, requests all letters and papers intended for him to be directed accordingly.

The Rev. Charles Minnigerode, having accepted a call to Martin's, Brandon Parish, has removed to Garysville, Prince George's co., Virginia, and requests that his letters and papers may be directed accordingly.

The Rev. William H. Good, having taken letters dimissory from the diocese of Virginia, and accepted a call to the rectorship of St. James' Church, Greenville, in the diocese of Tennessee, requests all his letters and papers to be directed accordingly.

Rev. J. G. Downing has resigned the charge of St. James's Church, Muncy, and accepted a unanimous call to St. James's Church, Schuylkill Haven, and entered upon his duties at the latter place.

Selections.

A TEAR IN THE CHALICE.

It was a darkened room;
And, by a sick man's bed,
The white-robed man of God
Had blessed the Wine and Bread.

We knelt, a mourning band;
For that sick man was dear:
His was a Father's hand,
We loved, without a fear.

We tasted of the Bread,
Which giveth life to all,
Who, on Christ's Body, fed,
For His forgiveness call.

And, when, to each, he gave
The silver Chalice, bright,
Filled with that blushing Wine,
Which glads the sinner's sight;

Within the blessed Cup,
There fell a crystal tear,
Which, from a heart, welled up,
Dissolved with grief and fear.

It was a beauteous sight,
That eye-distilled dew,
Like a diamond, pure and bright,
In a flood of ruby hue.

Could I fail, as I knelt, there, near,
To regard it, as a sign,
That God, through the Wine, would bless the tear,
As, for the tear, the Wine?

The Press, secular and religious, has teemed with almost unqualified panegyrics of the Work noticed below. Its brilliant style has so dazzled the public eye that the defects are not regarded. Its anti-church tendencies are exhibited in the following notice from that able Periodical "the Irish Ecclesiastical Journal." The great popularity of the Work and its surpassing interest, have induced us to present the article to our readers. Such a history should be read with a full view of the prejudice and feelings which have influenced its author.

MACAULAY'S HISTORY OF ENGLAND.

That brilliant series of essays on men and manners which Mr. Macaulay has been pleased to entitle "A History of England," will, doubtless, widely extend the popularity, if not the reputation, of its author. It is needless to state that these volumes, which we propose to consider in succession, abound with all the peculiar attractions of Mr. Macaulay's style. As with his essays, so with his history. His piercing sarcasms, his cutting satire, his withering denunciations, his unrivalled command of the English tongue, are weapons which Mr. Macaulay wields with the power of the practiced advocate, and with the grace of the brilliant rhetorician. To such attractions the reader who opens this work must be prepared completely to surrender his judgment, for Mr. Macaulay exhibits no fine balances of authority between which the judgment is free to choose. But although the author has not thought fit to supply any such test of his fairness or of his accuracy, he must be well aware that by the result of the application of the prosaic touchstone of facts, the permanent character of his history must stand or fall.

His method is simple. In a hundred and fifty pages, the early English history is brought to the period of the Restoration. Another hundred and thirty pages conduct us to the death of Charles II. Another hundred and forty depict the state of England in its various social and material aspects, at the time of the accession of James. The remainder of the two volumes already published describe the period whose catastrophe was the Revolution of 1688. With the political or social records of this period, apart from their connexion with the Church, we do not propose to meddle, beyond giving our readers occasionally some striking specimens of Mr. Macaulay's style. We propose to confine our remarks to the constant allusions to ecclesiastical matters which are to be met with; commenting, as we proceed, on the accuracy or the impartiality of the narrative.

Mr. Macaulay contends that the first appearance of our Church is to be sought for in the days of the Reformation. With his peculiar views as to what constitutes a Church, this is, perhaps, scarcely to be wondered at. Indeed, we should feel considerable surprise if, with such sentiments as he constantly expresses, he were able even to comprehend the statement of her fundamental principles, which every moderately informed member of the Church of England would at once lay down in the words of her 30th Canon:

"So far was it from the purpose of the Church of England to forsake and reject the churches of Italy, France, Spain, Germany, or any such like Churches, in all things which they held and practised, that as the Apology of the Church of England confesseth, it doth with reverence, retain those ceremonies which do neither endamage the Church of God, nor offend the minds of sober men; and only departed from them in those particular points wherein they were fallen both from themselves in their ancient integrity, and from the apostolical Churches which were their first founders."

The simple facts of the Reformation cannot, indeed, be described with more truth and admirable terseness than in the words of another statesman, as fully versed in such matters as Mr. Macaulay is unfamiliar:—

"In England," writes Mr. Gladstone, "the case was widely different from that of the Continent. Her reformation did not destroy, but successfully maintained the unity and succession of the Church in her apostolical ministry. We have, therefore, still among us the ordained hereditary witnesses of the truth, conveying it to us through an unbroken series, from our Lord Jesus Christ and his apostles."

But it is time to hear Mr. Macaulay himself:—

"As the government needed the support of the Protestants, so the Protestants needed the protection of the government. Much was therefore given up on both sides; an union was effected, and the fruit of that union was the Church of England. The man who took the chief part in settling the conditions of the alliance which produced the Anglican Church, was Thomas Cranmer. . . . Saintly in his professions, unscrupulous in his dealings, zealous for nothing, bold in speculation, a coward and a time-server in action, a placable enemy and a lukewarm friend, he was every way qualified to arrange the terms of the coalition between the religious and the worldly enemies of popery. To this day the constitution, the doctrines, and the services of the Church retain the visible marks of the compromise from which she sprang. She occupies a middle position between the Churches of Rome and Geneva. Her doctrinal confessions and discourses, composed by Protestants, set forth principles of theology in which Calvin or Knox would have found scarcely a word to disapprove. Her prayers and thanksgivings, derived from the ancient liturgies, are very generally such that Bishop Fisher or Cardinal Pole might have heartily joined in them. A controversialist who puts an Arminian sense on her articles and homilies will be pronounced by candid men to be as unreasonable as a controversialist who denies that the doctrine of baptismal regeneration can be discovered in her liturgy."—pp. 51, 52.

Of the animus which characterises these passages, each reader can judge for himself. But the chief doctrines which offend Mr. Macaulay, and which he labours hard to prove that the Church of England does not hold, are those of Episcopacy and of the Apostolical succession. (a) He says (repeating his notion of the origin of the Church)—"The founders of the Anglican Church took a middle course. They retained episcopacy, but they did not declare it to be an institution essential to the welfare of a Christian society, or to the efficacy of the sacraments."

Strange! that Mr. Macaulay does not perceive that the conclusion deducible from this silence ought rather to be the exact reverse of what he infers. A doctrine, unquestioned even by Luther or Calvin, it was unnecessary to define. What, for instance, would be thought of the application to other subjects of this principle of interpreting the Church's silence on certain points? Let us for a moment apply it in a manner analogous to that adopted in the passage just quoted, and see whether the inference can be deemed either sound, or even rational—"The founders of the Anglican Church retained the books of the New Testament, 'as they are commonly received;' but they did not declare which are the particular books which make up that part of Holy Scripture; nay, more, they do not define explicitly what is meant by the terms 'commonly received,' or 'canonical.' Hence we may infer that the Church of England rejects the Gospel of St. John!"

To these doctrines, however, Mr. Macaulay incessantly returns; but the facts by which he attempts to support his theory are singularly infelicitous. He urges, for example, the circumstance of James I. (who is described as the "head of the English Church") having sent four divines to be present at the Synod of Dort. Here Mr. Macaulay not only forgets to state that this act of the king was without the slightest sanction on the part of the Church itself, but he also omits to record the subsequent proceedings of the king's envoys. The opening sentence of Bishop Carleton's account of his protest against the opinions of the synod is as follows:—"When we were to yield our consent to the Belgic Confession of Dort, I made open protestation in the synod, that whereas in the confession there was inserted a strange conceit of the purity of ministers, to be instituted by Christ, I declared our dissent utterly on that point." (b)

But when Mr. Macaulay goes on to assert that "many English benefices were held by divines who had been admitted to the ministry in the Calvinistic form used on the Continent, nor was re-ordination by a bishop, in such cases, then thought necessary, or even lawful" (p. 77), as he mentions no case in point, it is impossible to give a special reply. But there are some facts, on the opposite side, respecting which Mr. Macaulay seems to be without any information. Let us instance but two, which occurred even previously to the Synod of Dort. In Queen Elizabeth's reign, Travers, the well-known antagonist of Hooker, had been admitted a minister at Antwerp, according to what Mr. Macaulay calls the "Calvinistic form." On returning to England, he became chaplain to Lord Burleigh, by whose interest he obtained the "Lecture of the Temple." (c) On the facts of the case being brought before the High Commission, Travers was at once silenced; the order commencing with these words—"that he was no lawfully ordained minister, ACCORDING TO THE CHURCH OF ENGLAND." The second fact which we have to notice is the case of the three Scottish ministers, who, although not episcopally ordained, had, during the troubles of the time, for years been styled in Scotland, respectively, Archbishop of Glasgow, Bishop of Brechin, and Bishop of Galloway; but who were subsequently required to receive valid orders through the Church of England; and who, on the 21st of October, 1610, in the chapel of London House, were at length consecrated bishops.

(a) The reader acquainted with Mr. Macaulay's Essays will remember how earnestly—may we not add, how feebly?—he attempts to combat this doctrine of the Church, in his Essay on Mr. Gladstone's "Church and State."

(b) Collier, vol. ii., p. 715. Fol. ed.

Misery, misery, indeed did he find in that most miserable dwelling. The poor wretch himself was dead drunk on the floor. The poor pale woman was sobbing her very heart out. The children were clamorous; and but few were the words of their clamor. "I am cold,"—"I am hungry,"—and that was all. The Deacon brought in the wood; made up a fire; lighted a candle; and emptied the bag and basket. The poor pale woman wept and sobbed her thanks. "Oh, you varmint," said the Deacon, as he looked at the husband and father; and broke off a piece of bread for each of the children. The general commotion aroused the poor wretch from his drunken stupor.

"Hallo, old music," said he, "are you here? give us a stave, old nightingale. Sing as you do in meeting. Sing and scare the rats away." "Why, what on earth does the critter mean?" said the Deacon. The poor, pale, grateful woman smiled through her tears. She could not help it. She had been a singer in her better days; she had also heard the Deacon sing.

I do not record these incidents merely because they are honorable to Deacon Goodman, but because they are particularly connected with my story. In this errand of mercy the good Deacon caught a very serious cold; it affected his throat, and his nose, and even his lungs, and gave to his voice a tone not unlike to that of the lowest note of a cracked bass-viol alternating with the shriek of a clarinet powerfully but unskillfully blown. On Saturday evening he soaked his feet in hot water; drank copiously of hot balm tea; went to bed and said he felt comfortable. "Now Deacon," said Mrs. Goodman, "you are dreadful hoarse;—you won't sing to-morrow, will you?" "Singing is praying—and—he dropped asleep. And sure enough he did "sing to-morrow," and it surpassed all that he had done before. "This is the last of it," said the choir leader, "I have done." In the afternoon the choir was vacant, some of the singers absent, and others scattered about in the pews. The minister read three verses of a psalm, and then observed, "the choir been absent, singing must necessarily be omitted." But Deacon Goodman saw no such necessity. He arose, and sung the three verses himself! He stopped six times to sneeze; and blew his nose between the verses by way of sympathy! The next day he was sick abed. A parish meeting was hastily called, and a resolution unanimously passed, that, "Whereas the solemnity and decorum of public worship depend much on the character of the music: resolved, that hereafter, no person shall sing in meeting, in this parish, without the approbation of the choir!" Rather a stringent measure; but what could they do? The minister called on Deacon Goodman, and handed him the resolution. He read it over three times; he then calmly folded up the paper, and handed it back to the minister. "This is a free country yet I hope. I shall sing in meeting." He said these very words! He was dreadfully "set in his way."

"Then Deacon," said the minister, "I have a most painful duty to perform. I am instructed to tell you, that your connection with the society must cease." The Deacon here started from his seat. Had the full moon split into four pieces, and danced a quadrille in the heavens; Orion singing, and the Northern Bear growling base, he could not have been more astounded. He was silent. Emotion after emotion rolled over his heaving spirit. "At length tears came to his relief," as they say in the novels. He spoke, but almost inarticulately. "I know I am a poor unworthy creature, but I hope they will take me in somewhere." The minister wept himself. How could he help it? The Deacon's cold was nearly cured; and about an hour after the interview, he was seen mounted on old Mag, heading due north. Four miles in that direction, lived the worthy minister of another parish. The Deacon found him in his study, where also was his daughter, copying music. She was a proficient in the art, and played the organ in her father's church. She had heard of the Deacon's musical troubles, and had also heard him sing. "Sir," said he to the minister, "there has been a little difficulty in our parish, which makes me feel it my duty to withdraw; and I have come to ask the privilege of uniting with yours." (At that moment the young lady vanished from the room.)

"I much regret the difficulty in your parish," said the minister, "and hope it will be amicably settled. But if you finally conclude to withdraw, we shall be most happy to receive you; and when it shall please the Lord to take good old Deacon Grimes to himself, (and a very few days must now give him his dismissal,) we shall expect you to sit in his seat." After half an hour's pleasant conversation, the Deacon arose to take his departure. At that moment, a boy came in and handed a billet to the minister. He glanced at the billet, and "Deacon, sit down one moment," said he. He read the billet, and after some hesitation, said, "I have received a singular communication from our choir leader; he has somehow or other heard of your intention to join our society; and has heard of it with very great pleasure; but, he adds that it is the earnest and unanimous wish of the choir that you will not sing in meeting." The Deacon was again electrified, but had got used to the shock; "Singing is praying; and I join no church where I cannot sing in the meeting,—good day, sir." He was very "set in his way."

Five miles west of his own dwelling, lived the good pastor of another flock. The Deacon found him shelling corn in his crib. This minister, although eminently pious, thought it no harm to be a little waggish in a good cause and for a worthy object. He also had heard of the Deacon's musical troubles, and shrewdly suspected the object of his visit. "Deacon Goodman, I am glad to see you," said he, "this is not exactly ministerial labor, is it?" "I am of a different opinion," said the Deacon, "any honest and useful labor is ministerial labor; I hate all dandies—the Lord forgive me, I don't like them; and I like a dandy minister least of any." "You and I are agreed there," said the minister; "come, walk into the house and see my wife; she says she is in love with you for your honesty and your oddities." "I never!" said the Deacon, "but I thank you, I am in something of a hurry; and have a little business which we can just as well settle here."

"There has been a little difficulty in our parish, which makes me feel it my duty to withdraw, and I have come to ask the privilege of joining yours." At this the reverend gentleman looked as if he were very much surprised. "Is it possible," said he; "well, Deacon, though an ill wind for them, it is a good one for us; for it has blown you hither. We shall be most happy to receive you, especially as our choir leader has followed the multitude and gone West. We have been looking about for a competent man to take his place. Our singers are all young and diffident, and each one is loth to take the lead. We hear that you sing the most difficult music, and—"

"Why mercy upon you," said the Deacon, "I don't know one note from another. I know that singing is praying; and I sing in meeting as I pray in meeting."

"Excuse me, my friend," replied the minister, "it is your modesty that now speaks; you do understand music, you must understand music; or you could never sing Mozart with proper expression; and did you not sing that most beautiful solo, which is worthy of an angel's ear and voice?" Now this was all Greek to the Deacon, and like a sensible man as he was, he always said nothing when he had nothing to say. "You say truly," continued the minister, "that singing is praying. But to those who know nothing of music, it is praying in an unknown tongue, and I am sure you are not Papist enough to approve of that; music is a language, and like other languages must be learned before it can be spoken. When the deaf and dumb attempt to speak our common language they make strange noises, and still worse noises do we make when without the musical ear or the musical voice, we attempt to sing."

Thus sensibly did that good minister speak. The Deacon was a good deal "struck up," though set in his way, he was not a fool; and only needed to be touched in the right place. "It never appeared to me in that light before," said the Deacon thoughtfully.

"And yet, my friend, it is the true light," said the minister. "And now do let me give you a word of advice: Go home, and take your old seat on Sunday; and never again attempt to sing in meeting. For if your heart is right, your ear is untuned, and your voice, though kind, is any thing but musical." The Deacon "said nothing, but thought the more."

He approached his own village. The reason for his errand abroad had been strongly suspected, and they were all on the look out for his return. There stood the choir leader. "Welcome home, Deacon," said he, "hope we have not lost you yet." "Get out," said the Deacon, with a good-natured but rather sheepish look; and on he went. There stood the minister. "Welcome home, Deacon, I hope we have not lost you yet." "Get—," he was just going to say get out, but habitual reverence for the minister cut him short. He looked at the minister, and the minister looked at him, and both burst into a fit of laughter. The choir leader came up and took the Deacon's hand, and joined in the merriment. At the front door and windows of his own house, were his wife and daughters, and two or three of the singing girls, "all of a titter." They had seen and heard his interview with the minister, and knew that all was well.

Deacon Goodman took his old seat on Sunday, but since that day's adventure, has never sung in meeting. Once, and but once, did he attempt to raise a psalm on his own private account. He was in his barn putting some hay in his cow's manger. Now, the neighbors were always ready to do a good turn for Deacon Goodman; and before he had finished the first verse, two of them rushed in and asked him if his cow was choked! He never sung again.

THE LOST SON.

I was standing by the side of my mother, under the spacious porch of Dr. Beatty's Church, Union street, Glasgow, awaiting the hour for afternoon service. A holy calm hung over the city; no discordant noise broke the solemn stillness of the day of rest and worship; scarcely a whisper was heard in the assembly of waiting worshippers who crowded the broad pavement on which I stood. All seemed profoundly impressed with the solemn and sacred character of the day, the place, and the occasion which had called them together. It was, in short, a Sunday, in the land of Knox and Chalmers. I had been in this position probably ten or fifteen minutes, when I observed two young men turn a corner and walk towards the church. They were dressed in their working clothes, unshaven and dirty, and slightly intoxicated. As they passed the church door, they assumed a swaggering, irreverent gait, laughed and finally commenced singing a profane song. Some of the bystanders expressed their horror at the occurrence, others wondered what had become of the police; but my mother turned to me and said, "Follow these two men and invite them to a seat in our pew."

I soon overtook them and delivered my mother's message. One laughed scornfully and began to swear; the other paused and pondered: he was evidently struck with the nature of the invitation, and probably also with the earnestness and simplicity with which it was delivered. His companion again swore and was about to drag him away. But he still paused. I repeated the invitation, and in a few seconds he looked in my face and said, "When I was a boy like you, I went to church every Sunday. I have not been inside of a church for three years. I don't feel right. I believe I will go with you." I seized his hand and led him back to the house of God, in spite of the remonstrances and oaths of his companion. The doors were now open, and the church was filling rapidly; we entered, and I conducted him to the pew where my mother was already seated. A most excellent sermon was preached from Eccles. xi. "Cast thy bread upon the waters; for thou shalt find it after many days." The young man was attentive, but seemed abashed and downcast.

At the conclusion of the service he hastened out of the church, but he was closely followed, and soon overtaken by my mother, who kindly said to him, "Have you a Bible young man?" "No, ma'am; but I can get one," was his reply. "You can read, of course?" said she. "Yes ma'am." "Well, take my son's Bible until you procure one of your own. Read it attentively during the week, and come to meeting again next Lord's day. I will always be happy to accommodate you with a seat."

He put the Bible in his pocket and hurried away. At family worship that evening my mother prayed fervently for the conversion of that young man.

Next Sunday came, and the next, but the stranger did not appear. My mother frequently spoke of him and appeared grieved at his absence. He had doubtless been the subject of her closet devotions. On the third Sunday morning, while the congregation were singing the first psalm, the young man again entered our pew. He was now dressed genteelly, and appeared thin and pale, as if from recent sickness. My mother looked at him with great earnestness, and a gleam of satisfaction and thankfulness overspread her pale, intellectual features. Immediately after the benediction, the stranger laid my Bible on the desk, and left the house, without giving my mother an opportunity she much desired, of conversing with him. On one of the blank leaves of the Bible we found some writing in pencil, signed "W. C." The writer stated that he had been confined to his room by sickness for the previous two weeks. He declared his inability to express the gratitude he felt towards my mother, for the interest she had manifested in his spiritual welfare: he asked to be remembered in her prayers, and concluded by stating that he was an Englishman, and that he would return to his native land in about ten days.

Years rolled on; my mother passed to her heavenly rest; I grew up to manhood, and the stranger was forgotten.

In the autumn of 18—, the ship St. George, of which I was medical officer, anchored in Table Bay. Between us and Penguin Island, I observed a man-of-war which I had seen before and knew well; it was her Majesty's brig Chanticleer of ten guns, Commander Forbes, on a surveying expedition. The surgeon of the brig, Dr. F—, had been my preceptor, and I resolved to pay him a visit. He received me with his usual warmth and kindness. After dining with the gun-room officers, he proposed that on the following day, which was the Sunday, we should attend service in Capetown. "It will remind us," he said, "of old times, when we used to go arm in arm to church in Union street."

Next day, in company with my friend, I attended morning service. At the conclusion of worship, a gentleman seated behind me, asked to look at my Bible. In a few minutes he returned it, and I walked into the street. We had arranged to dine at the "George," and I was mounting the steps in front of that hotel, when the gentleman who had examined my Bible laid his hand on my shoulder, and begged to have a few minutes' conversation. We were shown into a private apartment. As soon as we were seated, he examined my countenance with great attention, and then began to sob; tears rolled down his cheeks; he was evidently laboring under intense emotion. He appeared to be about thirty-five years of age, was tall and slender, and neatly dressed, but apparently in bad health. He asked me several questions—my name, age, occupation, birthplace, etc. He then inquired if I had not, when a boy, many years ago, invited a drunken Sabbath-breaker to a seat in Dr. Beatty's church. I was astonished—the subject of my mother's anxiety and prayers was before me. Mutual explanations and congratulations followed, after which Mr. C. gave me a short history of his life, from the time he left Scotland to the day on which we met so unexpectedly in a foreign land.

He was born in the town of Leeds, in the east-riding of Yorkshire, of highly respectable and religious parents, who gave him a good education, and trained him up in the way of righteousness. When about fifteen years of age his father died, and his mother's straitened circumstances obliged her to take him from school, and put him to learn a trade. In his new situation he imbibed all manner of evil, became incorrigibly vicious, and broke his mother's heart. Freed now from all parental restraint, he left his employers and travelled to Scotland. In the city of Glasgow he had lived and sinned for two years, when he was arrested in his career, through my mother's instrumentality. On the first Sunday of our strange interview in Union street, he confessed that after he left church he was seized with pangs of unutterable remorse. The sight of a mother and her son worshipping God together, recalled the happy days of his own boyhood, when he went to church and Sunday school, and when he also had a mother—a mother whose latter days he had embittered, and whose gray hairs he had brought with sorrow to the grave. His mental suffering threw him on a bed of sickness—from which he arose a changed man. He returned to England, cast himself at the feet of his maternal uncle, and asked and obtained forgiveness. His conviction of sin—his batlings with temptation—his repentance—his victory over the world—the growth of his faith in the great atonement—and, finally, his peace in believing, formed a deeply interesting and instructing narrative. With his uncle's consent he studied for the ministry; and on being ordained, he entered the missionary field, and had been laboring for several years in Southern Africa.

"The moment I saw your Bible this morning," he said, "I recognized it, and the examination of the writing, which is still legible on the blank leaf, assured me that I was not mistaken. And now, do you know who was my companion on the memo-table Sabbath you invited me to church? He was the notorious Jack Hill, who was hanged about a year afterwards for highway robbery. You can now see and appreciate the terrible fate from which I was rescued by the unfathomable love and boundless grace of God, through your own and your mother's instrumentality. I was dragged from the very brink of infamy and destruction, and saved as a brand from the burning. You remember Dr. Beatty's text on the day of my salvation: 'Cast thy bread upon the waters; for thou shalt find it after many days.' The proud, hardened, scoffing sinner, is found, after thirteen years, a humble minister of salvation to the benighted heathen; and your sainted mother is doubtless enjoying the reward of those who turn many to righteousness—shining as the stars for ever and ever.—American Messenger.

PRACTICAL READINGS FOR LENT.

We offer the following from Dr. Upfold's Sermon on "Filial Duty," not only as instructive for all seasons, but as suggestive of humbling thoughts for this solemn period, in reference to sins far too common, and which, in God's holy sight, are peculiarly abhorrent.

My brethren, if filial duty as it has been imperfectly attempted to be set forth, be of so holy and ennobling a nature, so lovely and attractive in its practical manifestation, so promotive of our present welfare, and so essential to the realization of our future hopes, what must be its opposite? And what shall we say of its refusal, its neglect, its evasion, and of those children, whether in childhood, in youth, or in riper years, who regard its obligations with indifference, who in any way or degree lose sight of its demands, who are callous to its generous promptings, or who sparingly, reluctantly, and grudgingly yield its commonest duties? In the case of such a sin, for sin it is, and of an aggravating and deeply debasing character, involving an amount of moral turpitude which it is difficult to measure or express, in a violation of this obligation, there is not even the poor apology of sudden temptation. It must, in its very nature, be deliberate; a sin of spontaneous production; not the result of passionate impulse, so much as of choice and habit. And how greatly does this aggravate its offensiveness in the sight of God, add to its guilt, and spread with danger, danger to our highest interests, the path of its indulgence! An undutiful child is chargeable with inexcusable ingratitude. This, independent of other enormities involved in his refusal or neglect of parental claims, brands his character and conduct with odiousness and infamy. He is an object of virtuous indignation and abhorrence; a mark at which the finger of scorn is justly pointed. He is ungrateful; and it was the remark of an ancient heathen moralist, that when, with good reason, you denounce a man as ungrateful, you have exhausted all the terms of reproach. And if the sin of ingratitude be estimated, as it well may be, by the sacred and tender character of those who are its subjects, and the number and nature of the favors received, filial ingratitude must be an offence of the darkest hue. For who can estimate parental kindness, who can measure parental favors, flowing as they do in a perennial stream from the exhaustless fountain of parental love. To our parents we owe everything, our existence, and with that, for many a year of infantile helplessness and dependence, sustenance, protection, shelter, all that constituted our comfort, our health, our happiness. When we were hungry, they fed us; when thirsty, they gave us drink; when naked, they clothed us; when sick, they ministered unto us. With what painful anxiety, with what emotions of alternate fear and hope, did they watch over us! With what earnestness, tenderness, and depth of affection, did they sympathize in our sorrows and rejoice in our joys! In health we were the subjects of their unwearying solicitude and constant care. In sickness, through the perilous diseases incident to the opening years of life, they sat by our cradles, often day after day and night after night, watching us in our troubled sleep, soothing our cries of pain and anguish, and cheering us with the voice and accents of kindness and love. The same care extends through the comparative helplessness and dependence of childhood and youth. Then we need their nurture and protection; and we receive them with readiness and freeness, and undiminished affection. To them we owe the blessings of education, our moral and mental culture, our first start in the world, and frequently much and valuable subsequent assistance. And shall we turn again and rend the staff that has supported us, when we should have otherwise fallen, suffered, perhaps prematurely perished? Shall we even requite their kindness and care with coldness and neglect? Are benefits, such as they have bestowed, to be forgotten even, much less repaid with ingratitude, positive or virtual? Can we contemplate with insensibility, the manifold favors, which cluster around every recollection of our parents in infancy, childhood, and youth? Can we be ungrateful, thankless, for what they have done, yea and for what they have endured, for us? Well did the great poet of human nature, put into the mouth of a deserted and abused father, the indignant and cutting reproof—the quotation of which, though from a secular source, may be excused for its appositeness and force:

"Ingratitude! thou marble-hearted fiend,
More hideous, when thou show'st thee in a child,
Than the sea-monster!—Filial ingratitude!
Is it not as this mouth should tear this hand,
For lifting food to't! * * * * *
How sharper than a serpent's tooth it is
To have a thankless child!"

Children and youth of my pastoral charge, and all who sustain the filial relationship, are any of you conscious in any degree of this great fault? approximating even to this great vice? for enormous it is in all its aspects, bearings and results. Are any of you refusing obedience to the reasonable and lawful commands of your parents, slighting their counsel, indifferent to and regardless of their admonitions, despising their reproof? Do any of you regard them with irreverence, and treat them unkindly, with discourtesy, with disrespect? Pause, and ponder the baseness of such conduct. Recall the benefits you have received, perhaps are yet receiving, because yet needing them. Indeed, recall them all you cannot, for they exceed all power of enumeration, and go far beyond the beginning of conscious memory. Parental kindness, care and toil, began and were in vigorous exercise before the first beaming of intelligence. And their tender assiduities thus began have known no weariness or intermission, have never ceased, never faltered. The efficient practical love manifested in infancy, has extended and is extending through childhood and youth; nay, in various ways into manhood. Is it not so? And shall any requite this unceasing solicitude, care, and kindness, by any want of reverence, by any act or spirit of insubordination and disobedience? Shall any, whether children or persons of riper years, dishonor, by indocility, by neglect or evasion of duty, those whom nature prompts and God commands us to honor, obey, and treat with responsive tenderness and kindness? And oh, will any attempt to dry up the ever gushing fountain of parental sympathy, by wilful, practical, shameful ingratitude; refuse, or withhold, when required, reciprocal care and sustenance; and worse than all assume the tone and attitude of contempt and scorn?

There is not only disgrace and infamy in such dereliction of filial duty: there is fearful, aggravated sin. Disobedience of parents, actual or constructive, direct or indirect, positive or negative, in deed, in word, in purpose, in thought, is an offence against God. His word declares and denounces it as sin. Under the former rigorous dispensation, punishment immediate, severe and fatal was enjoined and inflicted by Divine appointment. "Every one that curseth his father or his mother, shall be surely put to death; he hath cursed his father or his mother; his blood shall be upon him." The prohibition extended under a severe penalty, even to the contempt of parents, evidently including the refusal of due reverence, and decorous language and behaviour, with the minute courtesies of domestic life; for it is written, "Cursed be he that setteth light by his father or his mother; and let all the people say Amen!" And though, under the milder dispensation of the gospel, there is a change in this respect, and those immediate penalties are not recognized and allowed, there is no change in its estimate and representation of the heinousness of the offence. It declares it to be a sin of magnitude, of deep and damning guilt; for which an account will be surely and rigidly demanded in that day to which all moral punishment is deferred: "that great and terrible day of the Lord," when he shall come again in glorious majesty, to judge the world he previously came, in great humility, to save and bless.

OLD MORTALITY.

The following brief narrative, from an exchange paper, recalls to mind an old friend and former parishioner, who well deserves a passing record. Some of our readers may recognize the picture, as for the original he is, we believe, removed beyond the influence of mortal praise. We are sure that the annals of the Church, if only fully written, could present as clear and happy illustrations of the Christian graces, in its real histories, as any of the fictitious narratives whose characters are formed after the most approved patterns. The one we now recall to mind was an aged servant of God, of more than fourscore years, whose acquaintance we first made in an humble country parish. His great age, and his peculiarly venerable appearance, as well as his love for old Churches, manifested by his efforts to keep them in repair, had gained for him the name of "Old Mortality." Of an humble rank in life, with little education, and without much force of mind, the qualities of his heart, invigorated by supernatural power, gave strength and dignity to his character. The leading trait was Christian contentment. In using this term, thus qualified, we do not mean a mere passive acquiescence, but a positive satisfaction with all the allotments of a wise and merciful Providence. It was this feature in his character through which the following account brought him to mind.

"The celebrated mystical writer Taulerus, gives an interesting account of a certain divine, who, being ignorant of true religion, most earnestly besought God, with strong cries and fervent prayers, for the space of eight years, that he would direct him to some one who would point out to him the way to heaven. At length he received an intimation, that if he would go to the church, he would there find one who would satisfy the longing desires of his soul. When he came to the church, he saw no person but a poor, care-worn beggar, clothed in tattered garments. He saluted the beggar thus:—

'God grant that this may be a pleasant morning to thee.'

The beggar replied, 'Sir, I do not recollect of ever having experienced an unpleasant morning.'

'What is this thou sayest?' exclaimed the astonished divine. 'I hope that God may confer every favor upon you.'

The beggar replied, 'Sir, God's favors, have always been upon me.'

The divine, being much perplexed, and not knowing how to understand the beggar, requested him to explain himself.

'That I will, most cheerfully,' answered the beggar. 'You first wished me a pleasant morning. I replied that I had never experienced an unpleasant one, and this is actually the case: for, when I am hungry, I praise God; when I am cold, I praise him; when it rains or snows, when it thunders and lightens, no matter what kind of weather it is, I always praise the Lord; and this is the reason why I have never experienced an unpleasant morning. You then wished that God might confer every favor upon me. To this I replied, that God's favors had always been upon me, and this is also true. For I commit myself into the hands of God, and am certain that he does all things for the best. Everything, therefore, that God permits to befall me, whether it be sweet or sour, joyful or sorrowful, fortunate or unfortunate, I look upon as intended for my good, and receive it with gratitude; for all things must work together for the good of them that love the Lord.'

At the time we first became acquainted with our American representative of Old Mortality, he was suffering from the worst of earthly evils, the ingratitude of his children. He was then supported by public charity. Yet well do we remember the cheerful tone in which he always answered the ordinary salutation.

'Well, Mr. ———, how are you to-day?'

'Oh, I'm very well, I've been well this eighty odd years, I never was sick a day. I'm the happiest creature alive.'

To a lady of the neighborhood, now we trust herself "where there is fulness of joy," he thus explained the secret of his happiness.

Upon her asking him how he could be so happy, in his destitute condition, he answered at once.

'My child, I will tell you the secret. I keep all the time saying to myself, "Glory be to the Father, and to the Son, and to the Holy Ghost." I say it when I lie down, and when I rise up—I say it when I am hungry as well as when I am full. When any thing happens that would distress me, as soon as ever I say that, why I grow happy at once. I have said those words, for eighty years in Church, and I ought to know them well by this time. If we say those words from the heart, we ought to feel them always. Do you think, my child, that we ought only to feel them when good things happen to us, and not when evil things come too? No, all things are from God, and so whether good or evil comes I always say, "Glory be, &c. So I am always happy—yes I am "the happiest creature alive."

These were the old man's exact sentiments, perhaps the expressions are somewhat altered, but they have thus only lost force in departing from his simple, earnest, and expressive terms. It has often been a subject of regret that we did not take down from his own lips, more of his practical thoughts upon the true theory of life and happiness. There was more true philosophy in his teachings than ever came from the old masters of the sects.

We have spoken of his love for old Churches. Our own Parish Church was an illustration. It was built before the Revolution, and had fallen into decay, from long neglect. Our old Mortality first spent a long time in soliciting subscriptions for it, and then, as he was a mason, took up his abode in its desolate walls, and never left it until the ancient House of God was restored, from ruin and desecration, to its hallowed use.

He also gave stronger evidence of his love for the House of God, than this regard for the material building. He lived at the distance of four miles from the Church, and although he had to walk, was a regular attendant. Often have we met him on the road, when his faith and love for the Sanctuary strengthened him for a journey, which seemed altogether too much for his decrepitude, and when he was so infirm that it was almost impossible to get him into our vehicle. At a very advanced period of life, he used to walk from thirty to forty miles to attend the meetings of Convention.

He had so great love for every thing belonging to the Church, that he was always most anxious to obtain the garments which had been laid aside by the clergy. His poverty obliged him thus to clothe himself, and he certainly by this preference proved his love for old things, as in general, clerical garments must have seen their best days, and arrived at a respectable antiquity, before they can be put aside. "Old Mortality" was especially happy when he could obtain Episcopal robes, i. e., of the every day sort. We remember the gleam of sublimity joy which passed over his time-worn face, when he once told us that all his clothes, except the shoes, had belonged to various Bishops. Certainly the satisfaction was not occasioned by the exactness of the fit, as our Bishops do not all agree in size, and he had not been particularly lucky in securing this uniformity. However, such diversities were of small account with Old Mortality, and he said if "I only had a Bishop's shoes, my dress would be complete."

There was one question, and we believe almost the only one, which disturbed his mind. He felt a difficulty in determining "who should preach his funeral." We had the honor of being a rival, in this expected office, with the Rector of the Parish, in whose sweet and quiet churchyard the ashes of many of our old Friends' relatives were resting. This question never was settled, as he went to spend his last days with one of his children, far away from the spot where he had expected to lie down in peace, when life's weariness should be exchanged for the rest that remaineth for the people of God.

We have made this simple record in the humble hope that it may illustrate the blessedness with which Christian contentment lights up the darkest paths of earthly adversity. The cold earth may hide its wealth from us, but faith reveals the bright treasures of heaven to enrich our poverty, and Love in its guileless simplicity, wins the trusting heart to feel no present need in view of the promised inheritance. If Christians realized the worth of their future heritage, and trusted in its sure possession, each one could adopt the language of our ancient friend, and say at all times, "I am the happiest creature alive."

NEW YORK CHURCHMAN.

The new Editor has commenced his labors with an introductory address. From it we make the following extract, at the same time wishing him all prosperity in his important sphere of duty. The new Editor is ushered in with a complete array of new types, and the appearance of the paper is greatly improved thereby.

"Pursuant to the editorial notice in the last number of the Churchman, the new volume commences under other auspices. The honored name of Seabury, which for nearly sixteen years has been identified with this paper, no longer appears on its pages, and the undersigned regrets the necessity of the withdrawal in common with its numerous readers, and all good friends of the Church. They must no longer look for the consummate ability, the profound theology, the brilliant acumen, the massive intellectual strength which, for so many years, have adorned its columns, and diffused at once instruction and delight. The present writer can only hope that the sense of disappointment, which must for a time be sensibly felt, will be alleviated by the consideration that imperative circumstances demanded a change; and that the Vestry of the rapidly growing Parish of the Church of the Annunciation acted with a commendable foresight in calling for the withdrawal of their beloved Rector from the toils and anxieties of the editorial chair. May the holier and more peaceful duties of the Christian pastor be blest both to him who ministers and those who are ministered unto; and may each year as it passes bind Priest and people in closer and firmer bonds of faith, hope and charity.

His successor in this responsible office can safely say that it comes not to him by his own seeking. Gladly, had it been perfectly indifferent, would he have declined the task in favor of some other more competent. It seemed, however, to those in whose counsel and advice he placed great confidence, that it would be advisable for him, on various accounts not necessary here to be particularized, to fill the vacancy. If the experiment shall conduce to the prosperity of the paper, the gratification of its patrons, and in any measure to the welfare of the Church of which he is a minister, he will deem these results an ample recompense for the sacrifice of personal comfort and ease, and the assumption of much painful toil and anxiety. He undertakes the office untrammelled and unpledged to any particular course of conduct or teaching, save as his reason and conscience may dictate; if therefore he pursues the same theological system with his predecessor, and rejoices to tread in his footsteps, it is because he is well assured that that system is taught by the Word of God, and by that portion of the Church of Christ with which they happily are connected."

* * * * *

The CHURCHMAN will be published, as usual, at No. 12 John Street; and until farther notice, all communications upon business may be addressed, as heretofore, to DAVID HUBBELL HOYT, Esq., who has consented to continue, for the present, his superintendence of this department of the paper. Communications intended for the Editor, must be addressed to the Rev. WILLIAM WALTON, No. 12 John Street.

INFORMATION WANTED.

VIETTE DYER HILL, a lad 18 years of age, left the village of New Britain, Conn., on the 26th of April, 1848, and has not been heard of since. He is rather under the middle size, has a full face, florid complexion and light blue eyes. He had been accustomed to work in a Lock Factory.

Church papers will confer a favor on an excellent but deeply afflicted family in which the lad was an only son, by giving this notice an insertion. Any information addressed to the Editor of the Calendar, Hartford, Conn., will be gratefully received.

FLOATING CHURCH OF THE REDEEMER.

We have great pleasure in giving the following authentic account of the successful operations of this most important and interesting Mission.

For the Banner of the Cross.

MR. EDITOR:—

As I doubt not that it will interest your readers to learn what success so far, has attended the Seamen's Mission, I send you the following statement of facts.

The number of seamen present at divine service has been very encouraging. On Sunday 25th, the Communion was administered for the first time, and notwithstanding the inclemency of the weather, fifteen partook of the Sacrament, four of these were sailors, and seven the wives or widows of seamen. Several were prevented from being present by the rain. Three children of seamen have been baptized. The parents of all these have been hitherto members or attendants of the * * * * * but have now attached themselves to the Chapel. One adult, (a sailor,) has also been baptized, and will become a communicant. He has been a regular attendant at the chapel ever since it was opened. Mrs. T* a sailor's widow, fourteen years a member of another communion, never was in an Episcopal Church, until the chapel afforded her an opportunity. Won by the services, she begged for a prayer book, and has added her name to the list of communicants. Captain B——, also a * * * * * procured a prayer book, and promises on his return to become a member of the congregation. Several others of different persuasions have also expressed their great preference for our forms and liturgy, and are regular attendants in the Sanctuary. Many Episcopalians who had for years absented themselves from our communion, because they had no seats in any Church, and were too poor to pay for them, have returned to the fold. A sailor, (a Dane,) with his wife, a * * * * * have also connected themselves with the chapel. The husband unable to attend an Episcopal Church, would not commune any where else, from conscientious scruples, and his wife following his good example has been won to the Church. Through their influence their sister has brought her child to me for baptism. Another sailor, (a Swede,) who had been eight years in this country, had communed but twice (at the Floating Chapel in New York.) He is now a regular communicant at the chapel. On Sunday last I visited an old woman sixty-eight years of age, a sailor's widow. She was baptized and confirmed fifty years ago, but had strayed away from the Church. She had never become a communicant. Should her life be spared, she promises to be regular in her attendance at the chapel hereafter, and to receive the sacrament when next administered. Her daughter having been brought up among those by whom she was kept away from her Saviour in infancy, has grown up an alien from the commonwealth of Israel. Her husband is a * * * * *. Their five children have never been brought to the Saviour. I am to baptize the whole family, on their father's return from sea, and he promises whenever in port to attend the chapel services. An old woman seventy years of age, a sailor's widow, who for years has attended no place of worship, for want of the means of paying for a seat, and because once turned out of a pew, has also given me her name as a communicant. She was brought up in the Church.

I will not extend this article farther, though I might mention some other interesting particulars. From these few facts, it is evident that God is blessing our work. I am sure that no mission was ever undertaken, which affords a clearer field for extending the Church, and gathering stray sheep into her fold. May God grant His people grace to help in this undertaking. We cannot carry out our plans without pecuniary aid. Shall it be withheld? Shall the mission be sustained or not? The number of children whose fathers have been drowned at sea, is very great, many of them have no parents, but are dependent upon the charity of those whom their Heavenly Father has raised up as their guardians. Think of these poor little creatures, some of them most interesting girls—reared up in sailor boarding houses, exposed to every species of danger, and say shall not the Church do something towards gathering them under her fostering wings? Their anxiety generally to be admitted into a Sunday School is very great, but we cannot open the school until other claims are first attended to. Nearly $1000 still are due for the chapel furniture, organ, &c. That the benefit of the school will be great, may be concluded from this fact,—a prayer book was given to one of these children—it was the first one she had ever seen. She now knows nearly all her catechism. Let these facts encourage us to go on, and God's blessing shall be our reward.

Rev. M. T. T.

The above will serve as a strong enforcement to the following appeal.

For the Banner of the Cross.

FLOATING CHURCH MISSION.

The Board of Managers of the Churchmen's Missionary Association for Seamen, respectfully call attention to the peculiar position of their undertaking. They do not overrate its importance, by regarding it as secondary to no other Mission, whether considered in the light of the indebtedness of the whole community to seamen; or from the influence which it will exert in the spread of Christianity through the world, by religious seamen becoming, as it were, a host of missionaries, traversing every part of the globe, instead of their being a positive hindrance to the spread of the Gospel, as they now are. It is evident from a moment's consideration, that the establishment of this Mission must depend exclusively upon the generous contributions of our fellow Christians. Some of our parishes, associations, and many individuals have nobly contributed towards the construction of our Floating Church, and we heartily thank them for their offerings. But from the same considerations, it is clear that the Mission must still depend, and continue to depend, upon the same feeling of Christian sympathy, which established it. We have no other resources, can have no others; and with the knowledge of this fact in view at our commencement, we established membership of the association in the form of an annual payment for the purpose of sustaining the Mission.

The Board would now, therefore, earnestly solicit individuals to come forward and enrol their names as members of our Association. The extent of our community, and the limited circle of acquaintance of an individual, render it impracticable for the members of the Board to ascertain those who are favorable to their undertaking, and they have therefore adopted the present course to call forth all who are disposed to assist them in endeavoring to bring seamen into the fold of Christ, and to spread the Gospel through the world. Their hope is that several hundred members may be obtained. But as the number may not be sufficient for sustaining their effort, they urge it upon parishes, upon associations, and societies, to give us their assistance also.

The Board is reluctantly compelled to acknowledge that the question is now presented to the minds of churchmen in this community, whether this Mission, important as it is, shall be continued or suspended? and without prompt aid, the latter must certainly be the result.

Contributions, whether for membership, or otherwise, or the names and address of those desirous of becoming members, may be sent to the Treasurer, Mr. W. C. Kent, No. 146 North Third street, or may be handed to any member of the Board of Managers.

JAMES C. BOOTH, Vice President.

We have received the Journal of the Eleventh Convention of the Diocese of Florida. This Diocese is under the Episcopal charge of the Bishop of South Carolina.

"The Convention Sermon was preached by the Rev. C. C. ADAMS, Rector of St. Paul's church, Key West, and Missionary, from St. John, 4th chap., 24th verse: 'God is a Spirit: and they that worship him, must worship him in spirit and in truth.'

"After divine service, the Rev. J. J. SCOTT, the former Secretary, called the Convention to order.

"On motion, the Rev. Dr. RUTLEDGE was requested to take the chair."—afterwards Bishop of Florida

The following Resolution was adopted in reference to the Episcopate:

"Resolved, That a committee of seven, one layman from each of the churches of the Diocese now having an officiating Clergyman, be appointed by the President of the Convention to take into consideration the means of raising an Episcopate fund in the Diocese of Florida; and that the said committee report to the next annual Convention."

To which the committee on the state of the Church added the following:

"We cannot refrain, in conclusion, from expressing the strong sense which we feel of the need of the selection of a Bishop to preside over this portion of Christ's Church; and we earnestly recommend, that the Convention proceed to such election so soon as a sufficient number of Clergymen shall be canonically connected with the Diocese; and which event, we hope, may not be delayed beyond another year."

We rejoice to see, from the Journal, that this Diocese is steadily progressing.

We take the following from the Protestant Churchman.

CLERGY ABROAD.—A letter from Naples, dated January 23d, states that the Rev. Dr. Wainwright, with Mr. R. B. Minturn, of this city, expected to set out the next day for Jerusalem. The Rev. Messrs. Brown and Parks intended in a few days to visit Rome. Mr. Brown's health is improved, though not restored.

THE CHURCH IDENTIFIED.

This is the title of a Work, proposed to be published by Mr. J. Tiffany of Utica.

The author is the Rev. W. D. WILSON, Rector of Christ Church, Sherburne, Western New York. The substance of this work originally appeared in a series of articles in the New York Churchman. These articles attracted much attention, and were written with great force and ability. "The author's design was to identify the Protestant Episcopal Church in this country, with the Church of whose institution we read in the Scriptures, by a process of historic identification." A new argument for the Church is thus presented, which invests the subject with interest, and is likely to engage attention. Those who subscribe will have the work at a price which is not to exceed three shillings.

The profit on the copies sold in Western New York, is to be applied to Diocesan Missions. The profit on copies sold out of that Diocese is to be devoted to Domestic Missions.

The proposals may be found at the store of Mr. George S. Appleton, corner of Chesnut and Seventh street, where the book will also be for sale, when published. Those who desire the work should leave their names at once.

BOOKSTORE REMOVED.

MR. HERMAN HOOKER has removed his store to the corner of Chesnut and Eighth streets. In his new situation, Mr. H. will have a commodious place for business, and in a very central position. A large and complete assortment of the most approved Church books, will always be found here, at the usual prices. We hope Mr. H. will obtain an increased share of patronage in his new store, and will derive from his removal the advantage he may reasonably expect.

FILIAL DUTY: a Sermon, delivered in Trinity Church, Pittsburgh, on the first Sunday after Christmas, December 31st, 1848. By George Upfold, D. D., the Rector. Published by request of several parents of the congregation.

This sermon, the text of which is found in St. Luke ii. 51, treats a most important subject in a manner most likely to impress the wise lessons inculcated. The leading object of the discourse is to show "that filial obedience is to be rendered in thought, in word, and in deed."

No more important practical subject can engage the thoughtful attention of the Christian Minister than this. From the violation of this duty flow many of the evils by which the good order and peace of society are disturbed, and in just observance of it, manifold blessings, both present and future, shall be secured.

The Wisdom of the Great Lawgiver has made the enactment which concerns this duty "the first commandment with promise." And surely all experience shows that an undutiful child will make neither a good citizen nor neighbour, and discharge not his duty either to God or man. Those who forget the honour due to earthly Parents, will not reverence their Father in heaven. We hope this admirable discourse may be widely circulated, for we are sure it will prove a blessing wherever its wise lessons are duly followed. In another column an extract from it may be found, for which we ask the attention of our readers.

THE WEEKLY EUCHARIST. No. IV. of Pastoral Tracts: printed chiefly for the Members of the Church of the Holy Communion.

The Reverend Author of this Tract, presents to the Parishioners of the Church of the Holy Communion his views of their duty in this particular case. After showing that "the Liturgy Proper" is that part of the Prayer Book called the "Order for the administration of the Lord's Supper, or Holy Communion," he discusses the following points.

1. The Weekly Celebration of the Eucharist contemplated and provided for, but not made obligatory.
2. The Weekly Eucharist desirable.
3. The Chief Objection to the constant celebration of the Eucharist.
4. The objection answered.
5. Advantages of the Weekly Celebration.
6. A practical question answered.
7. Counsel in regard to more frequent communion.
8. Effects of Custom.
9. The Sunday Eucharist.

These various points are discoursed upon in a plain, earnest, and forcible manner. If any are disposed to think that the advocates of frequent communions are disposed to detract from the holy and solemn character of this observance, we beg they will read the Rev. Dr. Muhlenbergh's Tract on the Weekly Eucharist.

The moderate tone and prudent manner in which this subject is treated, are especially to be noted. It is a practical question, concerning which there is diversity of opinion among the soundest Churchmen. It is therefore a proof of wisdom to respect the liberty which the Church allows in this matter, and not to condemn those whose practice differs from our own. This is the wise course pursued in the Tract we are noticing. Of this characteristic the following extract is an illustration.

"Our Communion office, like the old Liturgies after which it is modelled, provides, of course, for the administration on all the Sundays and Holy days of the year. This appears from the series of collects, epistles, and gospels, and the proper preface for the greater festivals and their octaves, as well as from intimations to that effect in the rubric. But while this continual celebration is thus contemplated, it is not made binding. Indeed, the case is supposed of there being no celebration, and directions are given to the Minister in what way he shall then proceed. The fathers of our branch of the Church have thus made provision for our worship on Sundays, without the consummating act of the Lord's Supper. The latter, as invariable they do not require, but they evidently recommend it. It might be shown that the Reformers desired it, but as a constant service they did not ordain it. They made no imperative rule on the subject. To those who have authority in the Lord's House, they have left to determine, from time to time, how often in that house His Table shall be spread. They did not regard the weekly practice of the early Christians as in itself binding in the matter, recollecting the difference of circumstances. The frequency of the Eucharist is a question of expediency, which Ministers and congregations must solve for themselves;—they must use their discretion, but within those limits which are assigned by the nature and object of the Institution."

REPORT OF THE PENNSYLVANIA HOSPITAL FOR THE INSANE, for the year 1848. By Thomas Kirkbride, M. D., Physician to the Institution. Published by order of the Board of Managers. Philadelphia, 1849.

TWENTY-FIRST ANNUAL REPORT of the President and Directors of the Western Asylum, to the Legislature of Virginia, with the Report of the Superintendent and Physician for 1848.

We have read these two reports with the deepest interest, and although they relate to a melancholy subject, we have derived pleasure from their perusal. Institutions like these are the monuments of the progress of our day in real philanthropy. The manner in which this unfortunate class of our fellow-beings are now treated, is a marked contrast to the cruelties once practised upon them. They have now been found to be within the reach of religious and moral influences, and these gentler restraints are happily exchanged for the scourge, the chain, and the dungeon.

In Dr. Kirkbride's Report there is an interesting account of a MUSEUM AND READING ROOM, lately erected and opened for the use of the inmates. A course of Lectures has been delivered therein, from which good effects have resulted. This is in truth a noble Institution, combining every advantage that situation, extensive and beautiful grounds, and admirable internal arrangement and discipline can confer. The benefits conferred by it may be estimated by the fact that 5,647 patients have been received since the foundation.

The State Asylum of Virginia seems also to be an admirable Institution. It has received 696 patients since 1828. Both these Reports contain most valuable statistics. We have read, with deep interest, those relating to the supposed causes of Insanity. Important lessons may be gathered from these. Indeed, no one, of any religious sensibility, can read such sad reports without a feeling of devout thankfulness to the Gracious Being who alone can save us from such affliction.

FRIENDS AND FORTUNE. A Moral Tale. By Anna Harriet Drury. Republished by the Messrs. Appletons.

This is a most interesting book, and withal likely to impress good and useful lessons. We like it the more because the teachings flow rather from the unfolding of the story, than from long and prosy didactic sermons delivered by private preachers of both sexes. The plot belongs too much to the melodramatic order, and certainly the heroine takes rather an immoral method (by acting a falsehood) of arriving at a proper conclusion for "a moral Tale." But for all that, we like the book. The characters are not exaggerated specimens either of goodness or wickedness, and are the kind of people you might meet with on earth.

We have another reason for our partiality to this Work. We were fortunate in having it for a companion in a six hours detention on the Rail Road by an untoward accident. The desolate pine wastes of Jersey, a dreary day of storm and rain, and grumbling fellow passengers, were not the accidents for comfort. But thanks to "Friends and Fortune," all were for a while forgotten. Therefore, with good cause, we like the book. The (London) Guardian furnishes the following abstract of the story;—

"Although there was considerable merit in Annesley, Miss

Drury seems to us more at home as a prose writer; and the pages before us show that she possesses so much good sense, feeling, and information, as to make her a very welcome addition to our list of lady authors. Friends and Fortune is both interesting and amusing, notwithstanding the alarming epithet which frowns from its title page; the lesson it is meant to teach is not the less valuable for having been taught before, nor the method employed less efficient for being simple and plain. The heroine of the tale is a Miss Armadale, a rich young orphan, who, tired of the adulation which worships her wealth, and not herself, plays some worldly-minded relations who have never seen her the trick of visiting them in the disguise of her own companion: forcing the latter lady to consent to personate the heiress herself. When once 'in for it,' she carried the deception on with much spirit, although she finds it far from agreeable, within a very short time from her arrival in the country; and she finds herself taught, not only by the humiliations and slights to which she is exposed from most of her relations, quite as much as she wishes to know of their character, but also a good deal more than she expected about her own, and the responsibilities and duties of her station and influence, to which, with a good but unregulated heart, she had hitherto been blind. Much of this good teaching comes from the vicar of the parish, and his daughter, Mary Leyden, both of them pleasing and happy delineations. In the end, the young lady finds herself in an awkward predicament; one of her cousins, whose jealousy she has aroused by unwittingly seducing from her side a not very interesting young baronet, leagues with one of the servants against her; and, by secreting themselves in (the false) Miss Armadale's room, they are enabled to catch the true heiress very suspiciously engaged over the letters addressed to her by her right name, and apparently to convict her of felony by seeing her sign a cheque in the same character. Miss Drury, we may observe, is somewhat melodramatic; this tragical Miss Theodosia, for instance, might have been dispensed with, as well as the scene in the ruined tower, where the heiress saves the life of a young gentleman who is too poetical to keep himself from tumbling over rickety balustrades, in imitation of a love-lorn lady whose story he is relating. Of course, the charge of felony ends in the confusion of Miss Theodosia, and most members of her family besides, for the father and mother have behaved to the poor companion—as most such people do; one of the young gentlemen has proposed to the fictitious heiress, (who suffers as much as any one from her friend's whim,) and only two of the party have paid any civility to the true Miss Armadale. One of these, the poetical youth just mentioned, is rewarded by the hand and heart of the lady, who purchases the manor and great house of the place, and settles five hundred a year upon the vicar's daughter, who is thus enabled to marry the other of the brothers, who proved, in some respects, superior to his family. And, to make up the proper number of marriages, if we remember right, it is intimated that the good vicar himself has some notions of placing the "companion" at the head of his establishment, after his daughter's departure.

This groundwork certainly shows an unsparing use of common materials enough, nor can the characters introduced claim much originality. But there are more important things even than ingenuity of plot and invention of character; at least, those are not always requisite to make a work of fiction agreeable, much less to secure its usefulness. Miss Drury—led, perhaps, by some flattering criticism on Annesley, which we see collected, at the end of this volume, in almost every one of which she is compared to Goldsmith—has evidently wished to produce a work of that class at the head of which the Vicar of Wakefield will ever remain. Simple and easily comprehended characters, natural and common incidents, appealing to universal sympathies and emotions,—these are what constitute the charm of compositions of this kind. An attempt in this manner deserves encouragement, even were it far less successful than the present one, because the less imitable excellencies of Miss Austen seem at present to be the ideal placed before their own eyes by too many writers of our day, whose nature does not fit them for productions in the peculiar style of that gifted person."

A WINTER-VISIT TO NIAGARA.

DEAR MR. EDITOR:—

The great cataract is an hackneyed theme; but I do not remember to have ever met with a description of its appearance at this season of frost and snow. During the summer months the large hotels of the little village hard by are filled to overflowing, with an host of sight-seers and pleasure-seekers. And the pen of the tourist and the pencil of the artist, are both daily busied in the attempt to describe or portray its grandeur. But long ere winter has set in, the thronging multitude has departed; and few and far between are the travellers who come to gaze upon the wonders of Niagara.

I had visited Niagara at midsummer, but, knowing the effect of a change of costume upon appearance, having seen her in her livery of green, I had long entertained a desire to look upon her arrayed in white. And now, after the sight, I do not hesitate to say, that the winter scene is transcendently grand.

I left Buffalo, with a small party of friends, upon a clear, cold morning, by rail-road, and in about an hour and an half reached the "Falls." Here we found a sleigh in readiness for us, and proceeded first to visit the famed Suspension-bridge, about two miles below. It is a beautiful structure—light, and airy enough certainly—yet sufficiently strong. Its length is seven hundred and fifty-nine feet between the towers over which the wire cables pass. And its height above the water, which flows beneath at the rate of twenty-one miles an hour, is two hundred and thirty feet. It is wide enough to allow a carriage to pass over it, and has a wooden fence, of parallel bars, at the sides, to the height of about four feet. As we first entered upon it, it bent beneath us at each step with a very perceptible motion; but as we approached the centre it gradually became more steady. After we had been upon it a few minutes, I found myself leaning very composedly over the railing, looking at the rapids beneath. Mr. B—— the intelligent and gentlemanly superintendent of the bridge, informed me, that what from our elevation seemed but little more than ripples upon the river's surface, were in some instances falls of ten feet in height. At his request, one of the workmen brought on an armful of large stones, which he cast singly from the bridge. One of these, although about fifteen inches square, seemed less than my fist by the time it had reached the water.

Having walked to the Canadian shore, we then recrossed the bridge. As we were about taking our departure, a sleigh drawn by two horses safely crossed the mid-air structure. From the bridge a distant view of the Falls may be had; but it is too picture-like for our taste; being in a great measure deprived of that essential element motion: the lack of which, renders every attempt to convey an adequate idea of Niagara upon canvass unsuccessful. A little further down the river is a phenomenon, which for a while it puzzled the people of the neighborhood to explain. A smaller body of water, it was ascertained, passed at that point than above. This led to a closer examination of the matter, and the solution of the difficulty was, that there was another channel, beneath the bed of the river, through which a part of its waters were discharged. A confirmation of this theory, was found in the fact, that for some distance trees and other objects were never seen floating upon the surface of the river, as above; but uniformly vanished from sight at a certain spot, and reappeared farther down the stream; and below the place of their reappearance, the bulk of water passing was the same as above the mouth of this subterraneous passage.

From the bridge we rode to the stairway leading towards the foot of the American Fall. About half-way down this long stairway, we passed out by a doorway on to a narrow shelf projecting from the precipitous wall of rock which forms the river's bank. But the snow was covered with a slight coating of thin ice, very smooth, which rendered it impracticable to approach very near to the Fall in this direction. We therefore retraced our way, and descended to the bottom of the steps. Here we found the earth and rocks in like manner covered with ice. The spray from the Fall, freezing as it fell, had converted little hillocks into miniature mountains, in some instances very steep. But though the way was difficult, with ordinary prudence, it was not at all dangerous. And we clambered over these hills of snow and ice till we came so close to the Fall, that its spray was descending upon us in showers. The view from this spot we have always thought one of the best for the proper appreciation of the magnitude of the Fall. Looking upward, the vast body of water is seen tumbling down, as if ready to overwhelm you. The earth seems to tremble and quiver with its descending force. And the roar of its mighty flood is really deafening.

Having made the weary ascent of the more than three hundred steps, we next wended our way to the Island. As we were crossing the bridge over the first rapid, our guide pointed out to us the course of the poor wretch who perished here last year. As he passed beneath the bridge on which we were standing, he cried to some persons who were then upon it, "what shall I do? Shall I cling to the boat, or jump from it?"

The mad water hurried him away before an answer could be given, even had they known what to recommend. His boat in another moment struck upon a ledge of rocks, with such force as to hurl him from it to a considerable distance. It stuck there for a week or more afterwards—but the man, swept away by the terrific current, was no more seen.

Having reached Goat Island, we directed our steps to that bold promontory upon the American side known as the Hog's Back. Carefully descending the slippery path, we crossed the little bridge to Lunar Island. Nothing could surpass the beauty of the trees in this vicinity. The spray, wafted in this direction by the wind, and congealing upon every object upon which it fell, had covered even the minutest twigs with a semi-translucent ice, of intense whiteness; making the woods appear like a forest of alabaster. Shapes grotesque and beautiful every where met the eye. From amid the boughs, faces of little laughing cherubs, the sculpturings of nature from this whiter than Parian marble, were looking down upon us. Yonder tree was surmounted by a perfectly formed cross. Here a cedar presented to us its branches on one side covered with exquisite frost-work, and on the other were its blue berries and green leaves beautifully blended with the pearly ice. We plucked a small branch; and as we playfully decorated therewith the bonnet of Mrs. B—— it was unanimously declared, that no plume, or artificial wreath could rival its elegance.

We turned from the grove to look down upon the Fall. We were within a few feet of the place at which the mighty torrent makes its headlong leap. The ledge of rocks in front of this side of the American Fall had, by the constant accumulation of ice, been so increased in bulk, that it now reached nearly two thirds of the way to the top of the Fall. And from the awful gulph between, a cloud of spray was rolling upward; which, floating low in the cold air, extended more than a mile away. The sun was shining brightly. And in the midst of the rising vapour, a rainbow of great beauty was spanning the river from shore to shore. Not a word was uttered as we stood gazing upon this glorious spectacle. For it seemed as if the Mighty Architect himself were very near, as we looked upon the magnificence of His works. To me, every thing I saw was eloquent of Him.

Next, thoughts of the symbolism of nature began to take possession of my soul. And then the mighty flood, pouring its ceaseless tide, appeared to be a sign of Holy Baptism; and to flow from Him "who hath measured the waters in the hollow of his hand." The snowy garment wherewith the earth was clad, reminded me of the white robes worn by the candidates in olden time; so beautifully typifying the efficacy of the Baptismal water to "wash away" sin, and that inward purity which they must ever strive to attain who would "see God." And the bright bow above was the sign of reconciliation, and the symbol of Him in whose name we are regenerated. For,

"Holy light;

Offspring of heaven's first dawn," when thus analyzed, is found to consist of three colours—red, blue, and yellow; the others being mere combinations of these primary ones. And yet these three blended form a white or colourless ray—Trinity in Unity.

Reluctantly we turned our backs upon the scene, and proceeded next to visit the Horse-Shoe Fall. There was not a single foot print upon the declivity leading to the narrow causeway and bridges by which Tower-Rock is approached. But, unwilling to miss the fine view of the Fall and rapids to be enjoyed from the tower, we determined to make the attempt to reach it. We got along pretty well until we came to the last narrow bridge before the rock on which the tower stands is gained, by breaking the icy crust upon the snow before us as we went. But here we found the ice, from its more exposed position, so thick as to resist all our attempts to break it. The spray falling upon it and freezing, had made its surface slightly arched from side to side: So that the only safe footing was along the central ridge. The bridge is open at the sides, with the exception of a single low hand-rail; which could only be reached, by one in the middle, by stooping considerably. While underneath rolled on an irresistible torrent towards the edge of the Fall close by.

However, curiosity got the better of prudence, and on we went. And richly were we repaid for the venture. The stones of the tower, covered with frozen spray, made it resemble a gigantic piece of carving; the delicacy of which art could hardly equal. Ascending the spiral staircase, we stood upon the outside gallery at the top, and looked down upon the scene below. From above, as far as the eye could reach, the river came rushing on, like an herd of wild horses, dashing along at the top of their speed, and tossing their white manes in the air. As it neared the edge of the Fall it seemed for a moment to recoil, "the floods lifted up their voice, they lifted up their waves" as though imploring help. And then down—down they went, with thundering sound into the deep abyss.

'Twas a beautiful sight, as we stood here, to behold how the fierce agitation of the waters above was for a moment stilled, as they first bent to fall—appearing like an emerald diadem upon Niagara's smooth brow. A little way below, spots of feathery spray would appear. And, a little further down, was one vast sheet of white foam precipitating itself into its vapoury bed.

But time forbade us to linger. And we began carefully to retrace our perilous way to the island; and thence to the village. February, 1849.

CRANMER.

Mr. Macaulay, in his attractive work, the History of England, has thought fit not only to asperse the character of Cranmer, but also to lay to his charge the most degrading notions of the Church of God. He seems to have gathered all his information concerning the Archbishop, from Bishop Burnet, a writer described as "loose in his style, and looser in his statements," and certainly as much of a time-server, and as great a tool of royalty as ever Cranmer was. The learning and skill of Cranmer are ably vindicated against the calumnies of Burnet, by Dr. Lawrence in his Bampton lectures. With regard to his views of the nature of the Church, and of church doctrine, it is well known that they underwent a material change during the course of his ministry, and for this change, as an impartial historian, Mr. Macaulay should have given him credit.

While just emerging from the black abyss of Romanism, it was to be supposed that he would be so dazzled with the light, as to fail in a proper discrimination. When, however, his senses became exercised to discern true from false, we find him inculcating sound opinions upon the main articles of the faith, once delivered to the saints.

Whether he held the sentiments concerning the Church, attributed to him, by Mr. Macaulay, upon the authority of Bishop Burnet, it matters not. We are only concerned to know what he did hold when he had made his deepest investigations, and his opinions had arrived at their full maturity. I therefore extract from his "Sermon on the Keys" from which it will be seen that our great Reformer was not so utterly Erastian, as the Scotch historian would have us believe.

"Now good children, that you may the better understand these words of our Saviour Christ, you shall know that our Lord Jesus Christ, when he began to preach, did call and choose his twelve Apostles; and afterwards besides these twelve he sent forth three score and ten disciples, and gave them authority to preach the Gospel. And a little before his death, he made his prayer to his heavenly Father for them, and for all those who should believe through his preaching, as it is declared in the Gospel of St. John. Now it is not to be doubted but that Christ's prayer was heard of His heavenly Father; wherefore it followeth that as many as believed the preaching of Christ's disciples were as surely saved, as if they had heard and believed the preaching of Christ himself. And after Christ's ascension, the Apostles gave authority to other godly and holy men, to minister God's word, and chiefly in those places where there were Christian men already, which lacked preachers, and the Apostles themselves could no longer abide with them; for the Apostles did walk abroad into divers parts of the world, and did study to plant the Gospel in many places. Wherefore, where they found godly men, and meet to preach God's word they laid their hands upon them, and gave them the Holy Ghost, as they themselves received of Christ, the same Holy Ghost, to execute this office.

"And they that were so ordained were indeed, and also were called, the ministers of God, as the Apostles themselves were, as St. Paul saith unto Timothy. And so the ministration of God's word (which our Lord Jesus Christ did himself institute) was derived from the Apostles unto others after them, by imposition of hands and giving of the Holy Ghost from the Apostles' time to our days. And this was the consecration and unction of the Apostles, whereby they at the beginning made bishops and priests; and this shall continue in the church even to the world's end.

"Wherefore, good children, you shall give due reverence and honour to the ministers of the Church, and shall not meanly or lightly esteem them in the execution of their office, but you shall take them for God's ministers, and the messengers of our Lord Jesus Christ, for Christ himself saith in the Gospel, "He that heareth you, heareth me, and he that despiseth you, despiseth me." Therefore, good children, you shall steadfastly believe all those things which such ministers shall speak unto you from the mouth, and by the commandment of our Lord Jesus Christ. And whatsoever they do to you, when they give you absolution, and distribute to you the body and blood of our Lord Jesus Christ, these ye shall so esteem as if Christ himself, in his own person, did speak, and minister unto you; for Christ hath commanded his ministers to do this unto you, and he himself (although you see him not with your bodily eyes) is present with his ministers, and worketh by the Holy Ghost in the administration of His sacraments.

"And on the other side, ye shall take good heed, and beware of false and privy teachers, which privily creep into cities, and preach in corners, having none authority, nor being called to this office; for Christ is not present with such preachers, and, therefore, doth not the Holy Ghost work by their preaching; but their word is without fruit or profit, and they do great hurt in commonwealths; for such as be not called of God, they no doubt of it do err, and send abroad heresy and naughty doctrine."

It will be seen from the above that the Archbishop held the doctrines of the Apostolic succession, as now inculcated by the Church, and that whatever he might once have said through a blind subserviency to Henry VIII, he did not neglect to embrace, and hold fast the belief, that the Church is a divine institution, and not the creature of princes.

MISSIONARY OFFERINGS OF THE POOR.

An interesting missionary meeting, in aid of the London Missionary Society, was lately held at Cannock, in Staffordshire. The following is an extract from one of the speeches delivered upon that occasion, by a native of the Principality of Wales:

"Within twelve miles of this platform, there lives a poor lame man. He is single, earns 13s. a week, and is a member of a sick club. Moreover, he is a simple and affectionate disciple of the Saviour. If you were to visit the engine-house where he works, you would always see one thing there, namely, his Bible. Two or three years ago, this poor lame man became deeply interested in the case of the heathen, who are ready to perish! Now and then he would give his minister 2s. 6d. for the missions. The minister once said to him, 'Are you sure you can afford these half crowns?' He replied to the effect, that if he could not live honestly without them, he would keep them. 'But say nothing,' continued he, muttering as he limped away, and looking up to heaven, 'it's between Him and me.' Last year the minister gave him a missionary-box. Sometimes he was seen going about with this box under his arm. But he obtained little in that way: most of what his missionary-box produced, he put in himself, out of his own hard earnings. And how much will the meeting suppose this poor lame man's missionary-box had in it when it came to be opened last Lord's day? 7l. 16s. 6d."

THE HAPPY COMMUNICANT.

By the Rev. John James, D. D. (Rivingtons, London, 1849, pp. 48. A nice little story, very suitable to be put into the hands of well-disposed persons, who, from timidity, and similar causes, have hitherto abstained from receiving the Holy Communion. The following anecdote is pleasing:—English Churchman.

"A very interesting and affecting circumstance, in confirmation of what Richard called 'his experience among folk in foreign parts,' was not long since communicated to me by a valued friend, one of our Clergy there. The fact indicates the deep value which the scattered flock of Christ in those distant lands have for the holy ordinances of Christ's Church. The post of duty which my friend fills is at Cape Breton, an island nearly intersected throughout its extreme length by an arm of the sea, the waters of which, in some places many miles across, are often rendered dangerous by the counter-currents which set in from the irregularities of the two shores. No difficulties, however, were sufficient to deter a family under his pastoral charge, but living on the opposite shore to his own residence, from availing themselves of his ministry on behalf of their infant child, whom, with all the strength of Christian parents' love, they were fain should be admitted into the fold of Christ by the appointed door of Holy Baptism, administered according to the command of their blessed Lord and Saviour, and by a duly commissioned steward of his mysteries. The constant daily and widely extended duties of this Clergyman did not permit him to go to their dwelling, at the time which they had fixed for the baptism of their child: but they all had a good heart to the work, and a good heart found means of attaining the benefit sought. The difficulty was overcome thus. Upon a certain day, fixed for the purpose, they and their Clergyman, each party setting out from their own shore at the same hour, and after long tossing on the waves, met midway on the wide waters; the boats were lashed together; the baptismal service was reverently performed; the child was entered into covenant with God, according to Christ's ordinance; the parents' hearts rejoiced in the blessing; and though the deep waters, as they rolled around them, too much resembled the waves of that troublesome world on which their loved child was launched, yet faith in the great Being, who holds those waters in the hollow of his hand, removed their fears, and sustained their hopes. They trusted that the same Being would control also the angry strivings and fierce temptations of the moral world; and that their loved little one, now regenerate as one of the children of God, would, by divine grace, continue His forever, daily increasing in God's Holy Spirit more and more, and coming at last to His heavenly kingdom; through Jesus Christ the Redeemer.

Shall we prize the most comfortable Sacrament of the body and blood of Christ, whereby our spiritual life is renewed, less than these wise parents prized that Sacrament, whereby spiritual life is first conveyed? Let it not be so with those who love Him who is alike the Author and the Preserver of that life!"

CHANGES IN THE CLIMATE OF EUROPE.—Those who have read the ancients with attention, conclude that the degrees of cold are at this time much less severe than they were formerly. The rivers in Gaul, namely, the Loire and the Rhone, were regularly frozen over every year, so that frequently whole armies, with their carriages and baggage, could march over them. Even the Tiber froze at Rome; and Juvenal says positively, that it was requisite to break the ice in winter, in order to come at the water of the river. Many passages in Horace suppose the streets of Rome to be full of ice and snow. Ovid assures us that the Black Sea was frozen annually, and appeals for the truth of this to the governor of the province, whose name he mentions. He also relates several circumstances concerning that climate, which at present agree only with Norway and Sweden. The forests of Thrace and Pannonia were full of bears and wild boars, in like manner as now the forests of the north. The northern part of Spain was little inhabited for the same cause. In short, all the ancients who mention the climate of Gaul, Germany, Pannonia, and Thrace, speak of it as insupportable, and agree that the ground was covered with snow the greatest part of the year, being incapable of producing olives, grapes, and most other fruits. It is easy to conceive that the forest being cleared away, the face of the country cultivated, and the marshy places drained, the moist exhalations which generate cold must be considerably lessened, and that the rays of the sun must have a freer access to warm the earth. The same thing has happened in North America, since the Europeans have carried there their accustomed industry. The history of the North leaves us no room to doubt that there have been vast forests cut down, and by this single means extensive marshes have been dried up, and converted into land fit for cultivation. Without mentioning the general causes which insensibly effect the destruction of forests, it was common to set these on fire, in order to procure fertile fields. A king of Sweden was surnamed the Wood-cutter, for having grubbed up and cleared vast provinces, and felled the trees with which it was covered. Nor were they less cleared away in Norway and Denmark. Thus a change in the climate must long have preceded that in the manners.—Mallet's Northern Antiquities.—Bohn's Antiquarian Library.

THE HOLY SPIRIT.—The Spirit is not had upon courtesy of man's will, but by the overpowering of God's grace. The chief way of the working of the Spirit is to work faith and love, and to build up Christians by faith and love.—Lightfoot.

"Let no man hope to glorify God and go to heaven by a life of sufferings, unless he first begin in the love of God, and from thence derive, his choice, his patience, and confidence in the causes of virtue, and religion, like beams, and warmth, and influence from the body of the sun."—Bishop Taylor.

"Adam was placed in a garden of health and pleasure, from which when he fell, he was only tied to enter into the covenant of natural sorrows, which he and all his posterity till the flood ran through."—Ib.

NORTH CAROLINA.

The Bishop of the Diocese has officiated as follows, since the last report.

The 1st Sunday in Lent the Bishop was at Trinity school, near Raleigh. This Institution, though just arising, through many discouragements, out of a feeble infancy, is in an interesting state. While the classical education is conducted with proper energy, a deep religious influence seems to control the hearts and conduct of the pupils, and to give promise to parents of a real Church-school for their children. While there, the Bishop confirmed five persons—three of them belonging to the Institution—and placed others under a due course of training for that holy rite.

On the following Wednesday, (Ember Day,) in Christ Church, Raleigh, the Bishop admitted to the holy order of deacons Thomas F. Davis, Jr.; the Rector of the Church, the Rev. Dr. Mason, assisting in the services.

The next day, March 1st, visited St. Mary's School, Raleigh, and confirmed sixteen persons. The Rector, with the Rev. Mr. Benton, from Rock Fish, assisted in the services. This interesting Institution is in a highly flourishing condition, and is deserving of the fullest confidence and patronage of christian parents.

ST. MARK'S CHURCH, PHILADELPHIA.

The above cut gives a tolerable idea of this beautiful Church edifice. The artist in reducing the engraving to the present size, has taken some unwarrantable liberties with many of the details in the copy, and especially with the elegant tracery of the windows, for which he has substituted some rather unmeaning design of his own.

The Church edifice is built of free stone, from Trenton, Newark, Little Falls, and Thorn Quarries, in the decorated style, which prevailed in the last quarter of the thirteenth, and first of the fourteenth centuries; a period when it may be said Gothic architecture—so called—attained its highest point of graceful proportion and luxuriant beauty.

The Churches of this period are distinguished for their fine proportions, and beauty of interior effect; and the style is valued by the architect for its fine forms of adaptation to sacred edifices of every size and cost, from the parish church of the simplest and least expensive class, to the most gorgeous cathedral.

This Church edifice is situated on the north side of Locust street west of Schuylkill 7th street, and the length of the church east and west, is 150 feet, in all, over the buttresses. The tower is on the south side, near the west end, attached to the aisle wall, projecting all its size, and makes the breadth at this point 91 feet. The tower is nearly on the line of houses on Locust street; standing in the middle of the square, advanced from the church, it becomes the most important feature in the street view, and is treated accordingly. Its whole beautiful outline, from base to finial, seen at a glance—all of stone—is not a common object in our streets. The plan is thus made to suit the site—the tower is in the position of the south porch, for which its first stage is to be used, through it is the principal entrance by a deeply recessed and richly moulded door-way, ornamented with foliated shafts in the jambs. The windows of the aisles and clerestory, on the flank, are of two lights, or parts divided by mullions of stone, which is foliated in the arch showing different patterns: the windows have moulded worked stone jambs.

The church comprises a chancel, a nave and aisles—an organ or choir aisle, with a convenient vestry. The interior is 138 feet in length, 56 feet wide, and 54 feet high. The chancel is 38 feet deep, 23 feet 6 inches wide, and will be built, to show the interior, of cut stone. The floor is to be paved with encaustic tiles, and rises as it recedes from the church towards the east end in four steps to the altar. The window over the altar is of five lights, and will be glazed with painted glass of subject design. The nave is 28 feet wide, and 100 feet long. The north and south aisles are each 14 feet wide by 100 in length. The division is in seven bays on each side, the piers and arches are of cut stone, supporting the clerestory, with bracket shafts between each window for the roof timbers. The roof is open timbered, framed of oak, with hammer and collar beams moulded, the whole construction being visible. The chancel has a polygonal ceiling of oak, divided into panels. The organ aisle is a continuation of the north aisle, with an arch open to the chancel. The seats will all be of oak and will be open, of suitable design. The windows are to be glazed in quarries set in lead, having borders of colored glass. The windows of the west end are not the least important. The great window is of four lights, and those of the aisles have three lights each. From their position to the street, they will be richly worked—a small porch entrance is under the large window, and another door on the north side opposite to that, through the tower. The vestry and chancel have each their entrance door. The tower is square built, with buttresses to the height of 80 feet from the base. It is then resolved into an octagon spire 90 feet high, broached on the angles, with three tier of spire lights alternating. The belfry has coupled windows on each face. The spire is terminated with finial and cross. The gables are to be decorated at the apex with handsome ornamental crosses, and a neat crest tile is carried on the ridges of the roof.

Another unusual feature in this church is, that neither paint nor plaster are to be used for its construction, the inside walls being all lined with stone, and all the wood work is to be of solid oak. Neither was the church edifice built by subscription; a few churchmen (not more than five or six,) advanced the necessary funds to complete it, with the exception of the tower and spire. Their contract with the architect is $30 000, including the entire completion of the building and appurtenances, excepting the organ.

NEW YORK.

Episcopal acts by the Bishop of Maryland, acting by the request of the Standing Committee of the Diocese of New York.

First Sunday in Lent, Feb. 25; morning, in Emmanuel Church, New York, confirmed 15 persons. Afternoon, in St. Luke's Church, Brooklyn, confirmed 13. Evening, in Calvary Church, Brooklyn, confirmed 45.

Friday, March 2; St. Mark's Church, Williamsburgh, confirmed 15, (including one sick person in private.)

Second Sunday in Lent, P. M.; confirmed 13 in St. Philip's Church. Evening, 22 in the Church of the Epiphany.

An Ordination was held on Sunday morning last, one of "the stated times," by the Bishop of Maryland, acting for this Diocese, in Trinity Church, in this city, when the Rev. Cornelius R. Duffie, John C. Sterling, and Henry B. Bartow, Deacons, were admitted to the Holy Order of Priests, and Mr. Henry Norman Hudson, and Mr. Alonzo G. Shears, lately a minister among the Methodists, were ordained Deacons. Morning Prayer was said by the Rev. Benj. I. Haight, D. D., and the Rev. Mr. Walton. The Sermon was preached by Bishop Whittingham. Mr. Walton presented the Candidate for the Diaconate, and Dr. Haight those for the Priesthood.

The Bishop, having spent the last two months in this city and vicinity, returned this week to Baltimore. We understand that on this and his previous visit, he has confirmed over Four Hundred Persons. He returns in June, when he is expected to visit some of the Country Parishes.—Churchman.

WESTERN NEW YORK.

ORDINATION.—The Lenten Ordination was held on the 4th of March, by Bishop DeLancey in St. Paul's Church, Syracuse. Prayers were read by the Rev. Mr. Ashley, Rector of the Church, and the sermon was preached by the Bishop. The two Candidates for Priests' orders, the Rev. James Radcliff Davenport, Deacon, Missionary at Liverpool, and the Rev. Spencer Marcus Rice, Deacon, Missionary at Jordan and Marcellus, were presented by the Rev. Dr. Gregory of St. James Church, Syracuse, who with the Rev. Mr. Ashley, united in the imposition of hands. The Bishop administered the holy communion, assisted in the distribution of the elements by the Rev. Messrs. Gregory and Ashley.

In the afternoon the Bishop preached in the Church of the Ascension at Liverpool. Prayers were read by the Rev. Mr. Davenport, the Missionary of the station. Large congregations attended these services.—Gospel Messenger.

CONNECTICUT.

The Rt. Rev. Bishop of Connecticut upon the ordination Sunday in Lent, held an ordination and a confirmation in Christ Church at Middletown. During the morning services, Mr. John Woodbridge Birchmore was admitted to the holy order of Deacons. The candidate was presented by Rev. Dr. Jarvis, with whom he has passed his time of preparation, and who preached the ordination sermon. The discourse was upon the passage from St. Paul's 1st Epistle to Timothy, "Holding the mystery of the faith in a pure conscience." The author's name is a sufficient voucher for the excellence of the "exhortation," the interest of which was not diminished by the previous relation of teacher and pupil.

After Evening Prayer, 16 persons received the apostolic rite of confirmation; making the number of those who have renewed the vows of baptism, 28 in that parish, during the last nine months. The services appeared to excite deep interest in the congregation; the number of communicants was unusually large, and the many confirmed show the increase, which has rewarded the faithful planting and watering of the excellent pastor of that flourishing parish.—Calendar.

MACAULAY'S HISTORY OF ENGLAND.

We must pass rapidly over the brief sketch given of the Great Rebellion. Charles, as might be anticipated, receives no favour at Mr. Macaulay's hands. But one circumstance must certainly excite surprise. Cruelty and oppression are stigmatised throughout this work, with that withering indignation to which Mr. Macaulay knows so perfectly how to give expression, and with all that pathos with which his unrivalled mastery of the English language enables him to carry by storm the sympathies of his readers. The judicial murders of Argyle and Stafford—the horrors of the "Bloody Assize"—the pitiless executions of Alice Lisle and Elizabeth Gaunt—are painted with all the force of the author's imagination, and held forth to the indignation of mankind. But not even a solitary phrase of disapproval can be spared when he condescends to notice the murders of Laud, of Strafford, or of the king. Even the cold and philosophic tenor of Mr. Hallam's treatise is interrupted by such events. Mr. Hallam fairly admits "that the most unjustifiable act of these zealots, and one of the greatest reproaches of the Long Parliament, was the death of Archbishop Laud. . . . Laud had amply merited punishment for the tyrannical abuse of power; but his execution at the age of seventy, without the slightest pretence of political necessity, was a far more unjustifiable instance of it, than anything that was alleged against him."*

* "Laud, who had been four years in prison, and who was borne down by age and infirmities, had only to answer for his concurrence in a course of tyranny which had been conquered four years ago. As in the case of Strafford it was impossible to find him guilty of high treason, according to any existing law, . . . His condemnation was pronounced by an ordinance of both houses; it was only voted by seven lords, and was illegal even according to the tyrannical traditions of parliament."—Guizot's History of the English Revolution.

Laud, however, was a Churchman, and Mr. Macaulay's humanity is not to be elicited in such a cause. The Church, indeed, affords unceasing scope to his sarcasms, and the severity of his invective. For example, what an unworthy insinuation is conveyed in the following sentence, with which concludes the character of Charles I. :—

"He seems to have learned from the theologians whom he most esteemed, that between him and his subjects there could be nothing of the nature of mutual contract, that he could not, even if he would, divest himself of his despotic authority; and that, is every promise that he made, there was an implicit reservation that such promises might be broken in case of necessity, and that of the necessity he was the sole judge."—p. 84.

But the following passage is in every way unworthy of Mr. Macaulay's pen, however brilliant may be its antitheses, and pointed its satire. The condition of England is being described at the epoch of the Restoration :—

"The restored Church contended, indeed, against the prevailing immorality, but contended feebly, and with half a heart. It was necessary to the decorum of her character that she should admonish her erring children. But her admonitions were given in a somewhat perfunctory manner. Her attention was elsewhere engaged. Her whole soul was in the work of crushing the Puritans, and of teaching her disciples to give unto Caesar the things which were Caesar's. She had been pillaged and oppressed by the party which preached an austere morality. She had been restored to opulence and honour by libertines. Little as the men of mirth and fashion were disposed to shape their lives according to her precepts, they were yet ready to fight knee-deep in blood for her cathedrals and palaces—for every line of the rubric, and every thread of her vestments. If the debauched cavalier haunted brothels and gambling-houses, he, at least, avoided conventicles. If he never spoke without uttering ribaldry and blasphemy, he made some amends by his eagerness to send Baxter and Howe to gaol for preaching and praying. Thus the clergy, for a time, made war on schism with so much vigour, that they had little leisure to make war on vice. The ribaldry of Etherege and Wycherly was, in the presence, and under special sanction of the head of the Church [we presume Mr. Macaulay means Charles II.], publicly recited by female lips in female ears; while the author of the 'Pilgrim's Progress' languished in a dungeon, for the crime of proclaiming the Gospel to the poor. It is an unquestionable and a most instructive fact, that the years during which the political power of the Anglican hierarchy was in the zenith, were precisely the years during which national virtue was at the lowest point."—p. 181.

Mr. Macaulay forgets that for nearly twenty years England had been convulsed by civil war; that for the greater part of that time the whole body of the clergy had been dispossessed of their benefices, and were wandering in poverty and exile. He himself observes, that "during the domination of the Puritans many of the rejected ministers of the Church of England could obtain bread and shelter only by attaching themselves to the households of Royalist gentlemen" (p. 327). Nay, the attack on the Church, which we have just quoted, forms the conclusion of a professed account of the reaction in morals consequent on this very domination of the Puritans; and yet the want of immediate success to the efforts of the Church to restore society to order and religion, after the convulsion which had shaken it to its centre, is, as we have seen, adduced as "a most instructive fact," illustrative of the evil effects of the influence of "the Anglican Hierarchy!"

We cannot leave this part of our subject without quoting a passage which, although containing in its opening sentences considerable truth, ends with an attack on the Church of Ireland, which proceeding, at the present crisis, from a cabinet minister, possesses surely no inconsiderable importance :—

"The patriotism of the Irish had taken a peculiar direction. The object of their animosity was not Rome, but England: and they had especial reason to abhor those English Sovereigns who had been the chiefs of the great schism—Henry the Eighth and Elizabeth. During the vain struggle which two generations of Milesian princes maintained against the Tudors, religious enthusiasm and national enthusiasm became inseparably blended in the minds of the vanquished race. The new feud of Protestant and Papist inflamed the old feud of Saxon and Celt. The English conquerors meanwhile neglected all legitimate means of conversion. No pains were taken to provide the conquered nation with instructors capable of making themselves understood; no translation of the Bible was put forth in the Erse language. The Government contented itself with setting up a vast hierarchy of Protestant archbishops, bishops, and rectors, who did nothing, and who, for doing nothing, were paid out of the spoils of a church loved and revered by the great body of the people."—p. 69.

We now proceed to give our readers some specimens of Mr. Macaulay's style, which will convey an idea of his work, and also of his brilliancy and power as a writer.

The Puritans are certainly not his favourites. It seems that bear-baiting was a cherished amusement of the Cavaliers of that age; but, as to the Puritan :—

"It is to be remarked that their antipathy to this sport had nothing in common with the feeling which has, in our time, induced the legislature to interfere for the purpose of protecting beasts against the wanton cruelty of men. The Puritan hated bear-baiting, not because it gave pain to the bear, but because it gave pleasure to the spectators—indeed, he generally contrived to enjoy the double pleasure of tormenting both spectators and bear."—p. 161.

Some idea of the poverty of the Church, and of the extremities to which many of the clergy were reduced, may be formed from the following description, even if we were to suppose it divested of the greater part of its exaggeration :—

"The coarse and ignorant squire, who thought that it belonged to his dignity to have grace said every day at his table by an ecclesiastic in full canonicals, found means to reconcile dignity with economy. A young Levite—such was the phrase then in use—might be had for his board, a small garret, and ten pounds a year; and might not only perform his own professional functions—might not only be the most patient of butts and of listeners—might not only be always ready in fine weather for bowls, and in rainy weather for shovelboard—but might also save the expense of a gardener or of a groom. Sometimes the reverent man nailed up the apricots, and sometimes he curried the coach horses; he cast up the farrier's bills; he walked ten miles with a message or a parcel. If he was permitted to dine with family, he was expected to content himself with the plainest fare; he might fill himself with the corned beef and the carrots; but as soon as the tarts and the cheesecakes made their appearance he quitted his seat and stood aloof till he was summoned to return thanks for the repast, from a great part of which he had been excluded."—p. 328.

The narrative of the last illness of Charles II. is thus finely drawn :—

"His palace had seldom presented a gayer or more scandalous appearance than on the evening of Sunday the 1st of February, 1685. Some grave persons, who had gone thither, after the fashion of that age, to pay their duty to their sovereign, and who had expected that, on such a day, his court would wear a decent aspect, were struck with astonishment and horror. The great gallery of Whitehall, an admirable relic of the magnificence of the Tudors, was crowded with revellers and gamblers. The king sat there, chatting and toying with three women, whose charms were the boast and whose vices were the disgrace, of three nations. Barbara Palmer, Duchess of Cleveland, was there—no longer young, but still retaining some trace of that superb and voluptuous loveliness, which, twenty years before, overcame the hearts of all men. There, too, was the Duchess of Portsmouth, whose soft and infantine features were lighted up with the vivacity of France. Hortensia Mancini, Duchess of Mazarin, and niece of the great cardinal, completed the group. . . . A party of twenty courtiers was seated at cards, round a large table, on which gold was heaped in mountains. Even then the king had complained that he did not feel quite well. He had no appetite for his supper; his rest that night was broken; but on the following morning he rose, as usual, early."—pp. 429-431.

Charles lies on his death-bed, and the ministers of religion are around him :—

"Thomas Ken, Bishop of Bath and Wells, then tried his powers of persuasion. He was a man of parts and learning, of quick sensibility and stainless virtue. His elaborate works have long been forgotten, but his morning and evening hymns are still repeated daily in thousands of dwellings. Though, like most of his order, zealous for monarchy, he was no sycophant. Before he became a bishop, he had maintained the honour of his gown by refusing, when the court was at Winchester, to let Eleanor Gwynn lodge in the house which he occupied there as a prebendary. The king had sense enough to respect so manly a spirit. Of all the prelates, he liked Ken the best. It was to no purpose, however, that the good bishop now put forth all his eloquence. His solemn and pathetic exhortation awed and melted the bystanders to such a degree, that some among them believed him to be filled with the same spirit which, in the old time, had, by the mouths of Nathan and Elias, called sinful princes to repentance. Charles, however, was unmoved."—p. 434.

Bishop Ken is one of Mr. Macaulay's few favourites among the heads of the Church; and even in his case room can be found for censure. The conduct of the good bishop towards those who had joined in Monmouth's rebellion, is thus described :—

"The chief friend and protector of these unhappy men in their extremity, was one who abhorred their religious and political opinions, one whose order they hated, and to whom they had done unprovoked wrong—Bishop Ken. That good prelate used all his influence to soften the gaolers, and retrenched from his own episcopal state that he might be able to make some addition to the coarse and scanty fare of those who had defaced his beloved cathedral. His conduct on this occasion was of a piece with his whole life. His intellect was indeed darkened by many superstitions and prejudices; but his moral character, when impartially reviewed, sustains a comparison with any in ecclesiastical history, and seems to approach as near as human infirmity permits, to the ideal perfection of Christian virtue."—p. 637.

We cannot forbear affording our readers, before we close our remarks for the present, the pleasure of perusing the striking passage, which paints the spot of Monmouth's burial :—

"The head and body were placed in a coffin, covered with black velvet, and were laid privately under the communion-table of St. Peter's chapel, in the tower. Within four years the pavement of that chancel was again disturbed, and hard by the remains of Monmouth were laid the remains of Jeffreys. In truth, there is no sadder spot on earth than that little cemetery. Death is there associated, not as in Westminster Abbey and St. Paul's, with genius and virtue, with public veneration and with imperishable renown—not, as in our humblest churches and churchyards, with everything that is most endearing in social and domestic charities; but with whatever is darkest in human nature and in human destiny, with the savage triumph of implacable enemies—with the inconstancy, the ingratitude, the cowardice of friends—with all the miseries of fallen greatness and of blighted fame. Thither have been carried, through successive ages by the rude hands of gaolers, without one mourner following, the bleeding relics of men who had been the captains of armies, the leaders of parties, the oracles of senators, and the ornaments of courts. Thither was borne, before the window where Jane Grey was praying, the mangled corpse of Guilford Dudley. Edward Seymour, Duke of Somerset, and protector of the realm, reposes there by the brother whom he murdered. There has mouldered away the headless trunk of John Fisher, bishop of Rochester, and cardinal of St. Vitalis, a man worthy to have lived in a better age, and to have died in a better cause. There are laid John Dudley, Duke of Northumberland, Lord high Admiral, and Thomas Cromwell, Earl of Essex, Lord High Treasurer. There, too, is another Essex, on whom nature and fortune had lavished all their bounties in vain, and whom valour, grace, genius, royal favour, popular applause, conducted to an early and ignominious doom. Not far off sleep two chiefs of the great house of Howard, Thomas, fourth Duke of Norfolk, and Philip, eleventh Earl of Arundel. Here and there, among the thick graves of unquiet and aspiring statesmen, lie more delicate sufferers—Margeret, of Salisbury, the last of the proud name of Plantagenet, and those two fair queens who perished by the jealous rage of Henry. Such was the dust with which the dust of Monmouth mingled."—p. 629.

From the Church Register.

FEMALE INFLUENCE.

In the charming month of October, on the last night of the week, that tranquil time, when the Christian delights in calmness, and abstraction from the cares and vexations of life, to prepare for the coming of the "sweet day of rest," it was my happy fate, or more properly speaking, Providence directed my course through a remote part of the southern country, in company with a party, one of whom informed us that he had some valued friends residing at a short distance from our intended route; and if we preferred spending the halcyon day under a Christian roof, to passing it in the village inn, he would insure the whole party a hearty welcome. Knowing that this was a southern custom, we all readily and gratefully assented to his proposal. He gave us a glowing description of the happiness of his friends, and of the delightful way in which they lived, so much so, that before we saw them, we were quite prepossessed in their favor, and anxious to see upon what their happiness was founded. Before we arrived at the friendly mansion, the curtain of night had fallen around us—the moon had risen in the blue vault of heaven, in unclouded majesty, emitting her mild, soothing, tranquillizing, silvery beams, through the dark foliage of the woods; the dew had fallen upon the pines, cedars, bays, myrtle, and other aromatic trees, peculiar to that country, causing them to exhale a most refreshing, exhilarating fragrance around. All of us maintained an unbroken silence, perhaps enjoying the sweetness of the lovely scene, and meditating on the goodness of that Being, "who had planned, and built, and still upholds a world so clothed with beauty." We rode on in this contemplative mood for some time, until we arrived at the end of the forest, when our guide directed our view to the house of his friends, and said that he would ride a little faster, and inform them of our approach. In a few moments after, we reached the end of our week's journey, and stopped at the door, where the master of the family, Mr. L. * * *, came forward, and received us with the greatest courtesy, urbanity, and friendliness; expressed his pleasure that we had been persuaded to visit him, assisted us to alight, and led the way into the parlor, where we found his wife, and an elderly clergyman, whose head was silvered o'er with the frosts of many winters: she extended to us the same kind and friendly welcome. We found them at tea. In a few moments we were all comfortably accommodated, and pleased with finding our unexpected arrival had not interfered with the well ordered domestic arrangements; there was no hurry, no noise, no bustle, no confusion; the domestics appeared to be well trained, anxious for the comfort of their master's guests, and with cheerful alacrity anticipated all our wishes. After leaving the table, we discussed various subjects, in which the venerable divine had a conspicuous part, whom I would describe as

Cheerful, grave, sincere,

In language plain, and plain in manners.

He had just returned from a missionary tour among the Indians; and he appeared to be deeply interested in their spiritual welfare, as well as in that of a more degraded race of beings, those of a darker hue. He was an owner of many, and was instructing them, preparatory to emancipating them, intending to send them to Africa. Our host spoke very feelingly upon the subject of slavery. One expression arrested my attention—"poor souls," said he, "we cannot do as much for their bodies as we wish, but we all can do much for their souls." He had touched a chord which powerfully vibrated. I felt that we were no longer strangers, but had the same feelings, implanted by our common Father. I had from childhood's hour taken a deep interest in the spiritual welfare of poor degraded Africa's children, and thus to hear my sentiments uttered by a slaveholder, thrilled me with pleasurable emotion. Every sentiment which this good old gentleman uttered, increased my veneration of his upright character. The clock struck nine—he said that it was their custom to have family worship; that if it were not disagreeable to us, he should be happy if we would join them. Politeness, if no higher motive, would have induced us to comply with his invitation; we therefore followed Mr. and Mrs. L. into a large room, where after we had been seated a few minutes, the slaves entered. This was a new scene of pleasure to me, for I was well aware, that many, esteemed pious, among the slaveholders, assembled daily around the family altar, and excluded them; appearing totally to forget, that the Divine Being, to whom they offered their sacrifice and thanksgiving, was the great parent of all, and sent his only Son, with a message of pardon and reconciliation to all his erring children, whether bound or free, black or white. The service commenced with prayer, offered by the missionary, afterwards a chapter in the Bible was read, and concluded with a hymn, given out by lines, for the better accommodation of the negroes, by Mr. L. I was forcibly struck with the deep humility, contrition, and fervency, expressed in his countenance during the service. Frequently had I been where worship was powerfully aided by pomp and splendor—where the deep majestic, solemn, swelling notes of the full toned organ, accompanied by the skilful choir, wonderfully assisted to elevate the soul in its devotions, but never had my devotional feelings been so much excited, as by the simple strain of these poor beings, joining their humble confidence with the great ones of the earth, in praise and adoration to their heavenly Father. After they had left the room, the master observed, that he never compelled his servants to attend family worship, but only invited them. He considered them as fellow Christians, and appeared to be well convinced, that their souls were intrusted to his care, and that at the great day of retribution, when he and they should stand before the throne of the universal Judge, he would have to render an account how he had discharged his duties to them, not only in regard to their comfort in this life, but as preparing them for the life to come; his conscientious discharge of his duty was not thrown away upon them—they appeared to remember, that the holy book from which he instructed them, commanded them to be obedient to their earthly master, serving him with all fidelity. The following morning being Sunday, we all again assembled around the family altar. After breakfast, Mr. and Mrs. L., the missionary, and the rest of the party, rode to the neighboring village church, but as I had a bad cold, I determined to remain at home—I was told to make myself comfortable, and to ask for whatever I wished, as the keys would be left with a servant, thereby showing me that confidence was placed in her honesty.

After they had gone, I took a walk over the ground; the air was soft and balmy—the birds were warbling, insects humming praises—flowers, shrubs, and trees wafted their fragrance as incense to Him, "whose temple is all space." I mounted on the wings of adoring contemplation to the Throne of the Most High and Lofty one, before whom angels and arch-angels veil their faces, who condescends to dwell in the hearts of the meek and lowly; and who lavishes his gifts upon his unworthy creatures. Ever and anon I was met by groups of cheerful, happy, smiling, well fed negroes, dressed in their Sunday attire. I returned to the house, well pleased with my excursion. Here there was nothing to create those depressing feelings, which I had frequently experienced at other plantations, and why?—because the master and mistress were actuated in all their dealings with the negroes, by that love of God which shows itself in love to all his creatures. The house was furnished with a well selected library, not only containing all the classics and Belles Lettres, but the most approved works of the soundest divines, with which I employed myself until the return of the family. The conclusion of the sacred day was passed, as might be expected, under a roof, where the family's motto appeared to be, "let all things be done decently and in order."

We left this delightful abode, where religion had put on its most attractive form, early the following morning, when what was our surprise at being informed by our guide, that the zealous, upright, consistent, conscientious Christian, had been in his youth, one of the wildest, most dissipated of men, a blasphemer of the Most High, an atheist; consequently he gave a loose rein to all his unhallowed passions: that his wife, a meek and humble follower of Jesus, who had cultivated her mind, and stored it with the truths of religion, by her judicious conduct, her gentle influence, her mild persuasion, but above all by the splendor of her own virtuous, pure, and holy example, had been the means of withdrawing him from the paths of wickedness. She talked to him of the loveliness of virtue—the joy and peace in believing—the pleasantness of religion's paths, producing true happiness in this world, and leading to bliss eternal. Although he loved to listen to the sweet tones of her voice, pleading the holy cause, and to contemplate the celestial expression of her countenance, irradiated with heavenly fervour, animated with a Christian's hope—yet it was long ere she produced the desired effect; but that "charity which hopeth all things," induced her to persevere in her soul-reclaiming course, and to conceal from every one the anguish of her heart, except that Being whom she daily supplicated to turn the sinner from the error of his way. She at length persuaded him to open the volume of revealed wisdom, and to give it a candid, attentive perusal, which he attempted, more to gratify her, than from any conviction or light that he expected to dawn upon his mighty mind: but as he read, reflected, examined and compared one passage with another, his doubts gradually diminished, and he took a deeper and deeper interest in the sacred study. He found in it many truisms, applicable to his own unhappy state. One particularly struck him—there is no peace, saith my God, to the wicked. "True, too true! as I justly experience," he involuntarily exclaimed. He was led to contrast his own miserable life, agitated by so many various passions, with the serene, calm, peaceful, tranquil life of his wife; while her's displayed the beauty of holiness, his exhibited nothing but the pollution of guilt. She, by the purity piety, and elevation of her character, aspired to the nature of the celestial intelligences; he, although gifted with the finest faculties, degraded his to the nature of the brutes that perish, thirsted not after immortal joy, satisfied with earth's vain pleasures. He reflected also upon their different employment of time. She by the conscientious discharge of all her duties, fulfilled the end of her being, while he acknowledged that upon every hour of his past life, might be inscribed by Him who cannot err, time lost for eternity. These humbling reflections filled him with compunction, and caused the deepest self-abasement. The illusion which had magnified his pleasures suddenly disappeared, he saw himself as he was, a guilty rebel, obnoxious to the divine vengeance, light from on high appeared to illumine the dark recesses of his guilty heart, bringing to his view the awful catalogue of all his forgotten crimes. This retrospect produced in him "that godly sorrow which worketh repentance, not to be repented of." He determined to begin to live for eternity—made an effort in the Divine strength to be virtuous—burst assunder the chains which fettered him, (convinced that it was his love of vice which had made him wish to disbelieve the existence of a pure and holy God, who took cognizance of all his unholy deeds)—forsook the once attractive, but now disgusting society of his dissolute companions—the gaming table, the midnight revel, and the haunt of vice, and now confesses that there is no other name given under heaven whereby he can be saved, but that of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ, who is the same yesterday, to-day, and forever.

A STRANGER.

We have been almost tempted to get the following stereotyped, as a fixed heading for Communications.—[Ed. BAN.]

WRITING FOR THE PRESS.—O ye poets and prosers, who aspire to write in the miscellanies, and above all, O ye palpitating untied, who meditate the offer of your maiden essays to establish periodicals, take care, pray ye take care to cultivate a good, plain, bold, round text. Set up Tomkins as well as Pope and Dryden for a model, and have an eye to your pothooks. Some persons hold that the best writers are those who write the best hands, and I have known the conductor of a magazine to be converted by a crabbed MS. to the same opinion. Of all things, therefore, be legible: and to that end practice penmanship. If you have never learned, take lessons. Be sure to buy the best paper, the best ink, the best pens, and then sit down and do the best you can; as school-boys do—put out your tongue and take pains. So shall you happily escape the rash rejection of a jaded editor; so having got into your hand, it is possible that your head may follow; and, though last not least, ye may fortunately avert those awful mistakes of the press, which sometimes ruin a poet's sublimest effusion, by pantomimically transforming his roses into noses, and his angels into angles, and all his happiness into pappiness.—Hood.

THEORY AND PRACTICE.

"Mother," said a bright-eyed, laughing little girl, "I have often heard of theory and practice. Will you be kind enough to tell me what they mean?"

"I will, my daughter," the little girl's mother replied. "And to do so, my child, I will take a common word; one you have often heard used, and by it, I will illustrate their meaning."

"O, do mother," replied little Jane; how glad I shall be."

"Well, then listen," said her mother.

Jane drew her chair close to her mother, and laying down a book she had been reading, exclaimed:

"Now I am ready, mother, pray go on."

"You have often," replied her mother, "heard of the word generous. You know that it means to be free-hearted; to be willing to give to others what we can spare. There was once a little girl who had kind and affectionate parents; they loved her very much, and often gave her money, and pretty books to read, so that she might improve her youthful mind; they used to try to instil into her mind the true spirit of generosity. But it seemed all their wishes and desires failed; for their little daughter was merely generous in theory."

"O, mother, how is that," exclaimed little Jane.

"Why," replied her mother, "I will explain it as well as I can. This little girl read much in her books about being generous. She knew what it was to be so; but she never acted out her knowledge of generosity. She never dreamed, that, to be generous,—to be truly so,—she must give some of her money to the poor; to the destitute; to the starving. She never thought she must go, and, with her spare money, buy shoes, and frocks, and the like, for poor children. No; she did not think that to be generous, was to clothe the naked, to give food to the starving, and fuel to the freezing. She never thought of this. And yet, she supposed she was generous. One day a poor, blind beggar came to the door of her parents, and she heard him tell about his sick wife and starving children. O, what a sad tale the beggar told; but this little girl heard it all, and was unmoved. She did not give out of her small treasury a single cent to relieve the wants of the poor old man and his suffering family; and yet, she considered herself very generous, because she read about other persons being so. This little girl was merely generous—if I may use the term—in theory, not in practice. If she had given relief to that poor, blind beggar, then, she would have been generous in practice; then, she would have been truly generous. But she did not do so, and consequently, her generosity was dumb. It did no good. Indeed, I don't believe that it could be called so at all. A generous heart is a giving heart."

"O, mother!" exclaimed Jane, "I know what little girl you have been talking about; it was your daughter."

"Yes," replied her mother, "I mean my little girl."

"But mother," said Jane, "how sorry I am. If you will forgive me, I will try to be generous in the future;—not only in reading, or seeing other people so, but in practice too. I don't believe I was ever generous. There surely can be no generosity, without it is a practical one. I will now go, if you will permit me, and get little Sarah Taylor a pair of new shoes, with the money father gave me this morning. I saw her yesterday, and she told me her father was sick, and she had no shoes to wear." "Do so, my dear child," replied her mother, "and always remember the difference between theory and practice."—Daily Sun.

SINGULAR DISCOVERY.—The Constantinople Journal gives some curious details regarding a city said to have been discovered in Asia Minor by Dr. Brunner, one of the agents employed by the Government of the Sublime Porte, in penetrating into the most remote and inaccessible regions of the empire for the purpose of taking a census. While occupied in exploring the sandjak (excavations) of Bousouk, on the confines of Pontus, Cappadocia and Galatia, Dr. Brunner, whose attention was attracted by the bold and curious passages opened into the living rock, was accosted by a villager, who offered to show him things far more interesting on the other side of the mountain if he would trust to his guidance. After some hesitation, the doctor armed himself, and followed his guide, taking his servant with him. Half an hour brought them round the mountain, and then the doctor found himself, says the narrative, in presence of the ruins of a considerable town. These ruins are situated in the south-east of the village of Yankeui, and to the north of the village of Tscheque, half a league from each other; and the doctor's profound study of all the accounts, ancient and modern, of Asia Minor, furnishes no trace by which he can identify them. The site of the town is half a league in length. It contains even temples with cupolas, and 218 houses, some in good preservation, others half choked up with their own ruins and with vast fragments of rock, detached from the overhanging mountains. The houses have compartments of three, four, and six chambers. The largest of these edifices is 20 feet long by 28 wide. So far as the ruins would permit the doctor to estimate it, he conjectured the height of some of the temples to be from 20 to 30 feet. There are traces of plaster on the interior walls, but not an emblem or indication, says Dr. Brunner, to suggest the origin or date of the ruined city. Dr. Brunner proposes his deserted city as a puzzle for the archaeologists.

"Riches are beholden to our fancies for their value; and yet the more we value riches, the less good they are, and by an over-valuing affection they become our danger and our sin."

GOSPEL TRUTH, AND PRIMITIVE ECCLESIASTICAL ORDER.

SATURDAY, MARCH 17, 1849.

NOTICE.

A BOX will be found in the lower window at Messrs. KING & BAIRD'S, No. 9 Sansom street, (formerly George street,) where in all Notices, Communications, and Advertisements for the Banner of the Cross, are to be deposited.

THOU SHALT NOT BEAR FALSE WITNESS AGAINST THY NEIGHBOR.—An excellent story is told of a venerable Bishop of our Church, peculiarly ready in such emergencies, showing the effective manner in which he silenced an offensive assailant, who wished to get up a religious controversy for the entertainment of the passengers on board a steamboat. Travelling along one of our western rivers, he was sitting quietly writing in the crowded cabin, when he was attacked by a young preacher, of some of the multitudinous sects which there abound, on some popular points of dispute in which the wrong side has rather the advantage with ignorant listeners. He endured the assault patiently and in silence for some time, until seeing that general attention was directed to him, he suddenly fixed his eyes upon his assailant and said in a loud voice,

"Tell me, Sir, what is the fifth commandment?"

"I didn't come to discuss the commandments," was the somewhat confused reply.

"I say, Sir, tell me, what is the fifth commandment?"

"Sir, I—I—I have nothing to say with the commandments, that's not the subject I wished to talk about."

"Sir, you came, without invitation, to discuss with me a nice theological question, and yet you do not seem to know the Decalogue, which reveals the fundamental principles of human duty. And now, Sir, (rising, and lifting up his voice) if you don't tell me what the fifth commandment is, I hold you up to the scorn of this audience."

The confounded disputant could only withdraw to hide his confusion in retirement.

A somewhat extensive, though rather involuntary, acquaintance with the religious journals of various denominations, compels us to think that they are not very familiar with the Commandment of the Decalogue, placed over this article. A very common violation of this Divine precept is to be found, more especially of late, in the false and injurious charges preferred against the character of the clergy of the Church of England. In the discussion of abstract questions concerning that Church they might enjoy the most undisturbed liberty of speech. The evils which grow out of the union of Church and State, evils felt and owned by some of the noblest sons of that Church, are lawful texts for their Discourses addressed to people who have no voice in amending the evils deprecated. They have perfect right to brand this Church, in their own imagination, which happily makes no mark upon the object, with those three awful P's, Prelacy, Puseyism, Popery. They may descant to their heart's content upon tithes, presentations, pluralities, dignitaries, &c. &c. until every citizen of this land is fully satisfied to live and die in the United States, or go to California, fully resolved never to emigrate to Great Britain. But the case is different when they come to speak freely and injuriously of personal character, and to "bear false witness" against the clergy themselves. In so doing, they certainly injure their "neighbor." For if, as our Saviour shows, a Samaritan was neighbor to a Jew, surely even a Prelatist, &c. is neighbor to the most self-complacent, self-styled Evangelical.

These remarks have been called forth by the following two articles taken from highly respectable Journals, of very extensive circulation among the denominations for whose benefit they are published. They may be excused by some on the plea that they do not originate the calumny. But we think, with Bishop Sherlock, that "even to believe without sufficient ground, or to report when we do believe, the ill we hear of others cannot be excused of malice and envy—you become the instrument of malice; you pull the trigger though the other levels the piece at the innocent head."

These are the reports, and our readers will perhaps conclude with us that all the noise they make can do little harm, as the pieces are only loaded with blank cartridge.

"RELIGION IN THE ENGLISH CHURCH.—The following description of the character of the ministers of the established Church of England, is from the pen of one of their number, who is publishing a series of articles in the London Christian Times:

"The standard of theology among the clergy is very low.

The doctrine of the majority is not the doctrine of the reformation nor of the church articles. The division of high and low church, he says, is generally understood by the people, to be a division on the vital points of Christianity. The larger portion of the clergy, hold the views of Laud—some even boldly avowing Romish views—and of a very large proportion, the theological attainments are very meagre. The meetings of ministers discourage theological inquiry and discussion. And with the greater part, the preaching is a mere farcical performance."

"I was then preaching Alison's sermons," says one brother; "I find Cooper's sermons very acceptable," says another; "I try to fill up one of Simeon's skeletons," says a third; "I preach my uncle the vicar's," says a fourth. "He left me a good stock." And another, wrapt in astonishment at the mystic depth of Newman, pours forth with all submissive reverence, the strange and deceitful complication of that dishonest school, to a village congregation that cannot fathom the true meaning and purpose of a single sentence."

Yet this writer says that in the last fifty years, a wonderful improvement in professional propriety and diligence has taken place. Only old men now know the depth to which the clerical character had fallen.

THE ESTABLISHED CLERGY.—The character of the clergy of the Established Church, is thus concisely and vividly pictured by Mr. Noel, in his recent work. It is the testimony of one who knows and deserves to be believed. What a tale it tells for establishments:—

"What are the pastors of the Anglican churches in fact? I grieve to write it. There are men among them of great virtues to whom I gladly do homage. I know and love many faithful, energetic, and sincere servants of Christ; but when these exceptions are subtracted, what are the rest? I grieve to write it. Chosen by peers and squires, by colleges and church corporations, by chancellors and State-made prelates, many are made pastors by a corrupt favoritism, many are allured to an uncongenial employment by the income which it offers them, and many embrace the profession of a pastor because they are too dull, inert, or timid for any other. They have scarcely any theological training; they are pledged to all the errors in the Prayer-book; and all the abuses sanctioned by the Union. They dread reforms; they are servile to patrons; they are intolerant to Dissenters; their zeal is crippled by state restrictions, and their indolence tempted by unbounded liberty to indulge it. Severed from the body of the people by their birth, by their early education, by their college life, by their aristocratical association, by their zeal for their ecclesiastical prerogatives, they have little popular influence. Lawyers, men of science, and editors of newspapers, do not listen to them; Chartists and Socialists dislike and despise them; they scarcely touch the operative millions; they make few converts among the devotees of fashions; and under their leadership the Christian army is inert, timid, and unsuccessful."

We pronounce these statements a plain violation of the ninth commandment. That there are various kinds, and orders of men in the Church of England and Ireland none can deny. Their numbers must of course bring great variety into the composition of the mass. But to say, that the character given to them in these accounts is a description of "the Established clergy," is false. To disprove the charge of meagre Theological attainments, we have only to read the catalogue of Works published by them. The noblest Works, upon all subjects in the wide field of Theology, which have come from the Press in modern times come, from this body of men. And the fact that all of them must have a University education is clear disproof of the implied charge of ignorance.

As to the charge that with them "preaching is a mere farcical performance," we have only to say that the best sermons, published in modern times, come from the Anglican pulpit.

As to the statement of their lack of influence upon the various grades of society, from the lowest to the highest, it is one of the vainest and most impudent assertions ever made. Our own observation, of more than a year spent in city and rural parishes in that country, enable us to say explicitly that this is "false witness."

This close personal observation prepares us to say deliberately that we do not believe the clergy of any Church or sect in the world, as a body, superior to "the Established clergy" in devotion to their high and holy work, and in earnest, faithful, and successful efforts to do good unto all men.

It is almost a ludicrous attempt to impose upon supposed ignorance, to say that "under their leadership the Christian army is inert, timid, and unsuccessful." The mere enumeration of the many flourishing and noble societies, which thrive under the patronage of the Church, embracing in their beneficent objects almost every design which an ingenious charity could invent, would alone disprove this assertion. The many colonial bishopricks which have been endowed, and the noble band of Missionaries, who labor under their oversight, would confute this rash and sweeping charge. The Report of "the Society for the propagation of the Gospel in Foreign Parts," for 1848, shows us under its care 22 Dioceses with 21 Bishops and 364 Missionaries. The receipts of funds for the year amounted to $380,765. The "Church Missionary Society," which celebrated lately its fiftieth anniversary, is a part of this "Christian army" which is said to be "inert, timid, and unsuccessful."

Concerning this Society its lamented Assistant Secretary, the Rev. H. W. Fox, wrote the following just before his death.

CHURCH MISSIONARY SOCIETY JUBILEE ADDRESS.—The fiftieth year of the Church Missionary Society has arrived, and in recollection of the Jewish ordinance of the Jubilee—a season both of thankfulness for past mercies, and of setting free those who had till then been in bondage—we are called to look back and around us, and to praise God for the way in which he has led us, and our fathers these fifty years, in fulfilling His prophecies and commands.

What the Church Missionary Society has done.—Fifty years ago, the Church of England had no instrumentality especially devoted to the preaching of Christ among the Heathen. In 1799, a little band of godly Clergy and Laity united to form a Society for this purpose; and in 1804, the first Missionaries went forth to Sierra Leone. In a few years, others were sent to New Zealand; then to India, and to other fields. At the present hour, the Church Missionary Society not only is actively engaged on the rocky and wooded peninsular of Sierra Leone, among the Liberated Africans; but has travelled a thousand miles to the eastward, to Badagry and Abeokuta. It has been driven from Abyssinia; but its Missionaries have clung to the east coast of Africa, near Mombas, and have made good their footing there. In Cairo, that ancient seat of bigotry, the Society is at work both among the Coptic population—the descendants of the Ancient Egyptians—and among the Mahomedans. India has many Missions of the Society. The sandy plains of palm-girt Tinnevely: the rich woods of Travancore, clothed with all the splendour of tropical luxuriance; the great cities of Madras and Bombay; the long-neglected nation of the Telogoos; the domes and minarets of Agra; the rolling stream of the Ganges; and the highlands of the snowy Himalayas; have all witnessed the love of God in sending His servants to preach the Gospel, and the converting power of the Holy Ghost. The opened door of China has been entered by the Society. In British Guiana, in South America, amid the swamps and tangled jungles of the banks of the Essequibo, tribes before unknown to Europeans, and living like the wild beasts of the forest, have been evangelized, and are now "sitting at the feet of Jesus, clothed, and in their right mind." In New Zealand, the leafy glens and mountains, the lovely lakes and their rocky islets, have resounded with the prayers and praises of believers in Christ, who in their childhood were wholly ignorant of God, but who have heard of the living Saviour from the Missionaries of the Society. The Negroes of the West Indies have also been the subject of our exertions. And far back in the prairies and woods of North-west America, amid the burning heats of summer and the piercing frosts of winter, do our Missionaries continue to win souls to Christ, and to gather large congregations of the Red Indian tribes to hear of His love, and to join in prayer to Him.

Thus God is leading the Society on, and thus, "faint yet pursuing," the Society is following where He calls.

To which we may add the following summary of its operations:

Missionary Stations,	102
European Clergymen,	125
Native and East-Indian Clergymen,	14
European Lay Teachers,	43
Native and East-Indian Lay Teachers,	1299
Communicants,	13010

Had we time and space we might add other similar proofs. However this is sufficient evidence to show that those who give currency to the statement which thus speaks of the Clergy of the Church of England and Ireland, "under their leadership the Christian army is inert, timid, and unsuccessful," violate the commandment which says,

THOU SHALT NOT BEAR FALSE WITNESS AGAINST THY NEIGHBOR.

"DAVIES AND ONE" OUTDONE.—It is a laudable ambition, no doubt, which prompts all historians to seek the pre-eminence in their accounts of the marvellous. We cheerfully accord the palm of victory to "the Protestant Churchman," in this amicable contest, wherein the minority triumphs. If there was any merit in preaching to one hearer, then by fair logic, there was a degree more in preaching to a congregation less by one. However, we do not think the case exactly a fair one, as the preacher referred to, if the school-house was only "a short distance from the village", might possibly have been heard by most of its inhabitants.

PREACHER WITOUT ONE HEARER!—In a cotemporary print of recent date, I have read with pleasure, a notice of sermons preached to one hearer! What heroism is that, compared with preaching without a single hearer? Of such a case I have had a very graphic account from the preacher himself. He was then a Methodist circuit rider, in a district where stern old Puritanism still kept the people carefully from all preachers except those of the right stripe.

His appointment was of a Saturday, at a school-house, a short distance from a small village. A few boys had repaired for sport, from instinct or from habit, to their old play ground.

The preacher tied his horse, entered the school-house, placed his Bible and Hymn Book upon the teacher's desk, and waited for an audience. In vain he waited. Not a soul appeared. He gave out a hymn, which he sung himself. He prayed, but there was no response. He sang again, when, ever and anon an urchin's head would be seen at a window, or at the door, curiously spying out what could be going on. He took his text and preached his sermon. To the very conclusion no soul appeared. Uninvited and dinnerless, he went his way. It was a monthly appointment. When next he was seen tying his horse to the old place, off trooped all the boys from the play-ground, and soon in gathered a curious, eager crowd. No further hindrance was presented to the gathering of a small but flourishing society of Methodists.

Your readers will be gratified to learn that this man of shrewd and large forecast, of tried patience and endurance, is now an Episcopal Clergyman at the West, and has just offered himself to the Domestic Committee, as a missionary to California.—Protestant Churchman.

DEER PARK HALL, NEWARK, DEL.—Deer Park Hall is situated near the village of Newark, New Castle County, Delaware, in the immediate vicinity of the Depot of the Baltimore and Philadelphia Rail Road, and within three hour's ride of either city. The situation is healthy and pleasant, and the building large and commodious.

We have received the Catalogue of the Students of this School for 1848. We are happy to see that it is in a flourishing condition, numbering from forty to fifty pupils. It is under the care of a Rector, well qualified for his responsible office, the Rev. Walter E. Franklin. Our knowledge of the Principal, and the plain and simple rules laid down for the government of his School, give us a most favorable impression of this Institution, and it has our best wishes for its prosperity.

LIST OF THE CLERGY OF PHILADELPHIA.—This was kindly prepared for us by a Clerical friend. There were one or two omissions and errors, on which account we publish the list this week again. In future it shall appear once a month.

THE BROTHERHOOD OF THE CHURCH.—We omitted to credit the admirable article on this subject, in the Banner of March 3rd, to its proper source: It was taken from our excellent contemporary, "The Church" published in Canada. The omission of this fact took much from the point of the article.

THE CONTRAST.—We call the attention of our readers to the brief, but striking article, with this title, among our communications. The impressive thoughts there expressed, are in keeping with the solemn teachings of the first morning Lesson of last Sunday. "Moreover, also, I gave them my sabbaths, to be a sign between Me and them, that they might know that I am the Lord that sanctify them. But the house of Israel rebelled against me in the wilderness—and my sabbaths they greatly polluted: then I said I would pour out my fury upon them in the wilderness to consume them."

We hope that "N" will let us hear from him again.

ST. MARK'S CHURCH.—We are sure our more distant readers will thank us for giving them an opportunity of seeing the plan of this Church. We are equally certain that few will dissent from our opinion as to its impressive and striking effect. In looking at such a building, the thought at once arises in the mind, "this is none other but the house of God."

NASHOTAH.—We have received the promise of another $100 towards making up the $1000 to be raised. It comes from "a Member of St. Peter's Church," a Parish which has ever given substantial proofs of its interest in this Mission.

Justice compels us to insert the following, although it bears a little hard upon us. However we must act upon the motto, "Fiat Justitia," &c.

For the Banner of the Cross.

MR. EDITOR:—In a notice of a book, entitled "Friends and Fortune," you have done us injustice, and we call upon you to undo the wrong. Those who did not know otherwise might suppose, from your expression, that New Jersey was one vast plain of sand, sprinkled over with an occasional Pine tree. You speak of "the dreary wastes of Jersey Pines." Now, sir, we have feelings, though our hearts may be of wood, and to soothe these wounded sensibilities, we beg that you will just mention that there are some "green things" in New Jersey besides Pine trees, and that we are not altogether "flats" there, for there are a few mountains, not a few hills, and all kinds of woods in the State we overshadow. We remain your friend, though a little disturbed, OAKS, ELMS, WILLOWS & Co., of New Jersey.

We beg ten thousand pardons, and sorry are we to have shaken, in the slightest degree, our wooden friends. We know that there are hearts, as well as heads, of wood. We were not giving a topographical, geographical or picturesque description of New Jersey, but simply showing what a miserable condition one might get into, even in that happy State. All who travel through this State must know that there is a small patch a little sandy, somewhat flat and not very interesting, wisely intended, no doubt, for Rail Roads and Peach orchards. But then there is a bright and beautiful side all must know, or ought to know, to the picture. If they doubt it, let them go with us some fine week in spring or autumn, and take an excursion through the green glades of Burlington county, and so gently ascend the bright Delaware as its banks rise up in gradually increasing beauty, until they grow majestic in the bold heights which crown the water gap. Or, let them go with us through the rich and teeming counties of Hunterdon, Warren, and Sussex, and then we are sure they will never say a word, if ever they did before, against New Jersey, or talk of its "dreary wastes."

REV. W. H. BOURNS.—We are happy to learn, by a letter from this esteemed brother, that his residence in the South has been of great service to his health. He hopes, in a month or so, to be able to resume his ministerial duties.

Foreign Intelligence.

The English church papers are largely occupied with a public examination into the injurious reports concerning an "Orphans' Home" at Davenport, under the direction of "the Sisters of Mercy." The examination of witnesses, which took place before the Bishop of Exeter, and the statement read by Miss Sellon, the Principal, fully vindicated these devoted church-women, against any serious charges. The Bishop of Exeter, in a manly speech, (received by the graceless portion of his auditory, with hisses and laughter) while he condemned some indiscretions, attested the faithfulness and zeal with which the work of mercy had been prosecuted. How unwise are they who think they advance the interests of true religion, by decrying such laudable efforts as these. Save us, we say, from such Protestantism as this! Should this case attract attention here, we may present its true merits more fully at another time.

The Society for promoting Christian Knowledge will complete its 150th year on the 8th of March next, on which occasion the Archbishop of Canterbury will preach in St. Paul's Cathedral.

The Rev. Dr. Hook has resigned the office of Chaplain to the Leeds Workhouse, in consequence of the state of his health.

ITALY.

Rome was proclaimed a Republic and the Pope was formally deposed on the 8th inst., a division in the Constituent Assembly having carried the proposition by a majority of 136 to 8. In the middle of the night the result was forced on the notice of the slumbering citizens by the simultaneous peeling of all the steeples in Rome. The decree is couched in the following terms:—

"Art. 1. The pope is declared divested, in point of fact and in point of right, to all claim to temporal power.

"Art. 2. Full and adequate guarantees shall be provided for the Pontiff's independent exercise of his spiritual supremacy.

"Art. 3. The government of these States shall be of a strictly democratic nature, and the glorious name of Roman Republic is resumed.

"Art. 4. Our relations with the other States of Italy shall be based on reciprocity and goodwill, as becomes our common nationality.

(Signed) "GALLETI, President of the National Assembly.

"Decreed at Rome, Feb. 8, 1849."

After the proclamation a Te Deum was chanted in St. Peter's, and on the 9th the Republican flag was floating from the tower of the Capitol. Rome was tranquil.

From the English Churchman, of Feb. 22d.

SUMMARY OF GENERAL INTELLIGENCE.

FRANCE is tranquil, and the trade of Paris is consequently improving. LOUIS NAPOLEON is winning golden opinions from all ranks of men, and will most likely be made President for life by the Legislative Assembly.

It is said that there has been a Republican movement at Barcelona; but this requires confirmation. CABRERA is recovering from his wounds, and will soon be in the saddle again.

Vienna continues in an unsettled state. Were it not for the large garrison of soldiers, an outbreak would undoubtedly take place. It seems doubtful if General WELDEN will be able to prevent disturbance much longer.

The Imperialists are besieging Arad; and disturbances have broken out in Croatia and Servia. The Archduke JOHN is indisposed.

The Russians have sent troops to Hermanstadt, at the express desire of the inhabitants, (?) who are kept in check by General BEM.

It is said that the Danes intend to give notice of the cessation of the Armistice on the 31st of March, and to march into Schleswig.

The King of PRUSSIA is indisposed, but is expected to open the Chambers, in person, on the 26th inst.

The English Government have protested against the Russian encroachments in Moldavia and Wallachia. The EMPEROR was desirous of forcing upon the Sultan a treaty with similar provisions to that of UNKIAR SKELESSI; this danger has for the present been averted. It appears that England and France are perfectly agreed on the Turkish question.

The Grand Duke of TUSCANY is at Porto Stephano, under the protection of the English fleet. The Tuscans have joined the Italian Constituente.

The Pope was dethroned, and the Republic proclaimed, at Rome on the 9th inst., at two o'clock in the morning. It is reported that the King of SARDINIA, in conjunction with the King of NAPLES, and with the concurrence of the great Powers of Europe, will send forces into the Roman and Tuscan states; France and England despatching a fleet to Civita Vecchia. This is very unlikely. The King of SARDINIA, is not so foolish as to send his troops into the Roman States, and leave the road to Turin open to Radetski. Nor do we expect that LOUIS NAPOLEON will support the POPE and oppose his own cousin, the Prince of CANINO. There is no doubt that the different members of the BONAPARTE family understand each other perfectly well. It will be curious to remark what effect the dethronement of the POPE, as a temporal Prince, will have upon his spiritual power. "Formerly," said an Orator at the Council of Basle, "I was of opinion that it would be well to separate the temporal from the spiritual power; but I have learned that virtue without force is ludicrous, and that the POPE, without the hereditary possessions of the Church, is only the servant of Kings and Princes."

It is said that the British Consul in Morocco has been murdered by the Moors, and that the English Squadron were going to bombard Tangier, but these reports require confirmation.

In England, Lord John RUSSELL has introduced his Jew Bill, which is substantially the same as that which was rejected nine months ago. We trust that this Whig Scheme for unchristianising the Legislature will meet with the fate that it deserves. If Jews are admitted into Parliament, why should Mahomedans and Hindoos be excluded? Besides, the Jews are not Englishmen, and consequently have no more right to sit in the English Parliament than Poles, or the natives of any other foreign country.

THE CROSS.

BY MRS. JOSEPH C. NEAL.

The Spire of St. Peter's Church, Philadelphia, is surmounted by a gilded cross, which may be often seen in the twilight, while its support is invisible.

I.

The starless evening of a winter's day
Is closing slowly o'er the wild turmoil
That daily rise 'mid the dust and soil
With which the city marks her onward way.
The wind sweeps by with broken sobs and moans;
Dark clouds moved slowly onward in its track
Stood piled like ocean billows driven back,—
When suddenly are hushed its mournful tones,
But 'mid the gloom that sweeps o'er earth and sky,
A glittering cross stands reared alone and free,
As some white sail rides o'er a stormy sea:
The Church, the spire, are fading from the eye.
Upborne by angel hands at length it seems,
As 'mid the darkness, and the clouds it gleams.

II.

So life has closed to many a weary soul
That long hath passed the glowing morn of youth;
At mid-day faded the fair light of truth
In error's clouds that oftentimes darkly roll
Over the Heaven, once smiling, and so pure.
In turmoil and in blackness death draws near,
Remorseful phantoms of the past appear
With wailing tones pronouncing doom most sure.
Then while the dreary night is closing fast,—
When all on earth seems dark and desolate,—
The soul ere yielding to a hopeless fate
Glances toward Heaven; the cross is seen at last!
Above all clouds of doubt, all trials reared—
The symbol of our faith the dying one hath cheered.]

THE CONTRAST—A SIGN OF PROMISE.

A President is to be chosen for a new-born Republic. The agitation of an election fraught with momentous issues, is to pervade a mighty nation. "The powers that be," send forth the proclamation which appoints as the occasion for that all absorbing contest, the very day which God has hallowed; the day designed in tender mercy to raise men's minds from the thoughts of this world to the consideration of the next. No voice of earnest solemn remonstrance is uplifted. The popular mind shrinks not from the offence against the Majesty of Him whose Kingdom ruleth over all. The designated time arrives, and France, with eye and heart bound down to earth, even then when both should have been raised to heaven, plunges into a degrading struggle to make an earthly calling and election sure.

A President has been chosen for a Republic; and the time approaches when he must take the oath of office, and enter upon the duties of his high and sacred trust. In the lapse of years, at intervals the appointed time coincides with the Lords day. As once before, 'twill be so now. But no proposal or design to make the day of rest, the witness of the inauguration, invites the voice of earnest solemn remonstrance. The fourth of March instead of calling God to witness, with the exciting formalities of a scene pertaining to this world, presents the sublime spectacle of a nation resting according to the commandment. 'Tis less than the truth to say, that the popular mind acquiesced in the postponement.

What patriotic Christian heart—and every truly Christian heart is in the fullest sense a patriotic one—can contemplate this contrast unmoved! What citizen of this great republic will not hail it, not in a spirit of vain boasting, but of devoutest gratitude to Him who hath made us to differ, as a sign of promise for the land he loves! Them that know me will I know, saith the Lord. Shall we not make thankful mention of a fact which may kindle the glad hope, "God, even our own God shall give us His blessing?" N.

"The founders of the Anglican Church had retained Episcopacy as an ancient, a decent, and a convenient ecclesiastical polity, but had not declared that form of Church government to be of divine institution."—Macaulay's History of England.

I suppose, by the founders of the Anglican Church, Mr. Macaulay meant the Reformers of the Anglican Church. The Church was established in Great Britain in the days of St. Paul, or very soon after. It was not created at the Reformation but purified, so that are we asked by Romanists, Where was your Church before Luther? our answer is: "Just there where theirs is now—one and the same church still; no doubt of that. One in substance, but not one in condition of state and purity; their part of the same Church remaining in corruption, and our part of the same Church under Reformation; the same Naaman and he a Syrian still, but leprous with them and cleansed with us; the same man still."*

Where was your Church before Luther? "Our Church was even there where it is now. We bring in no new faith, no new Church. That which in the times of the ancient Fathers was accounted to be truly and properly Catholic, viz., that which was believed every where, always, and by all, that in the succeeding ages hath evermore been preserved, and is in this day entirely professed in our Church. If you demand then where was the Temple of God all this while? the answer is at hand: there where Antichrist sat. Where was Christ's people? even under Antichrist's priests. And yet this is no justification at all of either Antichrist or of his priests, but a manifestation of God's great power, who is able to uphold his Church even there where Satan's throne is. The enemy indeed hath there sown his tares, but sown them in the Lord's field, and amongst the Lord's wheat; and a field we know may be so overgrown with such evil weeds as these, that at first sight, a man would hardly think that any corn were there at all.

"Those worthy husbandmen that in these last 600 years have taken pains in plucking up those pernicious weeds out of the Lord's field, cannot be rightly said in doing this, either to have brought in a new field, or to have changed the ancient grain. We preach no new faith but the same Catholic faith that ever hath been preached; neither was it any part of our meaning to begin a new Church in these latter days of the world, but to reform the old. A tree that hath the luxurious branches lopped off, and the noxious things that cleave unto it pruned away, is not by this pruning and purging made another tree than it was before; neither is the Church reformed in our days another Church than that which was deformed in the days of our forefathers; though it hath no agreement for all that with popery, which is the pestilence that walketh in those times of darkness, and the destruction that now wasteth at noon day."†

So much for "the founders of the Church of England." With regard to their views of Episcopacy, Dr. Bowden well says, "That any man who can consult the Common Prayer Book of the Church of England, should ever venture to assert, that her Reformers did not place the superiority of Bishops on the ground of Divine right, is to me one of the most extraordinary instances of hardihood that I have ever met with." Even Mosheim declares that the Church of England "constantly insisted on the Divine origin of its government and discipline."

If the readers of the Banner will bear with me, I will cite Dr. Bowden's proof of his position. Dr. Miller had asserted that in the Bishops' book composed by Cranmer and others it is expressly declared that in the New Testament there is no other mention made of any other ecclesiastical orders than Deacons or Ministers, and Presbyters or Bishops. "Now my first observation is, that the book whence your quotation is taken was written several years before the Reformation. Not a single article of importance but the Pope's supremacy was as yet altered. Cranmer and the other Reformers were at this time just beginning to inquire into the doctrines and government of the Church. The public mind began to be agitated, and to keep it under some degree of control, the Institution of a Christian man was composed, in which were maintained all the doctrines of the Church of Rome, except the superiority of the Pope. Cranmer and his associates appear to have been tainted at that time with the distinction invested by the zealous advocates of the Papal see. . . . It appears that before the Reformation, although it was the general opinion, that Episcopacy is a hierarchical power above the Priesthood, or a new power added to that of Presbyters, which power was known always to have been communicated by a new Ordination; yet in the language of the Divines in contradistinction to that of the lawyers, it was not called a distinct order. This distinction Bishop Burnet says, "Sprung out of the very dregs of popery." With this distinction the Reformers before they had risen much above the level of popery, seem to have been in some degree, if not totally infested. They therefore expressed themselves in the current phraseology, that there were but two orders; but at the same time meaning, as the generality of divines did, that episcopacy is a superior degree to the Priesthood. With this we are perfectly satisfied, for a new power and a new ordination, imply all that we contend for.

2. This mode of speaking is similar to that which obtained a long time under the Jewish dispensation. Throughout all the books of Moses, Aaron the first high Priest, is never dignified with any higher character than that of Priest, nor was Eleazar his son, who succeeded him in the High priesthood called by another name. But afterwards, the distinction of names obtained to express the distinction of officers; so that in the Historical parts of the Old Testament, and in the Prophets, the High Priest is called the Chief Priest, and the inferior Priests have their distinctive title.

3. It is a canon of criticism, observed by all judicious interpreters that words and phrases must be taken in the current sense of the times. That I have given that sense correctly is beyond contradiction. This then is the true Key to the meaning of Cranmer and his brethren, when they speak of but two orders as mentioned in Scripture—the order of Priesthood and of Deaconship; the former including Priests the generality of whom possess equal powers; but over these is placed a superior priest by Divine appointment, for the important purpose of preserving the unity of the Church, and preventing those dissensions and schisms which too often spring out of equality. This notion of Episcopal office was invented after transubstantiation became the established doctrine of the Church of Rome; and at the reformation it was pretty general among the clergy. Language in the Erudition of a Christian Man further evinces this to be a correct statement.

The Erudition was published six years after the Institution, and still Cranmer and his associates were staunch Papists, in every article but the Pope's supremacy. That the authors of these books did not maintain the doctrine of ministerial parity is evident from their constantly distinguishing between Bishops and Priests in the Erudition. "Thus St. Paul did consecrate and order Priests and Bishops by the imposition of hands; so they appointed and wylled the other Bishops after them to do the lyke, as St. Paul manifestly sheweth in his Epistle to Timothy and Titus." Again, when the authors say, the Apostles "appointed and will the other Bishops after them to do the lyke"; they drop the word Priests, and say the power was committed to the Bishops who succeeded to the Apostles; and for proof of this they quote the Epistles to Timothy and Titus which they understood precisely in the same sense, that I have given to them; that is, as confining the giving of orders to Bishops, which is the principal distinction between them and Presbyters. If this be not talking like prelatists, I do not know what is. . . . About the year 1547 there was an assembly of divines called by Edward VI. Cranmer the Bishop elect of Westminster, Dr. Cox, and Dr. Radmayn, said, that at the beginning they (Bishops and Presbyters) were all one. The Bishops of London, York, Rochester, Carlisle—Drs. Day, Tresham, Symmons, and Oglethorpe, were of a different opinion. The Bishop of York and Dr. Tresham think that the Apostles were first Priests, and afterwards were made Bishops when the overseeing of other Priests was committed to them. The Bishops of Durham, London, Carlisle, Rochester, Drs. Symmons and Craford, think that the Apostles first were Bishops, and afterwards made others Bishops and Priests. Drs. Coren and Oglethorpe say, that the Apostles were made Bishops and the seventy-two were afterwards made Priests. Dr. Day thinks that the Bishops as they are now called were before Priests.

The Bishop of London, Drs. Edgworth, Redmayn, and Robertson, think it no inconvenience, if a Priest make a Bishop in that time.

Every one of these answers is decidedly in favor of Prelacy except the answer of the three last divines. But when you compare their answers on the 10th question with the answer they give on the 11th, it will be evident that by Priests making Bishops, they mean no more than electing. Thus Dr. Edgworth says, "A Bishop hath authority by Scripture to make a Priest, and that any other ever made a Priest since Christ's time I read not." Albeit, Moses who was anointed Priest, made Aaron Priest and Bishop, by a special commission or revelation from God, without which he would never so have done." Dr. Redmayne says, "Whether any other but only a Bishop may make a Priest, I have not read, but by singular privilege of God, as where Moses made Aaron a Priest. True it is, that the office of a godly Prince is to oversee the Church, and the ministers thereof; but as for making, that is to say ordaining and consecrating of Priests, I think it specially belongs to the office of a Bishop, as far as can be showed by scripture, or any example I suppose from the beginning." Dr. Robertson also says: "I think a Bishop has authority to make a Priest, provided it be done with the permission of the government. But whether it can be done aright by any other than a Bishop I do not know; though I do not remember to have read that it has been done by any other."

"From these explanations it is evident that these three divines of whom alone there could be any doubt, were decidedly opposed to Ordination by Presbyters; and consequently were good Episcopalians.

"Had you been more attentive to the 'Questions and Answers' and compared them with one another, you would, I presume, have been more careful in pronouncing our Reformers not to have been Episcopalians on the ground of Apostolical Institution. Like honest men breaking loose from long established opinions, they were not hasty in their decisions, but in every step of their progress took Scripture and primitive usage for their guides. Their minds were but slowly illuminated; during their progress therefore we are not to look for that decision of opinion, and that perspicuity of language for which they were afterwards distinguished, when their minds were completely and finally made up on the doctrines and government of the Church."*

I fear, Mr. Editor, that the length of my communication precludes its appearance in the Banner. If you could mention the subject yourself in some way, it would be better. Mr. Macaulay's work from the attractiveness of its style, has gained unprecedented favor. Would it not be well to show that he is not so impartial and correct an historian upon the subject of the Church at least, as many are disposed to believe?

WESTWARD, HO!

It has afforded me much pleasure to read the notices contained in our papers of the efforts now making to carry the ministration of the Church to the very far West. Our brethren of the "denominations" are on the move, and why should we be idle? Only three days ago a procession made its appearance in the town in which I reside, and of what, do you suppose, was it composed? Substantial and well-laden wagons, drawn by four and six oxen, with respectable young men for drivers; and at the head a Methodist Minister, accompanied by his wife and five children. Here was the stove, and there the bed, and there again the cooking apparatus. The Bible and Hymn-Book of course were there. The mud was deep, (what else can you expect on an unfinished National road at this season of the year?) and the oxen moved with much less rapidly than communications by telegraph; but by the blessing of Providence the company, (who, by the way have determined to keep the Christian Sabbath,) will reach their place of destination in five months; and then the farmers will go to their respective work, and the Minister will no doubt have learned sufficient patience to enable him to "endure" much in his Master's cause. Will the Church go forward? Or will she make one spasmodic effort, and then desist? If your readers will suffer a single word of exhortation, I would with all due respect say, "He that believeth shall not make haste." Better, far better will it be for us to move with the pace of an ox, and to proceed steadily and surely, than to make a grand demonstration and finally to leave the Missionary field to those who know how to cultivate it.

"BEFORE THE ALTAR."

MR. EDITOR:—

I have not, thus far, joined in the discussion in your columns upon the proper interpretation to be placed upon these words, but the remarks of your correspondent S. X. in your paper of the 3d inst., induce me to offer one or two suggestions. The position of the officiating minister relatively to the congregation is seldom touched upon in the rubrics. The few notices of it are incidental, and there is but one in which the words "Before the Altar" occur. It seems to me that the meaning of the expression is to be ascertained, 1st, from the connection, 2d, from the custom in the English Church, and 3d, from legislation, if legislation there has been upon it.

I. The rubric immediately before the prayer for the Church Militant, enjoins that as soon as the alms have been laid upon the holy table "the Priest shall then place upon the table so much bread and wine as he shall think sufficient. After which done, he shall say, &c." Then occurs the summons to pray for the Church Militant. Nothing more is required here, than that the Priest shall place as much of the elements on the table as he shall deem sufficient, nothing being said with respect to his position,—it being obviously unimportant where he stands when he simply places the elements on the table. But when he is about to proceed to the consecration of the elements, two things are requisite; 1st, that he so arrange them as to enable him to do his work "with readiness," which means, I suppose, to do it without going to different parts of the table while in the act of consecration, and thus occupying his time by unnecessary movements; and "with decency," which means, as I suppose—without confusion, without reaching over the table, endangering the vessels, and bringing the sleeves of his surplice in conflict with the vessels, into the wine, or, perhaps, overturning the bread from the table. 2d. That he so arrange them, as that "he may with more readiness and decency break the bread before the people." Why break the bread before the people? Simply in order that the people may see him break it, and be thus reminded of Christ's body broken for them. Now, if he stand before the Altar, i. e. in front of it, between the Altar and the people, how shall the people see him break the bread? unless indeed he turn his back to the table, and, facing the people, break the bread. Standing before the table, then, would appear to mean that he is to stand between the communicants and the people, simply to place the elements in a position favourable to their ready and decent consecration; but that this consecration must be where the people—supposed to kneel with their faces towards him—can distinctly see him consecrate the elements.

The difficulty on the mind of your correspondent S. X. appears to arise from a misapprehension of the particular work which the Priest is to perform "Before the Altar." According to the rubric, I understand that something is to be done by him "before the Altar," and something else "before the people;" and if I am correct in this,—then the elements are to be ordered by the Priest standing before the Altar, and the breaking of bread is to be performed before the people: the first position being assumed by the Priest, as a mere preparation for the second.

II. In the Church of England the Altar usually stands at the east end of the Church, and the Clergyman is directed—as in our Church—to stand "before the Altar," and to "break the bread before the people." The usual position of the Priest is at the north side. Wheatly refers to Bp. Beveridge, as having shown, that "wherever in the ancient liturgies the Minister is directed to stand before the Altar, the north side of it is always meant."* If this be so, and if the customs in consecrating the elements were the same as in the English Church, then there is an apparent conflict between the Ancient Church, and the present custom of the Church of England, since in the Ancient Church the Minister did not change his position, while in the English Church he does. According to Wheatly, the custom in the Church of England is for the Minister to stand before the Altar while arranging the elements, and at the side while consecrating them.

III. I cannot find that any action has been had upon this subject in the Mother Church; and none has been had in our own. The only action in the American Church relative to the position of the Priest at the Altar being to decide that the words "at the north side," may be understood to mean "at the right side."†

The above question then appears to resolve itself into this simple one—for what is the Priest to stand before the Altar? Wheatly says—"in order to arrange the elements; but that when arranged, he is to consecrate them on the north side."‡

We are not obliged to give implicit credence to what Wheatly says, but his acquaintance with these subjects was profound; his judgment generally good; and in this particular case, his opinion is reasonable.

"ST. VERONICA."

MR. EDITOR:—

Among the items selected from the English papers, that appeared in the Banner of March 3, was the following from the 'English Churchman':—"At Rome the face of our Blessed Saviour on the veil or handkerchief of St. Veronica, is said to have shone for three days, with the greatest brilliancy." Being in no sense a Pyrrhonist, but firmly opposed to indulging in what I have heard from the pulpit, called the "dignity of doubting," yet at the same time sensible, as are even the Romanists themselves, that there have been false relics, and which, they say, have worked miracles, through the good intentions of the believers that have had recourse to them; and further sensible, that some of the miracles worked by relics, have been the result of artifice, e. g. the exhibition of the blood of Christ, at Hales, in Gloucestershire, which, 'twas said, none could see who were in mortal sin; but a subsequent discovery went to show that this pretended blood of Christ, was but the blood of a Duck, which was contained in a vial, one side of which was opaque and the other transparent, and the result to the observer was just in proportion to the amount of his oblations. With such a knowledge of facts, it becomes one at least to "try the spirits," and as an aid to such an effort I must earnestly seek from you, or your correspondents, some information touching the handkerchief in question, and also somewhat in relation to the sainted lady, its possessor; this information is especially desired to set at rest certain indistinct recollections of the origin of this holy lady, and, if my memory misleads me not, 'twere more fitting to style the miracle an enormous rather than a "pious" fraud.

It might possibly have been judicious in Mr. Swift to attempt to advantage religion, by publishing at Dublin, so late as forty years ago, a translation of Jocelin Farnes life of the Patron Saint of Ireland, although some of the miracles reported to have been performed by him, are of that vastness, that in the comparison, those recorded in the New Testament are a mere circumstance. Merely for the sake of establishing the assertion, the following is noted for its peculiarity—A man had been guilty of stealing and devouring a goat, the property of the Saint; upon being charged with the transgression, he stoutly denied, whereupon the goat from the stomach of the man did commence to bleat most lustily, and proclaimed the merit of St. Patrick, for which, the sin of the father was visited upon the children, all his offspring being afflicted with goat's beards. The disseminating such stories, and their acceptance by any, however ignorant, marks two things: great boldness on the one part, and proportional humility on the other, but at that time, this publication was regarded, as well it might be, as a bold venture.

If we recede a space, we find however more audacious attempts than this; for 'twas possible for the Church of Rome at one time, so to presume upon the minds of her benighted children, as to persuade them to believe, that a Monk of St. Anthony not only saw at Jerusalem some of the rays of the star that led the wise men to Bethlehem, but also a vial of the sweat of St. Michael, produced at his encounter with the devil; and more still, the snout of the Seraphim that appeared to St. Francis, and that he actually carried the same, with other relics equally curious, but too gross to record, home with him.

Common sense would seem to dictate, that even in any age, such religious romances were better calculated to promote infidelity, than extend true religion; and 'tis yet more remarkable that in these days, when the advantages of education are beginning to be availed of by all, the Church of Rome, in her hour of need, should attempt, even in Italy, that prolific soil of relics and superstition, to impose upon the credulity of the world by such exhibitions; it marks as certainly a desperate cause, as it tells a dreadful doom.

In concluding a request made with so long a preface, and so large a sequel, it might still be proper to admit that the wondrous workings of this miraculous handkerchief, reminds one of another, in which there was

"—magic in the web of it

A Sybil, that had number'd in the world
The sun to make two hundred compasses
In her prophetic fury sew'd the work;
The worms were hallow'd that did breed the silk,
And it was dyed in mummy"—

but it is not to be questioned that you or your contributors can easily remove this apparent identity. G.

Obituary.

Departed this life, in Mobile, on the 16th of February, Mrs. FRANCES E. K. BATTLE, wife of Mr. John A. M. Battle, leaving a husband and seven children to mourn their irreparable loss.

Death is daily doing his work, and taking from the earth hundreds and thousands whose departure is severely felt: but seldom does he find such an object for his shaft as the subject of this notice.

Her loss is in the fullest sense irreparable, and felt to be so, not only by those who were nearest her heart, not only by her own Church, but by a whole community. No individual could have been taken from us whose loss would be more severely and generally felt.

Possessed naturally of unusual loveliness of mind and person, she had added the still more beautiful ornament of a meek and quiet spirit, which in the sight of God is of great price. Having very early in life, at the age of fifteen, renewed her baptismal vows, and joined in full communion with the Church, all her faculties and powers were consecrated to God's service. Religion was the work of her life, and all who knew her can testify how diligently she sought to do that work, how ardent and joyful was her piety, how benevolent her feelings, and unbounded her charity. Like her Divine Lord, according to the measure of her gift of grace, "she went about doing good." The Church of her affections, and the Church's poor, were ever in her thoughts and her chief objects of interest, and they, next her own family, will be the keenest sufferers by her removal from earth. As few, probably, have ever approached nearer the stature of a perfect christian wife and mother, so very few have ever made their influence more generally and permanently felt in the congregations and communities of which they were members, than she did in Mobile. Most of her early life was spent in Newbern, N. C., where she was confirmed by Bishop Ives. For the last ten years she had resided in Mobile, and here her labors of love were most abundant, and her piety most rapidly progressive.

Heavy as is our loss, we mourn not as those without hope. We are fully assured that she has exchanged a world of trouble and sorrow for a home of rest and joy unspeakable. Her christian character grew brighter and brighter every hour during life, her joy and peace more permanent, her frame of mind more spiritual. She was meek, patient, and trustful during her last sufferings, which, she said, were more excruciating than she had ever known. Her quiet submission never forsook her, and her faith continued strong unto the end. Even when thoughts of her husband and children occupied her mind, she said to one of her dearest friends she "could not feel disturbed, but would fly at once from her fears, and seek to hide herself and them under the wing of the Almighty." And her passage through the dark valley was in perfect keeping with this frame of mind and with her whole life. Her death was so peaceful and gentle as to give to those about her the impression, which was indeed a glorious reality, that she had sweetly fallen asleep. She had gone to rest in the arms of Jesus. May our last end be like hers. F. L. T.

THE INDISPENSABLE ELEMENT IN ANY GREAT HUMAN CHARACTER.—But—sir—political eminence and professional fame fade away and die with all things earthly. Nothing of character is really permanent, but virtue and personal worth. They remain. Whatever of excellence is wrought into the soul itself, belongs to both worlds. Real goodness does not attach itself merely to this life, it points to another world. Political or professional fame cannot last forever, but a conscience void of offence before God and man, is an inheritance for eternity. Religion, therefore, is a necessary, an indispensable element in any great human character. There is no living without it. Religion is the tie that connects man with his Creator, and holds him to his throne. If that tie be all sundered, all broken, he floats away, a worthless atom in the universe, its proper attractions all gone, its destiny thwarted, and its whole future nothing but darkness, desolation, and death. A man of no sense of religious duty is he whom the Scriptures describe—in such terse but terrific manner—as "living without God in the world." Such a man is out of his proper being, out of the circle of all his duties, out of the circle of all his happiness, and away, far, far away, from the purposes of his creation.—Daniel Webster.

DREADFUL ACCIDENT AT GLASGOW.

On Saturday evening, about half-past 7 o'clock, one of the most fearful catastrophes that ever occurred in Scotland took place in the Theatre Royal, Dunlop-street. Very shortly after the performance had commenced an alarm was given that a fire had broken out in the upper gallery, and, as a matter of course, the audience which was numerous in the gallery, became much excited.

It was soon apparent to the manager, that the fire had been occasioned by an explosion of gas, and he, together with the members of his company, used their utmost exertions to restore order, in which they partially succeeded. Meanwhile, however, the alarm had been conveyed to the central police offices, and the fire brigade was very soon at the theatre, and immediately commenced operations, which had the effect of increasing the fears of the people, and a general rush was made to the door in order to escape from the fire, which had, in fact, been previously extinguished. Despite all remonstrance the people would be out, and the result was the premature death of sixty-four individuals, besides four more or less injured. It would be vain to attempt to convey any idea of the scene which the theatre presented at the time of the accident; that can be better imagined than expressed. The authorities were very soon at the theatre, and, while assistance was being procured, the gallery stair was ascended, when, at one of the landing-places, was discovered a scene of the most horrifying description—men, women, and children huddled together, trodden under foot, dead, and dying. The poor creatures were carried to houses adjoining, and every exertion used to restore animation, but, unfortunately, these exertions were in but few instances successful. Sixty-one were dead, and three sent to the Royal Infirmary; two died upon the way, and one shortly after. Eleven persons, slightly bruised, were able to be removed to their homes, and others are still in the Infirmary in a dangerous state. The sixty-one dead bodies were, in the course of the evening, removed to the Clyde-street Hospital, and there kept till Sunday morning for identification.

About ten o'clock the authorities were at the hospital, and it was arranged, to satisfy the relatives of the poor creatures who had been waiting in hundreds around the hospital during the night, to admit them. The bodies were spread out on the floor of the large shed, and when each relative, father, mother, wife, or other friends were recognized, their shrieks rent the air. One woman claimed three as her own. Without scarcely a single exception the sufferers belong to the lower class of society, and are for the most part lads between fourteen and seventeen years old; the only female amongst the dead was one girl three years of age.

Those who had hoped, and those who feared, that the secession of Mr. BAPTIST NOEL would prove a severe blow to the Church of England, and that his example would be extensively followed have happily been equally disappointed. We fully expected from the first, that it would be so. His costly volume gives no new facts—none which were not notorious—while it contains no small proportion of gross exaggeration, if not positive untruth, and this, too, unredeemed by skilful or deep argument, and above all, with little evidence of that chastened sadness which a good man, under such circumstances, should exhibit. Nay, the work is deficient even in that Christian, loving charity for which Mr. NOEL had hitherto received much credit, and for the sake of which he had received such an unexampled degree of toleration for his manifest violations of the Doctrines and Discipline of the Church. He has fallen in every sense of the word: and he has fallen alone.

THE NEW BISHOPRIC OF VICTORIA, HONG KONG.—The new colonial Diocese of Victoria, of which the Rev. George Smith, M. A., of Magdalene Hall, Oxford, is to be the first Bishop, has received Her Majesty's approval, and the Bishop elect will be consecrated in the course of a few weeks. The Bishop of Victoria will have jurisdiction over the members of the Church of England in the five free ports, and wherever else on the continent of China he may find an opening. The endowment of the Bishopric of Victoria has been provided for entirely by private subscription. Soon after the treaty with the Chinese empire had been concluded, by which facilities for intercourse with the people never before enjoyed were conceded to European nations, the Bishop of London issued a pastoral letter inviting the Clergy of his Diocese to collect the offerings of their congregations in Church for a fund towards the endowment of a Bishopric in the Chinese seas. The total sum at present available towards the erection of the See may be stated at 18,000*l.*, 6,000*l.* of which were collected in consequence of the Bishop of London's letter, 2,000*l.* contributed by the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel in Foreign Parts, and 10,000*l.* by "A Brother and Sister," who have also offered 2,000*l.* towards the erection of a Missionary College at Hong Kong, in connection with the Church. Of this College the Bishop will be the warden, a plan, which, wherever practicable, has been adopted in the new Colonial Sees. The warden's duty will consist in preparing a body of students, native and European, to be trained for missionary employment in China. As soon as possible, after the erection of the Bishopric of Victoria, measures will be taken for the formation of Dioceses in other colonies and dependencies of the British Crown, the preliminary proceedings for carrying out the object having been entrusted to his Honour the Vice-Chancellor of England, Sir George Staunton, Bart., Sir James Urnstone, the Venerable Anthony Grant, D. C. L., Archdeacon of St. Albans, and Rector of Romford, W. H. C. Plowden, Esq., W. Wilberforce Bird, Esq., Gilbert Matheson, Esq., and the Rev. Ernest Hawkins, B. D.

CANADA WEST.—The Bishop of Toronto, in a letter to the Society for Promoting Christian Knowledge, states as the result of his late tours, by land and water, for nearly 2,300 miles, the confirmation of between 1,500 and 1,600 young persons.

Clergy Reserve Fund.—We are sorry to observe, from the Toronto Church, that the distribution of the surplus of this fund seems to be creating an undue anxiety in the minds of Canadian Churchmen. Surely no good result can follow the public expression of this feeling by parties whose interests are concerned.

ST. PAUL'S CHURCH, DOYLESTOWN.

Mr. Editor,—I was gratified to see the notice of St. Paul's Church, Doylestown, in a former number of your paper. An effort is about to be made to free the Church from debt, and I trust you will do all you can to urge attention to the matter. You are aware that, in consequence of a wise determination on the part of our beloved Bishop, it cannot be consecrated until this is done. He is to visit the parish early in April, at which time I trust the debt will be cancelled, and the building set apart for the worship of Almighty God. Doylestown is twenty-four miles from Philadelphia, the county town of Bucks, in which but little effort has been made to plant the Church. Being so near your city, located in an elevated, healthy and beautiful part of the county, having a good turnpike to connect it with Philadelphia, and affording a pleasant retreat for citizens during the heat of summer, the effort particularly commends itself to the favorable notice of Philadelphia churchmen; indeed there are few parishes that need the fostering care of the benevolent, for a time at least, more than this.

There are few counties within the State in which the devoted minister of Christ will find it more difficult to plant the Church, than in many portions of Bucks. It is emphatically missionary ground; but few, comparatively, being acquainted with the blessed effects of practical religion. Settled originally, mainly by those who imbibed strong prejudices against the Church, a population has grown up with minds strongly fortified against an ordained ministry. A system of education has been encouraged to a great extent, to lead the inhabitants to look upon ministers who receive a salary for preaching with a very unfriendly eye; indeed, the idea of supporting a ministry is considered preposterous. With some honorable exceptions, the Holy Sabbath of the Lord is little regarded, and that sacred day is desecrated by attention to worldly business. As might be expected, under these circumstances, infidelity and skepticism are rampant, and it is not unusual to hear of meetings, not only to set at naught the requisitions of the blessed Word of God, but denying its authenticity also. In fact, the minister of our blessed Lord has to contend against an educated infidelity; and if ever portions of this county are converted to the faith of the Gospel, it will require the trumpet-tongue of a Boanerges to reach hearts blinded and encased in sin.

The worthy Rector of St. Paul's, with untiring energy and zeal, has persevered under the most discouraging circumstances, until a noble edifice has been erected for the worship of Almighty God. Without the exercise of much Christian patience, he must have abandoned the undertaking long since in despair. Certainly no attempt to plant the Church, of late years, seemed so little likely to result in success as this. But the Lord has smiled upon the Rector's devoted labors, and there is now reason to hope that his heart will soon be gladdened with the cheering news, that the debt upon his Church is paid off, and that the Bishop will then be called upon to consecrate it to the worship of the triune Jehovah.

If twenty-two individuals would contribute $50 each, the debt of $1100 would be paid off. No where within the wide range of our Church, is there to be found a more noble and devoted band of single hearted churchmen, than in Philadelphia. Your humble writer knows many whose souls are warmed with a holy zeal for every proper object that tends to the spread of Apostolic truth, who only wait for opportunities to exhibit their devotion to the Church. If I could attract the attention of such choice spirits as those who so recently carried forward to triumphant success, the beautiful Floating Chapel now safely moored in your port, a monument to the piety and zeal of your city churchmen, I should, I think, soon be able to rejoice the heart of the Rector of St. Paul's Church, Doylestown, by saying to him, Sir, the debt of your Church is paid off; you can now worship the Lord under your own vine and fig-tree, none daring to make you afraid.

Survey the field, then, fellow churchmen, to which your attention is now called; and may the Lord "open your hearts" and lead you to assist a struggling little flock to cancel a debt, which can never be done without your aid. By so doing, many will rise up at our Lord's coming to call you blessed.

FOREIGN MISSION OFFICE, New York, March, 1849.

To the Right Rev.

The Bishops of the Prot. Epis. Church:

At the last stated meeting of the Foreign Committee, held 27th February, a resolution was passed, directing the Secretary to lay before the Bishops of the Church, the pecuniary wants of the Mission at Constantinople, and the inability of the Committee to meet them.

In accordance with this direction, the following statement is respectfully made:

That in all their financial arrangements, the Foreign Committee intended to embrace equally, all the stations under their care: that they have never been influenced by a wish to favor or neglect any particular mission; and that the measures they have adopted, are such as were demanded by necessity, and have been approved by experience.

That the Committee have not only been willing, but earnestly desirous, to forward with all diligence, the full amount appropriated by the Board to the Mission at Constantinople.

That using their best efforts to this end, the Committee have not restricted their remittances to the sums specifically contributed to it, but have employed the General Fund, as far as was in their power.

That the failure of the Committee to provide the full amount quarterly IN ADVANCE, has been entirely owing to the backwardness of the Church in contributing to this object.

That far from meriting such gross and calumnious charges, as have of late been repeatedly made in certain journals of the Church, namely, that using their position and the power thereby obtained, the Foreign Committee have strained every nerve in the spirit of thorough partisans to compass the ruin of the Constantinople Mission, and bent on doing their worst to add to his noble titles, martyr, as they have long since made him confessor, have undertaken to starve out Bishop Southgate,—the Committee might justly adopt the language of the Hebrew Elders—"Thy servants are beaten, but THE FAULT IS IN THINE OWN PEOPLE."

That the pecuniary condition of the Mission at Constantinople is now laid before the Right Reverend, the Bishops, with a view to the prompt relief of the Missionary Bishop, in such wise as to them severally may seem expedient; and with the explicit declaration on the part of the Committee, that they are most unfeignedly desirous of affording such relief, and are now, and have been heretofore, ready to do all in their power to promote this object.

That immediate action in the case is the more urgent, inasmuch as the Committee are advised by Bishop Southgate of his intention to visit the United States before the meeting of the Board in June next, partly with a view to the re-establishment of his health; and, that in the event of his returning to Constantinople, his desire is to confer with the Committee and the Board in reference to the future prosecution of his work, to examine institutions of learning, to procure text books, apparatus, &c., and to lay before the Church the importance of education in Turkey; and that, for this purpose, and to provide for past expenditures, the full amount authorized by the Board up to 1st July next, should be remitted immediately; to do which, the Foreign Committee wait for nothing but the receipt of funds.

Most respectfully submitted,

In behalf of the Foreign Committee,

PIERRE P. IRVING,
Secretary.

Selections by J. A. Merrick

A POOR PARSON OF A TOWN.

CHAUCER.

"Now if a shepherd know not which grass will bane, or which not, how is he fit to be a shepherd?"

HERBERT, C. PARSON.

A good man there was of religion,
That was a poor PARSON OF A TOWN;
But rich he was in holy thought and work,
He was also a learned man, a clerk,
That Christ's Gospel truly would preach,
His parishens devoutly would he teach,
Benigne he was and wondrous diligent,
And in adversity full patient:
And such he was yproved often times;
Full loth were he to curse for his tithes,
But rather would he given, out of doubt,
Unto his poor parishioners about,
Of his offering, and eke of his substance;
He could in little thing have suffiance.
Wide was his parish, and houses far asunder,
But he nor felt nor thought of rain or thunder,
In sickness and in mischief to visit
The farthest in his parish, much and oft,
Upon his feet, and in his hand a staff.
This noble ensample to his sheep he gave,
That first he wrought, and afterward he taught,
Out of the gospel he the words caught,
And this figure he added yet thereto,
But if gold rust, what should iron do?
And if a Priest be foul, on whom we trust,
No wonder if a common man do rust;
Well ought a Priest ensample for to give
By his cleanness, how his sheep should live.
He set not his benefice to hire,
Or left his sheep bewildered in the mire,
And ran unto London, unto Saint Paul's,
To seek him a chanterie for souls,
Or with a brotherhood to be withhold?
But dwelt at home, and kept well his fold,
So that the wolf he made it not miscarry.
He was a shepherd and no mercenarie,
And though he holy were, and virtuous,
He was to sinful men not dispiteous,
Nor of his speech dangerous nor high,
But in his teaching discrete and benigne.
To draw his folk to heaven, with fairness,
By good ensample, was his business:
But if were any person obstinate,
Whether he were of high, or low estate,
Him would he reprove sharply for the nones,
A better Priest I trow that nowhere is.
He waited after neither pomp nor reverence,
Nor maked him no spiced conscience,
But Christ's lore and his Apostles twelve
He taught, but first he followed it himselfe.

THE GREEK CHURCH IN TURKEY.*

In a political point of view the Græco-catholic or orthodox eastern church in Constantinople derives her followers from seven different races. In the first and chief place, we have the Greek speaking subjects of the Sublime Porte; next the Slavonians of Bulgaria and Servia; thirdly, the Arnauts; fourthly the Wallachians and Moldavians—all these four races bring Ottoman vassals: fifthly, Hellenists, or subjects of the king of Greece; sixthly, Ionians, from the Ionian islands; and seventhly; Russians. To these you may add the gypsies, who, however, are not in communion with the preceding. The Greeks are in a majority; for their numbers here and along the Bosphorus cannot be short of 300,000: the Hellenists may be about 16,000; and the Russo-Greeks about 200; but I have not succeeded in ascertaining the numbers of the other races; they cannot weigh heavy in the scale, and do not probably exceed 2,000 at the utmost, three-fourths of them being Arnauts. The whole of these Greeks profess to be Christians. If you ask one of them what he is, he will answer you, "a follower of Christ," and will tell you that he considers Turks and Jews, as well as all Romanists, Protestants, and Armenians, to be every one of them, without exception, Gentiles or heathens; he will tell you, too, that a Greek "dies;" but the Romanist, Protestant, Armenian, Jew, and Turk, "rot like dogs." The fanaticism of these religionists transcends all bounds; so much so indeed that the very alphabet forms part of their faith. For instance, we have a considerable number of "united catholics;" such Greeks and Hellenists as belong to the Roman church, although they speak nothing but Greek: This class are not allowed to print their religious books in any but Roman characters, the use of the native Greek type being refused them. The clergy of both these persuasions mutually anathematize the others' books, whether printed in the Greek or Roman character. I grieve to say that the orthodox Greek Church is, in spiritual respects, a caput mortuum—dead in forms and observances; whilst the Protestants, and the Calvinists, especially, have cast all forms away, and retained nothing but the essence of Christianity, the Greeks have lost the essence, and retained the forms only; it is denuded, therefore, of all power to impart life to the soul, much more of any means of grace to extend its ramifications or enlarge its borders. The whole being of the Greek clergy in this capital may be reduced to the following points: imprimis, hatred of all who differ from them, exhibited more particularly in their bitter antipathy to every other Christian church, but especially the "united Greek; next, the person is to be carefully disjoined from the office of the priest; then they have no fewer than ninety-one holy days, on which all labour ceases: they keep one hundred and ninety-five fast days, varying in austerity; for instance, no meat is allowed on some of them, while on others abstinence from wine, oil, and butter is enforced: again, on some the use of black food, such as olives, is prohibited; and on others nothing may be eaten but bread: on some days, it may be mixed with olives or onions, whilst on others mussels and fish may be added. Again, no orthodox Greek may read any books which are not printed in the Greek character. I need scarcely mention that image-worship is of flourishing growth; but it does not thrive more vigorously, I admit, than among the papists.

I must refer you to Von Hammer's "Constantinople and the Bosphorus" for an account of the Greek churches here. The finest of them are the head patriarch's church, and that of the patriarch of Jerusalem in the Fanar quarter, and the suburban fane of St. Demetrius: the first two of these contain several specimens of the princely munificence of the Russian autocrat. The present patriarch, is the most reverend M. Anthimus, who has jurisdiction over eighty-five metropolitans, and four archbishops. The patriarch of Antioch is the most reverend M. Methodius, under whom are fourteen metropolitans in Asia Minor and Syria. M. Cyrillus is patriarch of Jerusalem, and chief pastor over the metropolitans of Ptolemais, Bethlehem, and Petra, and the bishops of Mount Sinai, Mount Tabor, Gaza, Lydda, Jaffa, Sebaste, Naplus, and Salt. M. Jerotheos is patriarch of Alexandria, to which is attached the bishopric of Lydia.

I attended the paschal solemnities observed in the patriarchal church last Easter eve: they lasted from midnight to four o'clock in the morning: The patriarch himself took the lead on the occasion, shifting himself repeatedly from his chair of state to his post behind the altar: he was assisted by a long retinue of deacons, secretaries, &c., as well as by certain officials called aristarchi, and also by the logothet, or representative of the hospodars of Wallachia. The church was full to overflowing. There was something very striking in that part of the solemnities where the patriarch steps forward with a lighted taper, and the whole congregation rush forward to light their own tapers from that one: the interior of the fane appeared at once in a blaze. I had taken the precaution of forwarding my card to his reverence; and, as he had the kindness to assign me a seat immediately opposite to his own, I had a full view of the entire proceedings. After the service was over, the patriarch invited me to his rooms, where the fast was broken by all present partaking of a cup of broth; and, as soon as that was disposed of, I had the honour, in common with the patriarch and the logothet, of being greeted with the salutation, "Christ is risen." Coffee and pipes were now introduced; and after half-an-hour's agreeable chat, we took our leave; each of us greeting the patriarch with the same salutation, and being honoured in return with a couple of painted eggs.

The Greek liturgy is indescribably monotonous and tedious. Their Churches have no organs, because they are accounted a papal invention, and no bells, as the use of them is not allowed by the Turkish authorities. The Greeks endeavour to make up by choristers or chanters for the absence of the former, and as a substitute for the latter, send criers round the streets to summon the congregation to public worship: in the interior, however, the echo of blows falling upon two suspended planks calls the devout to prayers.

In point of intelligence the Greek occupies the foremost rank among the sultan's lieges: one cannot but lament his quickness of parts should be generally so misapplied. He is notorious for cunning, deceit, and mendacity: would that it were a redeeming feature in his character, that he is almost the only individual among those lieges who gives himself any concern about the interests of learning and science! Constantius, the ex-patriarch, is the author of the best "Topography of Constantinople." I met with several well-educated medical practitioners among the Greek community; but what shall I say in favour of the Arnauts, Slavonians, Wallachians, Servians, and Russians? The first are bakers, or bakers' men; the Slavonians are herdsmen, drovers, and thieves; and the Ionians a race of scoundrels and banditti. The Russians stand somewhat higher in the scale, being traders or merchants.—Ch. of Eng. Mag.

ARTILLERY IN THE SANCTUARY.

"Do you mean guns?"

Yes, verily; and a heavy report they give.

"I have heard that our Pilgrim Fathers carried their firearms with them to their places of worship so as to be ready for their Indian foes; but as for guns in our modern sanctuaries, I never dreamed of the thing."

Well, there is no dream about this—certainly there then is no dreaming when these explosions take place.

"But you don't say they fire them off in church?"

Yea, my friend, even in prayer or sermon-time!

"And all this in this land?"

Verily, in this land; and in some of our most respectable congregations too.

"Well I am confounded!"

And most certainly you would be, if you were to be as near one of those pieces of artillery as I have been while in church when it exploded.

But I perceive that I must explain. Well, you know that the human face divine has a handle—a nasal promontory—a nose, you know. And people carry it with them to church. Only now and then a case to the contrary. And some people pay attention to it, when they get it there—aye, very great attention. It seems if some of them had not done much with it during the week, and in a sense had saved up their doing for it till that very convenient and leisure time, public worship.—And then they take hold of the thing in earnest. And then there are great guns and no mistake. There is a captain of this species of artillery of my acquaintance. He is blest with a piece of this kind of ordnance of rarest endowment in regard to the massive grandeur of its report. It is always with him at church, and when he pulls out that red pocket-handkerchief, and claps it upon his face, know ye that the pillars of the temple are about to tremble. The captain not seldom reaches this climax of his glory in sermon-time. The preacher must "fetch up," as a matter of course, till the explosion is over. And our preacher has got the hang of the thing so well that, on certain signals being visible, he lets the gospel trumpet he is blowing drop, pro tempore, and resumes when the reverberation is over. I do not know but the captain thinks the sermon needs a touch, now and then, of this kind of thunder, to supply the speaker's lack of emphasis: and so he hands him over a clap or two in each discourse.

Besides the emphatic aid given the speaker as above referred to, there is another advantage which I must name. The dogs, you know, in not a few places, especially in the country, think they have as good a right to attend church as any body, and on the ground, likely, that they can get as much good as many that do go. One of these, and he was none of your nervous and rickety ones that have to lean against a mullen to bark, came into our sanctuary. And having looked about to his satisfaction, and having illustrious example, adjusted himself for a snooze, as he saw other people doing. Poor fellow! he lay down in unconscious proximity to that artillery captain. The regular time came for an explosion! And such a waking up no quadruped ever got before. On his feet in a moment, that he was; and, with an unearthly cry of terror he fled. It seemed as if, in the horror of his heart, he would have shot clear of his own skin, which the captain might have picked up as a trophy! I believe the creature has done attending public worship. At least he comes not to our place, and I don't wonder.

But the captain has a formidable rival.—Uncle Zadok is a worshipper in our house. He is a man of large specific gravity and with great nasal power. The captain's explosions are voluntary; but here is a trumpeter, who blows only as notion gives him a jog. But he can SNEEZE in notes of terrible sublimity! Our sanctuary can testify to that. Now a body may sneeze, and with a little kindness and courtesy to the preacher, fellow-worshippers, &c., may muffle and smooth the matter, so that a peaceful sleeper by one's side, would not be in the slightest disturbed. But Uncle Zadock does not understand this. And when he does operate in this line, it is none of your meek and quiet things which have been suffocated and had pretty nearly died under a pocket handkerchief. It is a full blast, and the whole temple responds by echo to its power. I have not seen the plastering fall yet, but I have thought the windows did sometimes rattle, though, mercifully no glass has been hitherto broken.

Since I am upon this topic I will just say also, that we have some lighter artillery, which helps to fill up the gaps between the Captain's and Uncle Zadok's operations. Whether they have caught the key note of those performers, or operate on their own hook, I cannot say, but we have those who can couch to the satisfaction of any kind of ears, even the longest that were ever brought into the sanctuary. They might hush the matter up, it would seem, so that they should scarcely know any thing of it. But they have not yet reached such a point of courtesy and self-denial: therefore do we know that we have at least the left wing of the army to which the Captain and Zadok belong.

Now, it is not to be denied that, in view of all these facts, our preacher has no small difficulty to steer a sermon through such a sea and not have some parts of it lost. The Captain is likely to nullify a sentence or two, and Uncle Zadok takes off the wing or the leg of a paragraph, and the small arms must have at least the pin feathers.

It just occurs to me, that there is one class of the congregation who can be most wakefully enlisted to have quietness in our sanctuary, viz., those who are such sufferers, by being broken of their rest by the explosions above named. Some of the most respectable of our citizens have been startled out of the most comfortable naps ever taken under preaching. A sneeze of Uncle Zadok's has brought old Squire Gripe on to his feet, in the horror that Millerism was true sure enough, and that the end of all things was at hand.—And one of the Captain's operations, with that red handkerchief, has waked Judge Lawful pretty nearly into a petrification, in dread that some awful convulsion of nature had taken place. Now to wake a man up in such a dreadful hurry, produces a pitiful, not to say a ludicrous bewilderment, which gives no specially dignified aspect to the roused slumberer. While the dread of being shaken into wakefulness by this kind of pew thunder, is an in terrorem dissuasion to many who might otherwise avail themselves of a sanctuary opportunity for a nap. I think, if we can muster these church sleepers into a wide awake opposition, that Uncle Zadok and the Captain will have to shut up shop; or to suffocate their thunders, that it shall be harmless to preacher, sleepers, and all the people.

SIMON.

THE NIGHT FUNERAL OF A SLAVE.

Travelling recently, on business, in the interior of Georgia, I reached just at sunset, the mansion of the proprietor, through whose estate for the last half hour of my journey, I had pursued my way. My tired companion pricked his ears, and with a low whinny indicated his pleasure, as I turned up the broad avenue leading to the house. Calling to a black boy in view, I bade him inquire of his owner, if I could be accommodated with lodgings for the night.

My request brought the proprietor himself to the door, and from thence to the gate, when, after a scrutinizing glance at my person and equipments, he inquired my name, business, and destination. I promptly responded to his questions, and he invited me to alight and enter the house, in the true spirit of Southern hospitality.

He was apparently thirty years of age, and evidently a man of education and refinement. I soon observed an air of gloomy abstraction about him; he said but little, and even that little seemed the result of an effort to obviate the seeming want of civility to a stranger. At supper the mistress of the mansion appeared, and did the honors of the table, in her particular department; she was exceedingly lady-like and beautiful, only as Southern women are, that is beyond comparison with those of any other portion of this Republic I have ever seen. She retired immediately after supper, and a servant handing some splendid Habannas on a small silver tray, we had just seated ourselves comfortably before the enormous fire of oak wood, when a servant appeared at the end door near my host, hat in hand, and uttered in subdued but distinct tones, the, to me, startling words—

* Extract from a letter from Constantinople.

"Master, do coffin hab come."

"Very well," was the only reply, and the servant disappeared.

My host remarked my gaze of inquisitive wonder, and replied to it—

"I have been sad, sad," said he, "to-day. I have had a greater misfortune than I have experienced since my father's death. I lost this morning the truest and most reliable friend I had in the world—one whom I have been accustomed to honor and respect since my earliest recollection; he was the playmate of my father's youth, and the mentor of mine; a faithful servant, an honest man, and a sincere Christian. I stood by his bedside to-day, and with his hands clasped in mine, I heard the last words he uttered; they were, 'Master, meet me in heaven.'"

His voice faltered a moment, and he continued, after a pause, with increased excitement—

"His loss is a melancholy one to me. If I left my home, I said to him, 'John, see that all things are taken care of,' and I knew that my wife and child, property and all, were as safe as though they were guarded by an hundred soldiers. I never spoke a harsh word to him in all my life, for he never merited it. I have a hundred others, many of them faithful and true, but his loss is irreparable."

I come from a section of the Union where slavery does not exist, and I brought with me all the prejudices which so generally prevail in the free States with regard to this "institution." I had already seen much to soften these, but the observation of years would have failed to give me so clear an insight into the relation between master and servant as this simple incident. It was not the haughty planter, the lordly tyrant, talking of his dead slave, as of his dead horse, but the kind-hearted gentleman, lamenting the loss, and eulogizing the virtues of his good old friend.

After an interval of silence, my host resumed—

"There are," said he, "many of the old man's relatives and friends who would wish to attend his funeral. To afford them an opportunity, several plantations have been notified that he will be buried to-night; some, I presume, have already arrived; and desiring to see that all things are properly prepared for his interment, I trust you will excuse my absence for a few moments."

"Most certainly, sir; but," I added, "if there is no impropriety, I would be pleased to accompany you."

"There is none," he replied; and I followed him to one of a long row of cabins, situated at the distance of some three hundred yards from the mansion. The house was crowded with negroes, who all arose on our entrance, and many of them exchanged greetings with my host, in tones that convinced me that they felt that he was an object of sympathy from them! The corpse was deposited in the coffin, attired in a shroud of the finest cotton materials, and the coffin itself painted black.

The master stopped at its head, and laying his hand upon the cold brow of his faithful bondsman, gazed long and intently upon features with which he had been so long familiar, and which he now looked upon for the last time on earth; raising his eyes at length and glancing at the serious countenances now bent upon him, he said solemnly and with much feeling—

"He was a faithful servant and a true Christian; if you follow his example, and live as he lived, none of you need fear, when the time comes for you to lay here."

A patriarch, with the snow of eighty winters on his head, answered—

"Master, it is true, and we will try to live like him."

There was a murmur of general assent, and after giving some instructions relative to the burial, we returned to the dwelling.

About nine o'clock a servant appeared with the notice that they were ready to move, and to know if further instructions were necessary. My host remarked to me, that by stepping into the piazza, I would probably witness, to me, a novel scene. The procession had moved, and its route led within a few yards of the mansion. There were at least one hundred and fifty negroes, arranged four deep, and following a wagon in which was placed the coffin; down the entire length of the line, at intervals of a few feet, on each side, were carried torches of the resinous pine, and here called light wood. About the centre was stationed the black preacher, a man of gigantic frame and stentorian lungs, who gave out from memory the words of a hymn suitable to the occasion. The Southern negroes are proverbial for the melody and compass of their voices, and I thought that hymn, mellowed by distance, the most solemn and yet the sweetest music that had ever fallen upon my ear. The stillness of the night and strength of their voices enabled me to distinguish the air at the distance of half a mile.

It was to me a strange and solemn scene, and no incident of my life has impressed me with more powerful emotions than the night funeral of a poor negro. For this reason I have hastily and most imperfectly sketched its leading features.

I am but a brief sojourner here. I hail from a colder clime, where it is our proud boast that all men are free and equal. I shall return to my Northern home, deeply impressed with the belief, that, dispensing with the name of freedom, the negroes of the South are the happiest and most contented people on the face of the earth.

VIA TOR.

From the (London) Guardian.

ORPHAN'S HOME AT DEVONPORT.

The object of the Institution is thus stated, and the charges against it thus answered by its Founder.

Examination by the Bishop continued.—We call ourselves Sisters of Mercy; I did intend that we should designate ourselves Sisters of Charity; but hearing that a Roman Catholic community of that name already existed in Stonehouse, I was afraid we might have been confused with them; the name is so familiar to me; I am not aware that there are Sisters of Mercy in the Protestant Cantons of Switzerland, but I know there are Sisters of Charity there, and that is probably what made that name more familiar to me. I did not adopt the title of Lady Superior to make my institution similar to a convent; it was not my intention to unite the Orphan's Home with nunneries or other institutions in Roman Catholic countries; our duties are as follows—We receive orphans and educate them ourselves; we collect schools and support them; we visit the sick and destitute poor; and any other work of charity that comes under our notice we would gladly perform. The title of Sisters of Mercy is, in my idea, a proper one to signify the objects we desire to carry out. It was in consequence of reading your lordship's appeal on the spiritual destitution of Devonport that appeared in the public papers that I came here. I asked my father if he would allow me to come and labour among the people here, and he gave me his willing consent. I had some private means of my own. At first I did not resolve upon devoting these means, but afterwards our plans grew, and I asked my father's consent to devote this property, which he cordially acceded to. My father came down, and would have been here now but for illness. When he came down here he bought the chapel in Morice-Town. I think that, from some legal difficulty, the purchase has not yet been completed, but he has the occupation and pays the rent. The poor are very grateful to me for my labours among them. I collected the children myself out of the streets. I saw them, went up to them, and asked them if they had ever been to school, and if they were willing to be taught, and then desired them to lead me to their parents. They did so, and in consequence of this I collected three schools myself, one of boys, and two of girls. I have stopped the boys engaged on the works, and asked them if they wished to be taught. They were like little savages. (Shame, shame.) I however got many of them to come to school, and the boys still continued to show great earnestness, and they still come every Monday. [The following is omitted in the Independent, but we supply it from the Herald.—] "The children in the streets of Morice-Town were like little savages when she first came among them, but those in the schools were now much improved by the instruction afforded them. She went on for the space of a month, teaching six boys, when one evening the door of the room in which they were assembled, was burst open, and about thirty boys came in, and said they wished to be taught. She took them in, and they still continued under instruction. They were at work during the day, and were instructed in those hours of the evening in which they were before accustomed to seek recreation. They loved their evening school very much. This evening school was in operation every evening, until within the past fortnight, when she told the boys that the state of her health would not admit of her continuing the instruction before afforded. They expressed their deep regret, and said they hoped they were not to be dispersed to the winds, so they now came to her for instruction every Monday evening."

Miss Sellon then read the following statement:—

"My Lord—Your lordship has already inquired into the truth of printed statements, which are as false a picture of the Sisterhood, as are the false pretences on which it was extracted. I will not say any thing of the morality of this proceeding, by which young persons whom I found in poverty and wretchedness, housed, taught, and treated (as I suppose even these unhappy girls will allow) with the most tender kindness, have been decoyed away and taught to speak against me. I will say nothing of the manner in which domestic privacy has been outraged, and yet what would in any other case be thought of one who inquired of an attendant, and published about what an Englishwoman wore beneath her dress or laid under her pillow. Of my own private devotions I cannot be expected to say any thing. If nothing else is to be sacred, these at least may be kept for the eyes of Him to whom they are said, and who seeth in secret."

"Yet, to satisfy any doubting minds, I will say that they are such as an English Churchwoman would use—that I have not desired any thing out of the English Church, and use nothing foreign to her spirit. I use no invocation, nor any prayer, except to the Three Persons in the All Holy Trinity, and I will add for the satisfaction of those who may wish to know it, that a cross is sometimes laid on my pillow, reminding me in the silent hours when recollections of a most peaceful and happy past rush upon the memory, that it may be He who bore that cross for us will yet grant a higher happiness, a deeper peace, amid all that is most bitter to a woman's heart, calumny and ingratitude, public animadversion and suspicion."

"With regard to the little oratory, it is nothing new to have a room set apart for prayer. It is a pious custom recommended by English Divines, when it is practicable, and used by English lay persons. In our small house where each cannot have her own room, there can be nothing strange that we should have one quiet place where we may retire for our devotions, amid the burden and fatigues of a most busy life. Ignorance alone can invest this with the idea of Popery."

"The only other charge about the oratory is that we put flowers there. Why not? Is there more harm in our having flowers in the oratory on a festival than in a drawing-room for an evening party? We have all been accustomed from childhood to see our chambers and houses made to look as gay as they can with evergreens and holly. Some of our friends have brought us flowers, and we have placed them in what is to us the happiest place in our house. But then a wreath of flowers was put upon the cross on the festival of the Virgin Mary. Why is this said 'on the festival of the Virgin Mary,' but just for odium's sake; as though we wished to pay more respect to her than the Church of England does. Why deal thus in innuendo? The festival is a festival of our Lord. The Church calls it the 'Presentation of Christ in the Temple, commonly called the Purification of St. Mary the Virgin.' Friends gave us some flowers; some of the Sisters, when the day's labour was over, amused themselves in twining a wreath, and placed it on the cross. Men may think it a frivolous act, but to us it is natural. Women may give their whole heart to God and his poor to labour for them, but we are women still, and have women's tastes. We still love flowers and pictures. We have done with gay dresses, for they are expensive, and would be a mockery to the poor, but we like the brightness and gaiety of flowers, and friends give them to us; why may we not use them as we will?"

*[It is worth notice that in the three local papers who have shown great opposition to Miss Sellon, in giving that lady's statement, the title of this festival is printed by two of them as "the Presentation of Saints," &c.; and the other as "the Presentation of St. Mary," &c. Such a coincident perversion can be hardly accidental.]

And when, perhaps, too weary with our day's work to do anything else, why may we not plait a wreath of flowers, and think of the unfading crowns in heaven?

"But we wear crosses,—and what lady does not? And if there may be a cross on the Queen's crown—if ladies may wear crosses of diamonds, pearls, and rubies in courts and assemblies, who shall grudge us one simple wooden cross? worn not from any idolatrous or superstitious feeling, but because we love the remembrance of the symbol of our faith, and because we strive to remember in our daily life Him who bore the cross for us. Lastly, we keep other forms of devotion besides those of the Church service. And if we work to our full strength, and, when not otherwise engaged, seek to refresh our souls, as well as our bodies, who shall say this is wrong? Why should we not aim to do to the letter what we say in the Psalm that we do. 'Seven times a day will I praise Thee, O Lord, because of thy righteous judgment.'

"We learnt it from Bishop Cosins, whose book I believe was once held in esteem next to the office of the Liturgy itself. We use nothing which is not in accordance with the Prayer Book. Our psalms, and hymns, and prayers, are not allowed to hinder any work. If any sick need us, or children are to be attended to, we say psalms to ourselves as we can in the streets. No work of love was ever neglected for our times of prayer. As for their names, if we use among ourselves for shortness sake, the old names, is it names or things that people are so anxious about? Since our prayers are according to the Church of England, is suspicion to be thrown upon us, because we say, 'It is time for thee,' rather than 'it is time to go to the prayers for the third hour?' Is not this the temper of those who would 'make a person an offender for a word?' But to comply with a wish that was expressed, these words have been erased from our books."

"Such are the charges brought against us after an inquiry into our most private life, as minute as if it had been made by the inquisitors. But I forgot. Not to mention insinuations painful and insulting as they are unjust, there is one other definite cause of public censure. I have received into my house as personal and private friends those whose names in their public capacity offend some ears. I know not what right any one has to publish to the world my private concerns. When I offered to work for the poor, and to educate neglected children, I did not thereby make myself public property."

"And by what line am I to measure my friendships and acquaintance? Do people never associate with each other unless they agree on every possible subject—morals, politics, religion? or is every one responsible for the opinions of their guests? Society and our friendships would indeed be unhappily narrowed. It is not that we would not resign our pictures, our crosses, our flowers, if, indeed, the hearts of Englishmen could refuse a woman the indulgence of such innocent pleasures. But it is incredible! Have you then no crosses in your houses, no pictures on sacred subjects in the room where you say your daily prayers? Have you never put holly or evergreens in your rooms, or your churches? Why, then, find fault with us? Are we to put away these things only because we have left our homes, and have reserved to ourselves these innocent delights with which to soothe and cheer our toil? But it is generally urged, 'you will mar greater good by indulging in things innocent enough in themselves, but which people cry out about.' And if they cry out at these, when will they hold their peace? If we give up one thing another would be laid hold of. There is no reality in all this, it is the mere war-cry of a party. A very short experience will prove this. I could not request the Sisters to lay aside the few pleasures with which their daily toil is cheered, and in which they take an innocent, a natural, and a wholesome delight."

"But now, I would ask, in common justice to the cause of the institution which I advocate, why are these matters brought forward so prominently, and why are very important truths concealed?"

"It is said that the clothes of the young servant girl were given to the poor. It is not said that the Sisters give new instead of their own clothes; that they nursed her with a loving tenderness which would have touched every heart during an illness; that if, from the time of her recovery until the day she left us, she only complained of fatigue, they voluntarily and daily gave up their own time of rest, in the midst of other duties, to perform her household work. It would, alas! be too easy for me to explain yet further a history of most sorrowful, most bitter ingratitude."

"It is said that Mary Pochetty averred she was unhappy: it is not said that again and again she wrote letters to her relations, which she showed, telling them how happy she was, and how she loved us as her mother and sisters."

"It is said that the Sisters pray often in the oratory. Why do they not add that they are yet oftener found beside the bed of the sick, attending to their bodily wants, and soothing the fevered couch of misery and pain?"

"Our children are children for not remembering a mark of respect at entering and leaving a room, and this is traduced into a proof of idolatrous worship. Could, then, those who inquired so minutely into the external mode of education, have remained in ignorance of their religious instruction being confined to the Church Catechism, the Prayer Book, and the Bible?"

"And here I have one observation to make respecting the statement that was read concerning the free use of Bibles in my house. When I sent Sarah to collect them the boys and myself were then occupying the only sitting room, excepting the school-room in the house; thus all those Bibles (and she came into the room twice laden with them) were collected from the bedrooms, the oratory, the school-room, and the kitchen. I suppose, during my ten months' residence in Devonport, I have bought hundreds of Bibles from the Christian Knowledge Society for distribution."

"I placed in the oratory, to please the little ones, a print from a picture, which, I suppose, may be found in countless drawing-rooms in England. But, because it represents the holy child Jesus in the arms of his mother, it is made a matter of accusation against me. Why did not these cross-questioners ask these unhappy girls straightforwardly whether they were taught anything which the Bible and the Church of England do not teach, or whether they ever heard any words or conversation to that tendency?"

"It is not for me to speak of the principles inculcated in our schools, or amongst the poor. Those under whose inspection we work will gladly bear their testimony on these points.

"And now, where is all that has been said about our having crucifixes in the house, of our wearing hoods like nuns, of our having no Bibles, or only mutilated copies of them, of our educating the children in 'soul destroying doctrines,' of my being myself educated in a French convent, and sent down here by some person or persons belonging to some section of the Church for the purpose of fomenting divisions, and teaching heretical doctrines to the benighted population of this place?"

"There is not one present who can really credit this; yet these and other falsehoods are industriously circulated, and create an impression which it is hard to combat—for one idle assertion is more readily believed by the ignorant and credulous than the most minute defence.

"No one brought or sent me here but the Bishop who nobly appealed to the country for help, and God who put it into my heart to respond to that appeal; and I and those associated with me, came, not to advance the cause of any party (this motive, powerful though it may appear to men, would but ill sustain weak women amid a life of daily and unaccustomed toil.) We came to feed the hungry, to nurse the sick, to soothe the wretched, to gather the children from haunts of wickedness and scenes of misery, to teach them to love their Bibles, their Church, their God! We came in love, and by some we have been received in love. But why do we elsewhere meet with such bitter hostility? Is it because we are educating hundreds of children, who a few months ago were untaught and neglected? or is it because, within the last winter season, when owing to the cessation of work there has been grievous local distress, innumerable families have been supplied with bread, the sick have been cared for, and the destitute have been clothed? Or is it because, while absent from our families and our homes, and spending our days amongst the ignorant and the miserable, we seek a blessing on our work, and strength for our weakness, by unceasing communion with Him without whose aid and guidance our feeble efforts are worse than vain?"

"It is a noble cause for which I plead—it is the cause of the orphans and the poor. Would that I could defend it more worthily. Why are my words so cold: my language so powerless? Alas, I am but a woman, weakened by the heavy pressure of illness, and ignorant how to reason with men. I know not how to convince their understanding, or to touch their hearts. It is not my own cause which I would plead. It matters little to me that insulting insinuations are attached to my name, or that I am by some few who know me not believed to be other than what I seem. There is One who knoweth the secrets of the heart, and He—and He alone—is my judge: but oh! that those who oppose us would reflect that they do not injure us. That would little matter—we could easily forgive and forget, and pray God to pardon their error; but they incur a greater danger; they injure the poor; they hinder, it may be, the salvation of immortal souls. Thousands are at this moment surrounding us, perishing in ignorance, and want, and sin. Oh! if those who so bitterly criticise and watch our way of life, would but go and labour amongst the poor. But let them not judge harshly of us; let them not seek to check our progress, or mar our plans, lest they only succeed in injuring the poor through those who came to aid them. Once more. Will any degree of present triumph or exultation compensate for the agony of one future pang of remorse? I grieve greatly for those who have been so bitter against us. For the Sisters, and for our orphans, how is it possible I should feel one moment's anxiety as to the result of this day's inquiry? The morning may be gloomy—yea, the noonday may be clouded, but at eventide there shall be light. The Lord shall give strength unto his people. The Lord shall give his people the blessing of peace. Oh! my God, I will give thanks unto Thee for ever!"

GOSPEL TRUTH, AND PRIMITIVE ECCLESIASTICAL ORDER.

SATURDAY, MARCH 24, 1849.

INSTITUTIONS FOR PRACTICAL CHARITY.

In the numbers of the Banner, dated June 10th and 17th, 1848, we gave, from the Edinburgh Review, an interesting account of "the Protestant Sisterhoods," established on the Continent of Europe. The account included one in Paris, called "the Institute of Deaconesses or Protestant Sisters of Charity;" another at Strasburgh, that "old focus of Protestantism;" two in Switzerland, one at Echallens, in the Pays de Vaud, the other at Boudry, in Neuchatel; and last, the oldest and most considerable, that of Kaiserswerth, on the Rhine.

Backed by such Protestant authority as the Edinburgh Review, and flanked by such allies as the Protestants who are Founders of these Institutions, we deemed our Protestant character unassailable when we commended these to the favourable regard of the Church, as setting an example worthy to be followed.

Thanks to our allies, we escaped at the time, only to be called to a future account. An establishment was formed at Devonport, in England, on a plan and with a design exactly corresponding with those of "the Protestant Sisterhoods" of the Continent, and keen eyes are at once directed to it. It is expressly stated

"The sisterhood did not wish it to be similar to the nunneries of Roman Catholic countries, but to resemble Protestant Societies bearing similar titles which existed in some of the cantons of Switzerland."

Yet some names were applied to things, in themselves of no harm, and some practices were adopted, which were neither proper nor expedient, yet all corrected at once upon the remonstrance of the Bishop.

For these indiscretions, this band of devoted Churchwomen are dragged forth, not only before the public eye, but are actually exposed to a kind of trial before a brutal audience.

The prejudice which these transactions excite, in a certain class of minds, makes this a suitable occasion for reckoning with the Banner concerning that old account about "the Protestant Sisterhoods" and "Practical Charity." Accordingly, a neighboring Journal gives the public memory the following timely refreshment.

"A few months ago we had a signal trumpet sounded in the columns of a cotemporary, that seemed to indicate the speedy formation of a religious fraternity or sisterhood in our Church, whose special duties were to relieve and instruct the poor. It may be well to note the developments which occur abroad in this tractarian age, as they generally precede the movements on this side of the Atlantic. It is with this view that we take the following extracts from foreign papers."

Then follows the charges made against "the Orphan's Home," without the defence, however. Now as our's are "the columns of a cotemporary" in which "a signal trumpet sounded," we feel called upon to give another blast, just to show that we are not afraid to meet this charge.

The question is, and it is a grave practical one for the Church to settle, are such "developments" as these referred to, to be branded with the silly and unmeaning epithet of "tractarian," and to be crushed under the foot of intolerant prejudice, as opposed to the genius and spirit of the Church, whose spirit of life is the breath of Love and Mercy? In the discussion of such a question we care nothing about "the Orphan's Home at Devonport." Its crosses and its titles, its visitors and its garlands, have nothing to do with the broad question to be settled. If God should put it into the hearts of the pious women of the Church to band together, in a holy alliance, in order to carry on with greater vigor the blessed works of love and mercy; shall the members of the Church of God be compelled to frown upon and discourage these designs? We would like to see the chapter and verse of Holy Scripture which condemns such efforts. We would thank the more learned friends who would point us to the Article, or Canon, or Statute, of "the Protestant Episcopal Church," which proscribes these Institutions. Nay, we would confess deep obligations to the clearer-sighted vision, which can direct us to unsoundness of principle which they involve, or show us the practical evils resulting which are to overwhelm the amount of good which must be effected by them.

The only objection to be urged against these Institutions was stated, and answered, by the Bishop of Norwich, in his speech at the meeting held in England, for the formation of the "Training Institution for Nurses."

"The first objection which had been made was that Les Sœurs de la Charité was a Roman Catholic Institution, and therefore was unfit to be adopted by a Protestant community. He, for his part, would take any thing from the Church of Rome that was good; and would even adopt a Mahomedan Institution, if it was acceptable to, and could be interwoven with our faith. He had watched the Sœurs de la Charité on the Continent, and had always felt humiliated in the presence of those ladies, because this country was without so useful an Institution."

And there is a wide difference between these Institutions, as they would be established with us, and as they are in the Church of Rome. No vows need be required, no veil, no poverty, no cloistered seclusion, no tyranny over will and conscience.

While we condemn what we esteem to be evil in the Church of Rome, let us not be afraid to applaud what is good. And let us be well assured that if we give up to her the sole possession of such Institutions, we yield to her an influence which far outweighs our best arguments. They are the nearest friends to the Church of Rome, whose hostility is so extreme that it will not allow them to practice what is good, because in that they must agree with their adversary.

As "the Orphan's Home" at Devonport has been the cause of this discussion, and as it is the rule, with some, to let their readers know the accusation without hearing the defence, we feel bound to give, in the Banner, the statement of Miss Sellon. She is a lady of station, fortune, and education, and has devoted all to this Institution. We give, on page 91, as a matter of interest, this Lady's account of the object of the Institution, and her written statement.

We may add that a careful perusal of the long examination of the various witnesses proves to us that this statement presents fairly the case, and shows that these ladies have been subjected to the grossest and most injurious misrepresentations.

We add, from "the Christian Remembrancer," the following later account of one of these Institutions among the Protestants of France.

FRENCH PROTESTANT DEACONESSSES.

The French 'Institution of Protestant Deaconesses' has been at work for some four or five years, with great success; this order of zealous women consists of fourteen Sisters and eight Servitors, who divide their time between three objects:—1. Female penitents, and younger girls of bad disposition. 2. The sick. 3. Schools. The Penitentiary, still in its infancy, contains no more than twenty-five cells, a number that could not well be increased, when we consider the other occupations of the Deaconesses, unless the order itself were increased. The result of their exertions among the wanderers of their sex, is in the highest degree encouraging. We find from the last report, which bears every mark of truthfulness, that of the number who have left their house, one-third relapse, one-third become respectable, and the remaining third positively religious. Surely such a harvest more than recompenses all their pious care. Expecting as we must, that only a portion of professing penitents will persevere in the strait and narrow way, how thankfully, how hopefully should we gaze at this fruit of godly zeal in foreign lands, if we see two-thirds of these women reclaimed from an abandoned and profligate life, even though they may not all rise to the higher stages of strict religiousness.

As regards the constitution of this Protestant Sisterhood, it appears to be under the control of a Council of Direction, consisting of two Protestant pastors, as president and vice president, the Sister Directress, and from four to six ladies. There is also a Committee of Surveillance. One Pastor seems to act as a sort of Chaplain, and does not reside in the house, and one of the Sisters is as it were at the head of the family, with the title of Sister Directress. The Sisters are divided into three classes; first, the new comer is called, 'Sœur aspirante,' and remains, as it were, on trial for six months; then she is advanced to the post of 'Sœur adjointe,' where she remains a year, and then she is qualified to become a Deaconess. Thus there is a sort of novitiate of eighteen months. Vows are of course dispensed with, and though they are exhorted not hastily to retire, yet if they find on trial a disinclination to the work, or undertook it in a moment of enthusiasm which is not afterwards sustained, they are free to depart while they are 'aspirantes' and 'adjointes;' they pay 400 francs per annum for board; afterwards board is found them, but no stipend. In short, it is wisely designed, that women of at least some private means should be received, who undertake the work solely upon spiritual grounds, without any prospect of temporal reward.

Our general rule is, not to make the columns of the Banner a medium for correcting the erroneous statements of other papers. But every rule, however good, must have exceptions. We hold that the character and repute of our Bishops are to be regarded as a sacred interest in whose preservation every member of the Church is concerned. And if anything would induce us to step out of our usual course, it would be the desire to vindicate a Bishop, when unjustly assailed.

For our own part, as a principle involving the plainest dictates of justice and honor, we would never refuse a place in our columns to the response made in defence, by the humblest Minister or Layman, whose character was compromised by anything which found place in our Paper.

The Bishop of Western New York, whose repute is especially dear to many of the Clergy and Laity of Pennsylvania, has been publicly charged with an improper use of the high influence which belongs to his Holy Office. One of his Clergy, a member of the Standing Committee of his Diocese, who has full opportunity of knowing all the facts in the case, in a temperate reply seeks to correct the wrong impression. The request is refused. The next thing is to have the correction inserted in a paper which circulates in the same region, and it is sent to the Banner by those whose names are sufficient pledges of truth.

On the above grounds we insert the following communication.

For the Banner of the Cross.

MR. EDITOR:—

The following article was sent, more than a month since, to the Editor of the Episcopal Recorder, with a request, under my proper name, that he would publish it, as a simple act of justice to the Diocese of Western New York, and its Bishop. Inasmuch as he has not seen fit to do this or anything equivalent to it, may I request you to give it insertion in your valuable paper.

Very respectfully, &c.

A STANDING COM. MAN OF W. N. Y.

W. N. Y., March 9, 1849.

For the Episcopal Recorder.

MR. EDITOR:—

My attention has been drawn to some remarks of yours in relation to the Diocese of Western New York, of which I have the honor and happiness to be a presbyter, by a well-tempered and well-tempered article of the Editor of the Gospel Messenger. Will you allow me to add, in your own columns a few words more, not in the way of controversy but of correction?

"Unwearied pains," you are pleased to say, "have been taken for several years past to secure clergymen for that Diocese, who should in all things sympathize with the views and feelings and policy of the Bishop. Clergymen, holding what are generally termed Evangelical views of doctrine, have been kept out by various expedients."

Who, reading this would suppose it possible, that the esteemed Rector, of "the largest parish in that Diocese" was first recommended to the Senior warden by a member of the Standing Committee, and subsequently but independently by the Bishop—and that the Bishop urged his acceptance of the rectorship, and expressed his wish to the Bishop of Massachusetts, that he would "let him go"? And yet such is the fact.

And who would suppose it possible, that all the other clerical members of the "Evangelical Knowledge Society" in this Diocese, have held missionary appointments in the Diocese, on the nomination of the Bishop? And yet such too is the fact.

"Various expedients." I am a member of the Standing Committee, and suppose I know what is going on, but I know nothing of these "expedients."

Parishes call clergymen and then ask the Board of Education and Missions, consisting of the Bishop and Standing Committee, to grant them the missionary stipend, and in no case has the decision turned upon their party relations, nor do I remember, that such a point has ever been alluded to in this connection.

If a large majority of the clergy in the Diocese of Western New York are of that class, who "discard and oppose," what you please to call "evangelical views of Christian doctrine," it is because the majority of the parishes are of the same mind. Not, I beg you to understand, that there are among us either ministers or parishes, that discard or undervalue "Evangelical truth," but that the majority, and the great majority of both, do—and long may they—prefer the Gospel as set forth in and by the Church, to any modern theories of religion, by however dear a name they may be called.

The principal source of supply of clergymen in this Diocese is from itself. About forty-three, i. e., more than one third of the present number have received orders from the Diocesan.

But in no case has any person been at all impeded in this Diocese, in becoming a candidate for orders, or in obtaining orders, because his views inclined to Calvinism. And in no case has the free action of a vestry been at all interfered with by the Bishop or any of the authorities of the Diocese, in the call of a clergyman.

The only proof of the grave charge of "expedients," which I can discern in your remarks, comes from the fact, that a "large majority" of the clergy are of one heart and one mind. If the large majority were on the other side, in these unhappy disputes, as may be the case in some Dioceses, would it then be a proof of unworthy "expedients"?

"Unwearied pains—for years—to secure clergymen who should in all things sympathize with the views and feelings and policy of the Bishop." It is true, that a happy state of unity exists among us, but I know of no "unwearied pains" taken by the Bishop to produce this result, but his "unwearied pains" in the discharge of his duties; and as for the clergy generally, they are little seen beyond their own parishes. As for the Bishop's "policy," it seeks to keep his clergy and laity "standing fast in one spirit, with one mind striving together for the faith of the Gospel." The foundation of our unity and peace was laid years ago by a deceased Bishop, who knew eminently well how to unite "Evangelical truth with Apostolic order," and it is so much the tendency of things here to grow up in the good way, that it needs "pains" and "expedients" to prevent, not to foster it.

Pardon me if I say, in all plainness, that your charges are unfounded, and ask you to consider, whether they come not of those "evil surmisings" which a Christian man should studiously avoid. And pardon me too, if I ask you, in all plainness, whose work you are doing, when you publicly and groundlessly reproach a whole Diocese, an integral part of God's Church, with defection from the faith, and its Bishop, and I know not how many of its clergy, with party trick and management. May God forgive you this offence, as freely, as I do my small share in it.

A STANDING COMMITTEE MAN, OF W. N. Y.

ST. MARK'S CHURCH.—In the description, accompanying the picture of this church, it was stated that the church edifice was not built by subscription; and that a few churchmen advanced the necessary funds to complete it, with the exception of the tower and spire.

This statement has excited a fear, on the part of some concerned in the good work, lest they should have thus authorized an ostentatious display of their liberality. Although we have no such apprehension, still at the request of the parties interested, we beg to say that, although the above is the fact, the statement of it was made upon individual authority. For our own part, we are glad that the statement was made, even at the expense of that worthy feeling which desires not to "sound the trumpet before" its deeds of munificence.

It is the way churches should be erected by those whom God has blessed with the means of "devising liberal things." The fewer who are concerned in supplying the means for building churches the better. It gives us a promise that the days may come back when wealthy individuals will think as little of building a "glorious sanctuary" for the worship of God, as they do now of erecting a sumptuous palace for their own glory. When men come to realize the honor and blessing of thus being permitted to consecrate their perishable riches, such noble offerings shall be frequent. And may God hasten the coming of those better days for His Church.

We take the following interesting letter from the New York Churchman:—

Copy of Bishop White's letter to Mr. Lear, Private Secretary to General Washington.

PHILADELPHIA, Feb. 21st, 1792.

Sir—It was the design of the Clergy of the Protestant Episcopal Church, together with those of the different denominations in this city, to do themselves the honor of waiting in a body, on the President of the United States, on the 11th instant: a wrong intimation in the newspapers having led them into the mistaken supposition of that's being his birth-day.

As the occasion is now found to fall on Ash-Wednesday, the duties of which claim the attention of the Clergy, of the Episcopal Church in a peculiar way, I write in their name, to ask the favor of you, to account to the President for their not being of the number of those who will have the honor of waiting on him to-morrow; and farther, to signify the request which they most respectfully make to the President, that they may be allowed to offer him their congratulations on the next levee day; unless he should condescend to appoint an earlier time; as it would be most agreeable to them to take the first opportunity for the purpose, that his high engagements will permit.

Since my being desired to make this request, it has been intimated to me that the Clergy of some other societies intend to delay their attendance until ours, and for the same reason.

Permit me, sir, to trouble you once more. Yesterday I visited Dr. Blair, who is confined to his bed. Finding that I intended to write to you on the above subject, he wished that his indisposition might be mentioned, as what would prevent him, for the time, from joining in the congratulations of to-morrow.

I hope, sir, you will excuse this freedom; and I am, with respect, your very humble servant.

WM. WHITE.

The New York Freeman's Journal and Catholic Register gives us the following account of the condition of Arkansas:

IGNORANCE AND SUPERSTITION IN THE ARKANSAS LEGISLATURE.—It is reported in some of the secular papers that the Rt. Rev. Bishop of Little Rock applied lately for a special law authorizing him to hold real estate, establish colleges, &c. The bill was about to pass, when a fanatical member of the legislature got on his legs with Dowling's Romanism in his hands; and after howling at the assembled wisdom of Arkansas, for some time, he so frightened them with Popery, that the bill was laid on the table! Such is the civilization of Arkansas.

THE MERCERSBURG REVIEW, March, 1849, No. II.

We have received the second number of this able Review too late for more than the acknowledgment. Among other articles upon subjects of interest, we find two bearing the well known signatures of "J. W. N." The subject of these articles are "The Apostle's Creed," and "Sartorius on the Person and Work of Christ." We shall recur to this periodical at another time.

THE MEDICAL EXAMINER AND RECORD OF MEDICAL SCIENCE.

Edited by Francis G. Smith, M. D., and David H. Tucker, M. D. Published monthly.

We can only venture to speak of the appearance of this journal, which certainly is attractive. We can also say that it is edited by gentlemen who stand high in their honorable profession, and hold offices which, in a city where medical instruction is of so high an order, would only be entrusted to those well qualified to teach. Both editors are Fellows of the College of Physicians, Dr. Smith is "Lecturer on Physiology in the Philadelphia Association for Medical Instruction," and Dr. Tucker is late Professor in the Franklin Medical College. If any of our Medical friends will follow Theological advice in such a case, we hope they will, at once, become subscribers to the Medical Examiner.

A dancing boat on a glancing stream—
A gem of beautiful hue—
A cherub bright as a solar beam,
If angel-visits be true;
The gilded wing of a summer bird
Careering to every flower—
A voice of music at morning heard
More sweetly than Memnon's tower—
The golden vision that Hope portrays,
Delighting a laughing eye
With guerdon rich of sinless days,
Awaiting the good on high:
So joyous and glad is innocent Youth
Baptized with the dew of immortal Truth.

REMINISCENCES AGAIN.

REV. MR. EDITOR:

Antecedent to the forthcoming "recollections," which may reasonably be expected, from the pens of some of our clerical brethren, I beg permission to offer your readers the following incidents, extracted from an Address, delivered fifteen years ago, in this city, by the Bishop of New Jersey—incidents which, though familiar, doubtless, to a few, who either were present on the occasion at which they were narrated, or who have had the pleasure, since, of reading the Address alluded to, are still interesting and instructive to the hundreds who since have attained years of discretion, and—take the Banner! They are interesting, not only because the distinguished and venerated Bishops named are still exercising their high office to the glory of God and the good of His Church, but also are instructive, as illustrations of the principle that in God's service acts seemingly unimportant, often terminate in results of no little moment; that, in truth, nothing is trifling in the service of Him, who ordereth all things. Great effects have resulted from slight and apparently ineffectual causes, in the various departments of science, instances of which crowd upon the mind of every tyro in historic and scientific lore; and why not in that which more immediately concerns God's mysterious ways? The judicious distribution of every Prayer Book, or Tract, may not be followed by results so wonderful and gratifying, but we shall do well to remember the principle which these incidents serve to elucidate, viz: that we should diligently employ the means, and leave to God the consequence. He, by whom the very hairs of our heads are numbered, will assuredly take care of His own. But to the 'recollections.'

"A Clergyman, of distinguished intelligence and benevolence, was travelling some years ago in a region remote from the strongholds of the Church; detained at a country place by an accident which happened to his carriage, he met with an interesting boy, with whom he was so much pleased, that on parting from him in the morning, he gave him a Prayer Book. There was then no acquaintance with the Church on the part of him, or any of his family,—perhaps not even among their neighbours. I have not time to trace his subsequent career, nor do I know when the influence first exerted itself on his mind, nor what its process was in his heart. But I know that that boy is now the BISHOP OF NORTH CAROLINA. A young man, a graduate of one of our Southern colleges, was elected to a tutorship. As tutor, it was his duty to conduct the morning devotions of the chapel. He was not then a religious man. As he himself told me, he did not know how to pray. It was a most irksome, and it must be feared, an unprofitable task. A friend had compassion on him, and gave him a Prayer Book. It was the first that he had ever seen, and it rendered that easy which before was difficult and unsatisfactory. I know not how long after this it was that he attached himself to the Episcopal Church. But I know that that young man is now the BISHOP OF TENNESSEE."

Since writing the above, I recollect another remarkable incident, given in the flowing words of the Bishop of Ohio, at the Consecration of the present occupant of the See of Louisiana, it is as follows:

"It is now nearly thirteen years since a very remarkable work of grace occurred, in the Military Academy of the United States. During a condition of almost universal indifference to religion, and of wide-spread infidelity, against which the efforts of the ministry of one man, set for the defence of the Gospel, seemed for a long time to make not the least way; suddenly almost, in a very few days, many minds, without communication with one another, and without personal intercourse with the minister, appeared deeply, and almost simultaneously interested in the great matters of eternal life. Officers as well as Cadets participated in this, and to such an extent, that the Minister's study was soon occupied every evening with assemblies, composed of both, for prayer, and the exposition of the Word of God; and a serious impression, more or less deep and abiding, was spread over a large part of the whole military community. Several became at that period very decided Soldiers of Christ. Many others received impressions, then, which God has since ripened into manifest and energetic piety."

The very first appearance of this work of grace, so remarkably and singularly the work of God, was the coming of a CADET, alone and most unexpectedly, to introduce himself to the Chaplain, and unburden the sorrows of a contrite heart. All around him was coldness and scepticism. To speak decidedly in favour of religion was then so unusual in the Academy that it made one singular. To converse with the Chaplain on that subject, had not yet been ventured by any, except out of opposition to the truth. That any would appear there seriously seeking eternal life, even the Chaplain was afraid to hope. But the darkest of the night is nearest the dawn. A CADET did venture to come, in open day, to the Chaplain's study, too deeply concerned to heed what would be said of him. He was personally unknown to the Chaplain. His message he tried to utter, but could not. Again he tried, and again; but the heart was too full for speech. At length it was: "Tell me what I must do—I have come about my soul. I know not what I want—I am entirely in the dark. What must I seek? Where must I go?"

Such was the first declaration of one, who, for some days, had been awakened under the preaching and reading of the truth. A sermon preached on the Scriptures, and a tract, sent at a venture, from the Chaplain's study, to whomsoever it might meet, had been blessed to his soul.

Doubts and cavils were all abandoned. Implicit submission seemed his engrossing principle. From that moment, the young man appeared to take up the Cross, and to stand decidedly and boldly on the Lord's side. By and by, he professed Christ in the Sacrament of Baptism, which was administered to him, with others, recently turned to the Lord, in the Chapel of the Military Academy, and in presence of all the corps. After graduating at that Institution, and leaving the army, he passed through a regular course of study for the holy ministry, and was successively ordained Deacon and Presbyter. Many years have since elapsed. The Chaplain has since been called to a higher order in the Ministry, and more enlarged responsibilities in the Church. The Cadet, meanwhile, after many vicissitudes of active duty and of disabling ill health, supposed he had settled himself for the rest of his life, as a preacher and pastor to an humble and obscure congregation of negroes, whom he had collected together from neighboring plantations; to whom, living entirely upon his own pecuniary means, he appropriated a part of his own house for a Church, and to whose eternal interests he had chosen cheerfully and happily to devote himself, as their Spiritual Father, with no emolument but their salvation. But such was just the true spirit for the highest of all vocations in the Church. To be a servant of servants, is the very school in which to prepare for the chief ministry, under Him who took on Him the form of a servant. The Church needed a Missionary Bishop for a vast field, for great self-denial, for untiring patience, for courageous enterprise. Her eye was directed to the self-appointed Pastor of that humble congregation. With the most impressive unanimity did she call him away, to a work, not indeed of more dignified duty, but of more eminent responsibility. Counting the cost, he has not dared to decline it. Regarding the call as of GOD, he has embraced the promised grace, and is now ready to be offered. And thus the CHAPLAIN has here met the beloved CADET again.

Mr. Editor, are there not more such records or "reminiscences" among us? If so, we ask for them. CLERICUS.

So do we?—[ED. OF BAN.]

CYRIL LUCAR, PATRIARCH OF CONSTANTINOPLE.

MR. EDITOR:—

It may be news to some of your readers, as it certainly was to me, when I met with the account, that in the commencement of the 17th century, there was a Calvinistic Patriarch of Constantinople. In the "History of the Holy Eastern Church," by the Rev. John Mason Neale, A. M., a work reviewed in the Christian Remembrancer for January 1849, the fact is stated, with a narrative of the life, actions, and death of the individual so distinguished, Cyril Lucar. This I have extracted from the Review, condensing it as much as possible, blending the comments of the Review, with the life of the author, in order to comply with your law and ritual, and send it, as a matter of probable interest, for insertion in your paper.

Rw. G. Upford

"Cyril Lucar, born of a good family in the City of Candia, was sent to Venice in the twelfth year of his age, and there commenced his studies which he afterwards completed at Padua. On the completion of his academical career, he resolved to visit several of the most famous European cities, and, more especially to inquire for himself into the real condition and character of the Reformed communities, of which so much was heard, and so little known, in Egypt, his residence in early youth, and in a portion of his subsequent life. He visited Geneva, Holland, and it would seem, England; and thence returned to his own country.

"On the return of Cyril to Alexandria, Meletius Piga, the Patriarch of that See, and a relative, finding him as opposed as ever to the Roman Church, seems never to have inquired whether his principles might not have been warped by his close connexion with several of the Reformers, but in a short time raised him to the Priesthood, and finding that he continued to deserve promotion made him Achimandrite.

"On a journey on some official business, some years after, which led him to Constantinople, Cyril there formed an intimacy with M. Von Haga, then travelling in the Levant, which exerted a powerful influence on his future views. Nor need we wonder at this. Cyril could not but see that his Church stood in need of reformation; the doctrines controverted in the west had received no elucidation nor decision, as they since have in an Oriental Synod; the views of Lucar were probably indistinct and ill-defined, and rendered, perhaps, more obscure both by his intercourse with Romanists and with Protestants. In this state of things a compact, clear, well-defined, and logical system was set before him by the teachers and disciples of Calvinism; they seemed to have worked their way gradually, to have shrunk from sudden disclosures and open attacks; and as Cyril seems to have been possessed but of moderate though highly respectable talents, and certainly had no knowledge of the Calvinistic controversy, beyond that which Calvinists were pleased to give, we cannot wonder that he fell into their snare. Von Haga's character stood high; and one great object of his life seems to have been the bringing about an union between Geneva and Constantinople.

"On his return to Egypt, he found his benefactor and relative, Meletius Piga, on his death-bed, and closed his eyes. He succeeded to the Patriarchate of Alexandria, which he governed in peace for ten years. It was in the year 1612 that, on the removal of Neophtus from the Ecumenical Throne, by the caprice of the Sultan, Cyril Lucar was compelled to visit Constantinople in order to assist in the deposition of the patriarch, and to administer the affairs of the Church. Here he found his old friend M. Von Haga, who then occupied the post of ambassador from the States to the Sublime Porte; and the acquaintance thus rendered soon became a cordial friendship.

"Cyril arrived in Constantinople before, or at the beginning of Lent; and it so happened that in one of the sermons preached during that season, a Greek Monk, who was an agent of the Jesuits, publicly preached Romanist doctrines in one of the Greek churches. The Jesuits had established a college at Constantinople about the year 1601; the buildings were handsome, the library well assorted, and the Priests laborious, active, and intriguing. They soon made great way with the Greeks; but, strange to say, found more difficulty with the members of the Romish Communion. The latter were, for the most part, under the spiritual guidance of the Franciscans and Dominicans, who viewed the advance of the new society with jealousy; and were not without their fears lest the turbulent and intermeddling spirit it displayed at Constantinople, should occasion the banishment of all Romanists from that city. Cyril publicly opposed the new doctrine, and thereby drew upon himself the deadly and implacable hatred of the Jesuits; and a struggle commenced between him and that society, which only ended with his life.

"Hitherto Cyril's conduct seems to have been irreproachable.

He may indeed have theoretically entertained too favorable an opinion of the Protestant communities on the Continent; but this opinion had not influenced his conduct. By the advice of Von Haga, while administering the See of Constantinople, he wrote to M. Wytenbogaert, Minister at the Hague, of whom he had possibly gained some knowledge by report during his European travels.

"The Patriarch corresponded extensively with the Dutch Minister, Archbishop Abbott of Canterbury, and Antonio de Dominis, Archbishop of Spalatro. His progress in error is marked in these letters by a gradual apostasy from the doctrine of the Eastern Church, and a growing attachment to (Continental) Protestant tenets. An intimacy with M. David le Leu de Wilhelm, a Dutch gentleman of good fortune and liberal education, at that time travelling in Egypt, served still further to warp his mind, and to attach him more strongly to German teaching. In 1621, the Ecumenical throne of Constantinople became vacant by the death of Timothy. Cyril was unanimously elected Patriarch, and from this time he scarcely knew an hour's peace.

"Cyril Lucar's attention was, immediately on his promotion, drawn to the progress which the Jesuits were making at Constantinople; and they, on their part, were not less anxious narrowly to watch the proceedings of one who had hitherto shown himself their most determined enemy. The Patriarch's first proceeding was the publication of a Pastoral mandate, by which all the Faithful were desired to withdraw themselves from the communion of all members of the Latin Church. This blow struck directly at the Jesuits; and they were not long in showing that they felt and resented it. By the influence of the French Ambassador, they made Gregory of Amasea, a man who had openly submitted to the Pope, Anti-patriarch; but this step was quite unsuccessful. On the Saturday following the publication of Gregory's elevation, Cyril, accompanied by four Archbishops, and many of his clergy, solemnly excommunicated the intruder, after a sermon, in which, without expressly mentioning the Jesuits, he referred to certain incendiaries, with whom it would be necessary to deal more severely, unless they desisted from their plots. The government took the matter up; Gregory was banished, and, while on his way to the place of exile, strangled.

"In the following April, the Jesuits waited on the Vizir, with the information that Cyril was intriguing with the Florentines, in the intention of delivering up to them one of the islands of the Archipelago. As this accusation was accompanied by a present of twenty-thousand dollars, the Vizir paid immediate attention to it; and without attending to Cyril's defence, sent him prisoner to Rhodes.

"But now a serious difficulty arose. The Jesuits urged the elevation of another Patriarch; but the Greeks affirmed that the throne was not vacant, and that if an intruder attempted to occupy it, they would not pay the Pescesium, without which, the Turkish government would recognize no Patriarch. In this difficulty the Jesuits cast their eyes on Anthemius, Archbishop of Adrianople, a rich but worthless man, and offered to secure his election, if he would consent to pay the requisite sum. Anthemius agreed; and he was thus raised to the dignity that he coveted.

"Urban VIII., on hearing of the exile of Cyril, wrote a letter of thanks to the French Ambassador, Count de Cesi, congratulating him on the service he had done to the Catholic faith. But at the same time King James I., wrote to the English Ambassador, Sir Thomas Rowe, desiring him to procure at any cost, the recall of Cyril. The necessary orders having been issued, Cyril returned on the first of September, to Galata; and Anthemius, either struck with remorse, or overcome by fear, waited on him, and offered to resign to him the Patriarchate. But Cyril thought that thus to accept it, would be both uncanonical and dangerous, and contented himself with receiving the declaration of Anthemius, that the Patriarchal throne was vacant; waiting God's time to be restored to his rightful dignity. Count de Cesi, on hearing this, was furious; and having sent for Anthemius, and bitterly reproached him with his cowardice, he persuaded him, by a large sum of money and by promises of protection, to continue to act as Patriarch. He was again proclaimed especially at Galata, and retained his dignity for some little time longer. At length, overcome by terror, he went to Cyril by night, abdicated the Patriarchate, and besought absolution, protesting that he would rather suffer death than again mount the throne of Constantinople. * * * Cyril's friends now persuaded him to come forward; and by the assistance of a considerable Pescesium, he was again recognized as legitimate Patriarch.

"The Jesuits, however, would not be quiet. The Propaganda next interfered, but for some time without success, thanks to the kind offices of Sir Thomas Rowe, the British Ambassador at Constantinople. An Anti-patriarch was sent out with the title of Apostolic Suffragan, but he was not received by the Greeks, and was glad to make a safe and speedy retreat to Rome.

"In the following June, a Greek monk, name Nicholas Metaxa, arrived from England with a printing press and a font of Greek types, and the requisite knowledge of the art of printing; and under the patronage of the Patriarch, and the protection of the British Ambassador, commenced practising his craft. He undertook to print the celebrated 'Oriental Confession of Christian Faith' by Cyril Lucar, which did not succeed, but was afterwards published in Latin at Geneva, and when translated into Greek, became a fruitful source of contention in the Eastern Church. It could not be otherwise, for although it represented only the private views of the author, whose Calvinistic tendencies had been confirmed by time and by his intercourse with (Continental) Protestants, yet it was put forth in the name of the Orthodox Church, and with all the authority that the title of the Ecumenical Patriarch could give it. It was opposed to the dogmatic teaching of the Greek Church on several fundamental points, as in the Rule of Faith, Election and Reprobation, the Intercession of Saints, Justification, the number of Sacraments, and the order of their operation, and on other points of less importance. * * *

"No sooner was the press in operation than the printer and his patron became the object of the fury of the Jesuits. False accusations were invented, with a view to instigate against them the Turkish authorities, and the whole city was thrown into confusion. The influence of the English Ambassador was, however, sufficient to protect the parties, and Metaxa from personal violence, and to procure the banishment of the intriguing missionaries. And now the Genevans, considering their triumph complete at Constantinople, proceeded to extend their influence, and cast their eyes on Egypt, as a hopeful field for proselytism. Gerasimus had succeeded Cyril as Patriarch of Alexandria. M. Leger was now pastor of the Dutch congregation at Pera; and he appears to have exerted considerable influence over Cyril. He and Von Haga, having been successful beyond their hopes at Constantinople, now turned their views to Alexandria, thinking that Gerasimus might be as easily won as his predecessor. They accordingly wrote to the Patriarch, and Cyril seems to have accompanied their letters with one of his own. They proposed at the expense of the States-General, to erect colleges, and to establish printing-presses in Egypt, on condition that the Calvinistic bodies were received to the communion of the Alexandrian church. The bribe was tempting, but Gerasimus thus replied in an excellent letter—'unity' he observes, 'is that at which all Christians ought to aim; but it is necessary to be careful that it is true, not false unity. He can only give peace on the same terms on which Christ gave it. A suspected peace is more dangerous than open warfare. Colleges would indeed be a boon to Alexandria; but not on the terms proposed. The recent attempts to make the Scriptures more clear than Christ left them, are by no means to be approved. The obscurity of Scripture has always been confessed; the Apocalypse may more truly be called an obvelation than a revelation. There are, for those that need them, the catecheses of S. Cyril of Jerusalem, S. John S. Gregory Nyssen.'

"Meanwhile the Papal emissaries were not inactive. The French Ambassador at the Porte, two Greek Prelates of the Romish communion, and Cyril of Barea, a plotting ambitious metropolitan of the Orthodox church, but a disciple of the Jesuits, amply compensated for the absence of the missionaries. Cyril Lucar was banished a second time, and only restored to his throne on the payment of an enormous bribe, to be supplanted again, and driven a third time into exile, the very next year.

"At length in 1636, he was restored to his throne for the last time; and it is curious that his abandonment of the principles which his office pledged him to defend, is most distinctly announced in a letter addressed by him to the Senators of Geneva, immediately after his final restoration, in which letter he declares his adhesion to Calvin, and his admiration of his teaching. He was not long allowed to occupy his throne in peace; the friends of the deposed Patriarch, Cyril of Barea, were the sworn enemies of Cyril Lucar; the Jesuits were still active, and the true sons of the Eastern church seemed almost extinct. His enemies finding that the banishment of Cyril did not advance their views, determined on his death. And remembering that they had always succeeded best with the Sultan in his absence from Constantinople, they conceived that they had now an excellent opportunity; as Amurath was about to march against Bagdad. They accordingly made interest with Bairam Pasha, who was high in the Sultan's favour from his zeal in this very expedition; and between the Infidel Minister, and the agents of the Jesuits, the ruin of Cyril was concerted. It happened that while Amurath was on his march, the Cossacks seized Azof; and Bairam, together with another of Cyril's enemies, Hussain Pasha, informed the Sultan that that enterprise had been favoured, if not instigated by Cyril; and that it was most unwise policy to leave so active a man in Constantinople. The orders arrived at Constantinople on the 26th of June; and Musa Pasha, the governor of the city, prepared to carry them into execution. But, fearing that the execution of Cyril in the heart of Constantinople might raise a tumult, the janissaries whom he dispatched were instructed to say, that they were sent to carry the Patriarch on board a ship, it being the Sultan's pleasure that he should be sent into exile. Cyril at once submitted; he went that evening on board a boat, expecting to be conveyed to S. Stephano, a small town near Constantinople, where a vessel was said to be waiting for him. But no sooner were they out of sight of land, than, perceiving what their real intention was, he knelt down and prayed earnestly. When he had ceased, after some abuse and a few blows, they put the bow-string about his neck, and having done their work, threw his body into the sea. It was picked up by some fishermen, and returned to his friends, by whom it was buried decently. But the malice of his enemies did not end with his life: they complained to the governor of the city, by whose orders the corpse was disinterred, and again thrown into the sea. Washed on shore by the billows, it was buried in one of the islands in the bay of Nicomedia.

"Thus in the 66th year of his age, and the 36th of his Patriarchate, fell Cyril Lucar: a man, whose character can hardly be given, without the risk of doing injustice to his own piety, or speaking lightly of the pernicious doctrines which he taught. It is necessary to keep in mind the vast difference between the propagation of heresy, and the being a heretic, if we would judge rightly. The greater part of the doctrines he held had never been censured by his own church; those who opposed them, opposed them for their own interested ends, and in combating heresy were guilty of schism. Those who held them were Cyril's superiors in learning, his friends, his protectors, his patrons; those who rejected them, his inferiors in every way, his own enemies, and in union with the Infidels. Had the Council of Bethelhem (held in 1672 which anathematized the Calvinistic teaching embodied in the writings of the Patriarch, while they spared his memory) been held previously, Cyril would never probably have fallen into the snares laid for him; or if he had, must have been more severely judged. It is worthy of remark, that this council, while condemning his errors, spoke of ten thousand witnesses to his well known piety. Indeed his humility and patience are conspicuous through the whole tenor of his letters. Therefore, while we utterly reject the Protestant idea that he died as a saint and martyr, we are nearly as far from entertaining that of Rome, that he perished as a notorious and obstinate heretic, whose body sea and land equally refused to receive. Considering what he did and what he suffered, the strength of his enemies, the weakness of his friends, the power of his early associations, the unkindness and unfairness of Rome, the bitterness of his persecutors, his own meekness, and patience, and great humility, and using towards him that charity of judgment which we should ourselves desire, we are justified in believing, that, notwithstanding his many errors,—

'After life's fitful fever he sleeps well.'

The executors having carried Cyril's clothes to the market in Constantinople for the purpose of disposing of them, there was an unusual burst of grief among the Christians: Cyril of Berea was openly called villain, murderer, and Pilate, and a body of petitioners entered his house, demanding the corpse. Failing in this application, they applied to the Mahometan authorities; but of course to as little purpose."

HOW A VESTRY WAS INDUCED TO PAY A CLERGYMAN'S SALARY.

In one of our infant dioceses there was a canon requiring the attendance of at least two clergymen at the Annual Convention, in order to transact business. Two clergymen and the representatives of two parishes were necessary, as a quorum, for Conventional business.

On a certain occasion, no matter how long ago, the day appointed arrived, and, two clergymen being present, they proceeded to the performance of divine service, the usual preliminary. One of the clergymen was the pastor of the parish in whose church the service was performed—the other came from a distance. The service being concluded, the minister from a distance being Secretary to the Convention, took his place, and was about to open the annual proceedings—perhaps to read minutes of last year's meeting, or to move that his reverend friend should take the chair. But on looking round for his reverend friend in the church, he was not to be seen. What could have become of him? he was there during the morning. The Secretary thought it would be well to "take an observation," so he looked out of the window, and behold, there was the reverend pastor of the parish, walking at a rapid rate, away from the church, towards his own home. When this was announced to the meeting, the members, especially the lay delegates of that parish, looked at one another for an explanation.

At length, as no business could be transacted, when only one clergyman was present, a deputation was appointed to follow the absent gentleman, and to report the cause of so strange a movement. The deputation, who were of course some of the delegates from the parish, hastened after their pastor, and in course of time returned to state, with some hesitation of speech, that in fact there were some arrears of salary due to their minister, and he had taken this means of pressing payment. He had resolved that the Convention should suspend their operations, as long as his parish suspended his dues. There was no remedy; and therefore the meeting was obliged to adjourn till that day week. By that time the delinquent Vestry had raised the required amount. The two clergymen again met the assembled delegates, and the business of Convention proceeded harmoniously to a close.

For the Banner of the Cross.

At a meeting of the Vestry of Trinity Church, Natchez, held on the 27th day of February, 1849, the following Preamble and Resolutions were unanimously adopted, viz:

"Whereas it has pleased an Allwise and kind disposer of events to remove by death our much beloved friend and Pastor, the Rev. William Mason Giles, late Rector of Trinity Church, Natchez, from this world of trouble and field of labor and usefulness, to a holier and happier state, in the world to come; and whereas we deeply deplore the loss sustained by the decease of this able, talented and efficient Clergyman—one eminently calculated to gain and retain the affections of his people and win souls to the cause of his Redeemer: Therefore,

Resolved, That in the midst of lamentation we remember with comfort and joy the "excellent spirit" of our departed friend and Pastor, and bear witness of the improvement of his talents and attainments; his exemplary consistency and fearless fidelity; the warmhearted zeal and affection, which characterized his private intercourse and public ministrations; the diligence and zeal with which he discharged his holy functions, often with a feeble and exhausted frame; his high appreciation of the excellency and harmony of the principles of the Church in its connection with the Gospel of Christ and the salvation of men; and the patience and faith which sustained him in his last lingering illness, and left upon his placid countenance the smile of peace and joy, as he was carried by angels to his holy rest.

Resolved, That we hereby tender to the surviving partner and relatives of the deceased, our sincere condolence, and pray God to sustain them in their great affliction by the same holy religion so beautifully exemplified in the life and death of our common friend.

Resolved, That a copy of the foregoing Preamble and Resolutions, signed by the Wardens and Vestry, be furnished to the widow of the deceased, be entered upon the Minutes of this Vestry, and be published in the "Churchman" and the "Banner of the Cross."

Miscellaneous.

From the Literary World.

THE DEAD SEA EXPEDITION.

MESSRS. CAREY & HART announce for immediate publication (at the low price of one dollar,) a "Narrative of the Late Expedition to the Dead Sea, from a Diary, by One of the Party; Edited by Edward P. Montague (attached to the U. S. Expedition Ship Supply); with Incidents and Adventures from the time of Sailing in November, 1847, till the Return of the same in December, 1848; accompanied by a Map of the Holy Land, handsomely colored, 1 vol. post 8vo. pp. 254."

Of this work, which is not to be confounded with the report of Lieut. Lynch, we present as a matter of interesting literary news the following extracts, in advance of publication, reserving all comment for a future occasion:—

April 24th, 1848. Monday. This morning our boats are manned, one under the charge of our commander, the other under command of one of the officers; we prosecute our plan for sounding the sea. Our boat takes a south-easterly course, and lands on the peninsula, from whence we take a westerly course. After getting nearly across, we hauled her up to the northward until abreast of the camp. The second boat takes a more northerly course, and arrives at the camp by sundown.

The soundings to-day reach to one hundred and eighty fathoms, or ten hundred and eighty feet. The bottom of the sea is soft and slimy, or muddy, containing crystals of pure salt; at one time the bottom seemed to be entirely covered with crystals. Thus far our success is "up to the mark." We have observed many little spring which run into the Dead Sea; and there are also some streams of importance besides the Jordan and the Kedron: among which is a beautiful stream of warm, fresh water. The evaporation constantly going on is immense; all the waters running into this sea escape only through the medium of evaporation; they do not rush along to fall into any other ocean as the waters of the Atlantic rush into the Mediterranean, but are absorbed here. We cannot then wonder that the rocks, as well as the beach stones, are thickly encrusted with a foreign body—that of salt. These incrustations possess a taste agreeing with that of the waters of the sea.

April 25th. Tuesday. After another night's rest, we come out of our camp "refreshed as with new wine." Our enthusiasm is well preserved, nor do we think it will ever decay while we are so well salted; our very clothes are saturated with salt, and the skin on our hands and face is, during the day, upon the sea, rendered stiff, disagreeable, and oily, and a prickling sensation spreads over us. This morning we start, with provisions on board for four or five days, to enable us the more uninterruptedly to prosecute our labors. So putting into the boats all our cargo, we left the camp in charge of the Sheriff of Acre, with one of our men, who was on the sick list, and a company of Turkish soldiers, to defend the camp against the attacks of the Bedouin Arabs. On the first night we encamped a little to the northward of Usdom (Sodom), beside a spring of fresh water.

Wednesday, 26th. This morning we are examining the hills of Usdom, and seeking with a good deal of curiosity the ever-famous "Pillar of Salt," which marks the judgment of God upon Lot's wife. On pulling round the shores of the sea we saw an immense column, rounded and turret-shaped, facing towards the southeast. This, we were told by our Arabs, was the Pillar of Salt, in which Lot's wife was encased at the overthrow of Sodom. With some difficulty we landed here, and our esteemed commander and Dr. Anderson obtained specimens from it, and Mr. Dale took a sketch of it. Our boat's crew landed also, and their curiosity was gratified by their gathering specimens, some from its summit, and others from its base. It was measured, and found to be sixty feet in height, and forty feet in circumference. We cannot suppose that Lot's wife was a person so large that her dimensions equalled those of this column. Many think that the statue of Lot's wife was equal to the pillar of salt which the Bible speaks of, let that pillar be where it may, and whatever be its size. They will not probably credit that this is the pillar, their preconceived notions having much to do with the matter, and they would have everybody think that she was at once transformed into a column of very fine-grained, beautifully white salt, about five feet or a few inches more in height, and in circumference that of a common-sized person of the nineteenth century. Be that as it may, no two minds have, perhaps, formed exactly the same opinion on this matter who have not visited this spot. But here we are, around this immense column, and we find that it is really of solid rock salt, one mass of crystallization. It is in the vicinity which is pointed out in the Bible in relation to the matter in question, and it appears to be the only one of its kind here. And the Arabs of the district to whom this pillar is pointed out declare it to be that of Lot's wife, the identical pillar of salt to which the Bible has reference; the tradition having been handed down from each succeeding generation to their children, as the Americans will hand down to succeeding generations the tradition of Bunker's Hill Monument in Boston. My own opinion of the matter is, that Lot's wife having lingered behind in disobedience to the express command of God—given in order to insure her safety—that while so lingering she became overwhelmed in this extraordinary column. If it has been produced by common, by natural causes, it is but right to suppose that others might be found of a similar description. One is scarcely able to abandon the idea that it stands here as a lasting memorial of God's punishing a most deliberate act of disobedience, committed at a time when he was about to show distinguishing regard for the very person. We carefully brought away our specimens, intending to show them to our friends in America, when we shall have the good fortune to arrive there, and talk with them on the subject. This end of the sea is very shallow, and its waters more dense, more salt, than when they are of greater depth; here it is from one to five feet in depth. We now leave this "Pillar of Salt," and return to our boats richly laden with specimens from it; we cross the sea, and obtain soundings on our way. We had nearly reached the opposite side when a new danger assailed us; we had braved all the dangers of the Jordan, in its stream and on its banks, and the peculiar storms on the Dead Sea, and now a new specimen of the dangers to which man is subject visits us. The fearful, scorching "Sirocco" rages around, threatening us with suffocation and blindness, and causing almost insupportable thirst. The "fiery atmosphere" seems as though it would doom us to the very fate of the unfortunate citizens who now lie engulfed below our boats; but we fearlessly pull away, until coming to a place called "Meserah," we land amid the raging heat of the wind, and there encamp for the night.

April 27th. Thursday. Having recovered from the suffocating influence of the storm of hot wind, which raged so fearfully yesterday and last night, we rose early, having had but little sleep, it being too hot for us to rest; the thermometer at midnight standing at 118 deg. We rose and stretched our weary limbs just after daybreak, when we saw several Arab women not far from our camp; we went towards them, but they fled at our approach. Soon after this, while our men had gone to fill our bottles with water, previous to our departure, we saw a number of Arabs coming down towards the tents. Not knowing who they were or what they might want, we thought it best to stand by our arms; we accordingly mounted our blunderbuss, and planted the American flag, then snatching up the rest of our arms, we coolly formed a line in front of the camp, and allowed them to approach within a certain distance; when our commander, without any hesitation, accompanied by his chief interpreter and guide, went forward to meet them. After the general salutation of kissing each other's cheeks and shaking of hands, they formed in a half circle and squatted down upon the beach. After a short conversation (through our interpreter) we gave them some tobacco, &c., with which they were very much delighted. In the mean time our men had returned from the spring with their bags of water, which they speedily stowed in the boats along with our tents and general cargo; when this was done the Arabs rose from the ground, and came to assist us in pushing off from the shore. The construction of the boats seemed to astonish and please them, but they were utterly confounded when they found they had no legs, and wondered how so many men could possibly travel in them; and as we took our seats one by one, they were more and more surprised, and especially so when we pushed off from the land and floated upon the sea; they stood in rapturous amazement when they saw us pulling away from the beach on the bosom of the sea, until we were beyond their sight. We pulled across the sea, sounding all the way, finding a depth of one to three fathoms. The other boat pulled round the peninsula, and stood in shore off the west side; here we all landed and encamped till the next day. A heavy breeze setting in from the west about this time gave us much trouble in effecting our landing.

It will be observed that this end of the sea is very shallow—one might say, uniformly so—so that the soundings give, almost entirely, a flat level bottom of slimy mud. It presents no crystals, but the shores were lined with incrustations of salt, probably from the constant evaporation rising from the sea. We noticed, after landing at Usdom, that in the space of an hour, our very foot prints upon the beach were coated with a crystallization.

April 28th. Friday. Left our encampment and once more embarked in our boats and pushed off from the shore. We had scarcely got off when a heavy northerly breeze set in and gave us a hard task. Our supply of water was nearly exhausted, and we had, consequently, to reach the camp as soon as possible, that being the nearest place whence we could expect to recruit our stock.

April 29th. Saturday. This day we have the copper boat under repair; she was completely disabled from active service during the storm of yesterday. The iron boat had weathered the sledge-hammer blows of the waves without sustaining any damage; she went out to-day, under proper command, with her general crew, to get the soundings we were prevented getting in consequence of the gale of yesterday.

April 30th. Sunday. Being the Sabbath, we have a little leisure time, as is usual on that day, when circumstances will admit. After dinner, the boats are manned to cross the sea to Carrack, where we expected to meet our guides, having sent them on beforehand to get everything ready, and make all necessary arrangements with the authorities for our visiting their town.

* * * * *
May 6th. Saturday. Everything is proceeding rapidly towards the close of our "pilgrimage in the east." Some of the men are using hammer and nails in erecting a staging, which our commander intends to anchor safely in the midst of the sea, and to hoist upon it the stars and stripes of our native land—America—to tell to whoever may hereafter visit these regions that fearless and enterprising Americans have won one more laurel to their country's pride; that they were the very first to navigate the rash stream of the Jordan, and to ride on its torrent down the to "Dead Sea;" which they have correctly surveyed and sounded, under the able command of Lieut. Lynch, in the year 1848, A. D.

May 9th. Tuesday. This day, on a distant spot in the sea, is securely anchored, the staging erected for the flag-pole and the "American national flag;" and now the tall flag-pole lifts it to the changing winds. The flag floats gaily in the air and tints the passing breeze: while she, reflected upon by the sun, paints her colors upon that ocean, which covers the once beautiful plain and the once magnificent cities of Sodom and of Gomorrah, and all their then existing population. This being finished, the iron boat is now hauled ashore on the beach, to be reduced to fractions and to be packed on the camels' backs for transportation to the Syrian coast. Having finished thus much of our labor, a party now pay a visit to the Convent of St. Saba, and in the evening return to the camp, accompanied by one of the resident Monks.

MINISTERIAL LABOUR.—The work of a minister is more laborious than that of a carpenter. When he hath wrought hard all day he goes home, and comes again in the morning, and finds his work as he left it. But we hew, and take pains, and leave our people, and come again, and find them worse than before.—Chrysostom.

THE FOOL'S REPROOF.—There was a certain nobleman, says Bishop Hall, who kept a fool, to whom he one day gave a staff, with a charge to keep it till he should meet one who was a greater fool than himself. Not many years after the nobleman fell sick even unto death. The fool coming to see his sick lord, the latter said unto him:

"I must shortly leave you."

"And whither art thou going?" said the fool.

"Into another world," replied his lordship.

"And when will you come again? Within a month?"

"No."

"Within a year?"

"No."

"When, then?"

"Never."

"Never!" said the fool, "and what provision hast thou made for thy entertainment there, whither thou goest?"

"None at all."

"No!" said the fool, "none at all? Here, take my staff; for with all my folly, I am not guilty of any such folly as this."

NEW JERSEY.

ST. MARY'S HALL AND BURLINGTON COLLEGE.—The Founder and Head of these Institutions, in acknowledging, with devout gratitude to God, the restoration and re-invigoration of his health, has the satisfaction to inform the patrons and friends of both, that, having been relieved from their whole financial care and management, he will be enabled to devote himself unreservedly, and with greatly increased ability, to his proper work, in their conduct and supervision.

The catalogue of the Hall, for the winter Term, contains the names of one hundred and sixty scholars, and twenty-four teachers; and that of the College, of one hundred and twenty-seven scholars, and nineteen teachers: making the rank and file in the two, deducting such teachers as are on duty in both, three hundred and twenty-six.

The summer Term, at each, begins on Tuesday, 1st of May, (St. Philip and St. James.) Prompt and punctual attendance is strictly required. From the limited room remaining unoccupied, at both Institutions, applications for admission cannot be made too soon. Address the Bishop of New Jersey.

CORRECTION.—Owing to a mistake in the copy sent us, Thirty Dollars were acknowledged by Bishop Potter, as received "from Mrs. Skennet of London," instead of Mrs. SKERRET OF LOUDONN.

THE SCHUYLKILL CONVOCATION.

The second quarterly meeting of the Schuylkill Convocation was held in Trinity Church, Pottsville, commencing on Monday afternoon, March 12th, 1849. The following clergy were present besides the Bishop—the Rev. Dr. Morgan, and the Rev. Messrs. Mintzer, Stem, Cooley, Lightner, Hurst, Leaf, Downing, Russell, Colhoun, Starkey and Beatty.

The Rev. Dr. Morgan preached the Convocation Sermon on Monday evening to a large and interested congregation. It was an instructive and admirable discourse, setting forth in impressive language the responsibilities of the clergy, and urging upon the brethren present the duty and necessity of an unwearied calling upon God for the grace which alone can enable them to discharge aright the duties of their stewardship.

Divine Service was celebrated in the Church six different times, once on Monday, three times on Tuesday, and twice on Wednesday. The Holy Communion was administered on Wednesday morning. On all these occasions the attendance was good, the services were solemn and impressive, and the sermons were calculated to arouse the thoughtless to reflection, and to press home upon all the great duties and obligations of a religious life.

On Tuesday evening the Bishop preached and administered the holy rite of confirmation to seventeen persons. The congregation on this occasion was very large, being drawn from all the different societies, and could not have numbered fewer than 800 persons. The subject of the Bishop's sermon was man's natural depravity; its reasonings were drawn from the every day life of the world as the experience of that life is embodied in the rules and maxims of men of the world. It was a powerful argument, and appealed beyond gainsaying to the reason and consciences of a large class who might not have been so open to the reception of Scripture testimony on the same subject.

Sermons were also preached by the Rev. Messrs. Lightner, Stem, Leaf and Mintzer. The Bishop delivered exhortations three several times from the chancel after sermon. In all the congregation seemed interested, by all they might have been, and we trust were, instructed, edified, and warmed into a fresher life. As to the clergy, whilst they are content to abide God's own time for the demonstration of His power, they entertain the conviction that these Convocation services will result in good to those whose happy privilege it is to be within the reach of their influence.

At this meeting it was determined, with the consent of the Bishop, to make this Convocation an agent in the work of Diocesan missions. The plan of proceeding is not fully matured, nor the resources of the Convocation developed, but it is not doubted that by the united and sympathetic action of the several parishes, much can be done for the spread of the Church, and that however limited may be our present power for good in this way, we at least can lay the foundation for future usefulness. The hope is at all events an inspiring one, and the end worthy of our best exertions; and when Convocations set out in the work of extending the borders and the influence of Christ's Holy Church, they present new and irresistible claims to the sympathy and support of every true friend of the gospel—who must "wish them good luck in the name of the Lord."

NEW YORK.

We have only room this week to copy the following announcement from a New York paper:—

DEATH OF REV. HUGH SMITH.—Dr. Smith died on Sunday, at his residence in Chelsea. He had been indisposed for a long time. During the morning service prayers were offered for his benefit, and in the afternoon the congregation were invited to attend his funeral.

Rev. Mr. SOUTHARD, of Calvary Church, preached on Sunday evening, in St. John's Chapel, for the benefit of the fund for establishing and maintaining the Protestant Episcopal Church, at San Francisco, California. The Chapel was crowded to excess, and the services were all very solemn and impressive. A contribution was made to the fund, of nearly $250, making the fund so far, equal to about $3,000.—N. Y. Express.

BISHOP SOUTHGATE AND THE CONSTANTINOPLE MISSION.

We take the following Pastoral Letters, from the Christian Witness. They present the claims of this Mission, on both sides so strongly, that we hope they will help to secure unanimous action in relation to it.

To the Clergy and Laity of the Protestant Episcopal Church in the Diocese of Rhode Island.

DEAR BRETHREN,—A crisis has occurred in the history of the Constantinople Mission, which has prompted the Committee of Foreign Missions 'to lay before the Bishops of the Church, the pecuniary wants of the Mission at Constantinople, and the inability of the Committee to meet them.' This exhibit has been made to the Bishops, 'with a view to the prompt relief of the Missionary Bishop, in such wise as to them severally may seem expedient; and with the explicit declaration on the part of the Committee, that they are most unfeignedly desirous of affording such relief, and are now, and have been heretofore, ready to do all in their power to promote this object.'

I know not how I can more appropriately comply with the request of the Committee and co-operate in their good design, than by addressing to my Diocese, in this Pastoral Letter, a brief statement and appeal on behalf of our Mission to the Oriental Churches. Like our other Foreign Missions, this was established by the constituted authorities of the Church, and the good faith of our communion stands pledged for its support. It has been assailed by misrepresentation and calumny from without, and amongst ourselves there has existed a difference of opinion as to its importance and usefulness. At a large meeting of the Board of Missions, during the session of the General Convention in 1847, a very minute inquiry was instituted in reference to the history, and principles, and influence of the Mission. The whole question of its merits, under the conduct of its Episcopal Head, was fully discussed by members of the Church, then and there assembled from all parts of the Union. The result of this scrutiny and debate was, an expression of the unabated confidence of the Board in the Christian integrity of Bishop Southgate, a conviction that he had faithfully adhered to the principles upon which the Mission was founded, as laid down in the Letter of instructions from Bishop Griswold, and a resolution to continue the Mission, with an appropriation of four thousand dollars per annum for its support.

Upon the ground of this appropriation, our Missionary Bishop in the East made his calculations and laid out his plan of operations. He took pupils into his family; he employed two native Priests, (of good character and respectable talents) reclaimed from Romish errors, as assistants in his work, and in other ways enlarged the sphere of his usefulness. Relying upon the decisive action of the Board at the meeting above referred to, the friends of the Mission, also, were inspired with new confidence, and felt assured that its operations would steadily progress without further interruption or difficulty.

Such, probably, would have been the case had the liberal designs of the Board been fully carried out, and its pledge of support been faithfully redeemed. But the acts of the members of the Church have been far less liberal than the purposes and resolutions of their representatives. The offerings specially designated for this Mission within the last twelve months, have scarcely amounted to a moiety of the appropriation voted for its support. With a knowledge of these facts, it would not have been difficult for a careful observer to foresee that, under the operation of the financial rules which the Foreign Committee deemed it expedient to adopt, the Mission would soon be reduced to that state of embarrassment and distress under which it is now actually suffering.

It is not merely an apprehended evil, but a real and existing one, which has rendered the present appeal necessary. For, although I am happy to learn that the balance of the appropriation due for 1848, was remitted in February last, yet it will not reach the seat of the Mission before one quarter of the present year shall have passed away. In a letter which I received from the Missionary Bishop, dated on the 25th of October last, (almost a month after the commencement of the fourth quarter of the year) he informs me that less than one fifth of the amount due to meet the expenses of the third quarter, had been received. Confiding in the pledge of the Board to furnish one thousand dollars per quarter, (or at that rate,) he made his arrangements accordingly: but when quarter day came round for the payment of house rent, the salaries of Assistants, the boarding of pupils, and other expenses connected with the Mission, he found himself without the means of meeting his obligations. It is unnecessary for me to enter into a detailed statement of the mortifications, perplexities and trials connected with the past year's history of the Constantinople Mission. Suffice it to say, that without a change of circumstances it must cease to exist. Unless funds be more freely contributed, and made more readily available for the supply of its wants, Bishop Southgate will be compelled to abandon an interesting Mission, which, to say the least, aimed at great results, and which, by God's blessing upon persevering efforts, might have attained them; and the Mission must be thus abandoned after an expenditure of much money and labor and at a period when the prospect of ultimate success is more encouraging than ever.

Will the Church, which sent forth our brother for the purpose of promoting, by Christian and fraternal means, the enlightenment and reformation of the darkened and corrupt churches of the East, compel, or even allow him to withdraw from his appointed field of labor, under circumstances so dishonorable to the pledged faith of her constituted agent and to the liberality of her members? I cannot believe it. I believe it is only necessary to make the wants of this important Mission known, to call forth the means needed for its relief.

To allow this Mission to sink under its present embarrassments, would be to withdraw from the Oriental Christians one of their chief safeguards against the arts and seductions of Papal emissaries, and to leave them without any specimen of Protestantism but one, which, having repudiated the Apostolic Discipline, adheres with no tenacity to the Orthodox Faith; and whose history in this country gives ground for the fear that it will contribute to the propagation of division and error, rather than to the restoration of primitive Unity and Truth.

There is no time for delay in this cause. It may be that, before intelligence of any special effort to save the Mission can reach him, Bishop Southgate, compelled by necessities and sufferings no longer endurable, may be on his return home. The Foreign Committee state that two thousand dollars 'ought to be remitted at once.' Immediate and liberal action is, therefore, of indispensable necessity. Your Bishop is persuaded that this little Diocese, already distinguished for its liberal contributions to the cause of Missions at home and abroad, will not be backward in giving a response to this special appeal. He earnestly recommends that the offerings in the respective parishes, on the Sunday next before Easter, April 1st, be specially appropriated to the Constantinople Mission; and that in those parishes where the offerings are not statedly taken every Sunday, there be a special collection for this object on that day.

In conclusion of this Letter, I would affectionately exhort all those who look with pity upon the errors and superstitions of the Eastern churches,—all who desire to see those early and venerable branches of the good old Vine restored to pristine vigor and fruitfulness, to come promptly to the aid of the chief instrument employed by our Church in that good work. I would urge it upon all who love our Lord Jesus Christ—upon all those who bear his name and are marked with his seal, to minister to our needy brethren of 'the household of faith' in their spiritual necessities. And if there be any amongst you who have been accustomed to look upon this Mission with doubtfulness and indifference, I would appeal to them as alike interested with others in maintaining the honor and credit of our Missionary Board. This Mission was established by the constituted authorities of the Church, and the faith of those authorities is pledged for its support: is it not then, the duty of every individual amongst us to aid in preventing its abandonment under circumstances that would entail deep and lasting disgrace upon the Church itself?

Imploping for you grace, mercy, and peace, from God our Father, and Jesus Christ our Lord, I remain

Your affectionate friend and pastor,

J. P. K. HENSHAW,
Bishop of Rhode Island.

Providence, March 19th, 1849.

P. S.—The sums contributed may be sent to Ezra W. Howard, Esq., Providence, Treasurer of the Convention, and receiving Agent for the Board of Missions.

VERMONT.

To the Clergy of the Diocese of Vermont:

REV. AND DEAR BRETHREN,—I have just been informed, to my surprise and regret, that the Missionary Bishop to Constantinople, Rt. Rev. Horatio Southgate, is suffering serious inconvenience and embarrassment from the deficiency in his remittances, having received less than one fifth part of the sum voted to his Mission by the Board, during the quarter previous to his last communication to his friends, and being thus rendered unable to meet his contracts for rent, wages and other necessary expenses. It has been through no fault of the Foreign Committee that this discreditable state of things has occurred, because it was announced to the Church, and perfectly understood by all concerned, that the Mission to Constantinople was to be sustained by the funds specially devoted to that object; and the alarming deficiency is therefore to be accounted for solely by the fact, that the advocates of this Mission have not contributed enough to enable the Committee to fulfil the pledges made by the Board for its support.

Under these circumstances, it has been determined, by several of the Bishops, to recommend to their respective dioceses an immediate effort to make collections for the Mission to Constantinople; and I have been invited to concur in this measure, as the only practicable mode of meeting the unexpected exigency.

You are doubtless aware, my brethren, that I have found myself called upon to dissent from the majority of the Board of Missions with regard to this whole subject, and I cannot say that I have in any respect changed my opinions, as to the ground, the plan, or the probable results of the enterprise. But notwithstanding, my own convictions remain precisely as they were, yet I hold it to be my duty to unite in the effort to sustain our Missionary Bishop, because the Missionary Board have decided that his Mission should be sustained, and it is incumbent on the minority to acquiesce in the action of the body, and aid, if necessary, to carry it into effect; since otherwise there can be no practical result, nor can the decisions of the Board be regarded with respect or confidence by the Church at large, if the Bishops themselves set an example of disaffection.

Whatever, therefore, the merits or demerits of the Mission to Constantinople in itself may be, and however you may feel disposed to regard it, I affectionately request that you will present the subject to your respective congregations as soon as circumstances may allow, and ask them to contribute to the support of our Missionary Bishop as liberally as they can, on the ground that he is now the accredited representative of the Church to a foreign people, and that we are bound, so long as he is so, to sustain him. His discredit, in the eyes of those foreign communities of Christians, can only redound to our disgrace. We have had no sufficient proof, or rather, I should say that we have had no proof whatever, at the meeting of the Board, which should deprive Bishop Southgate of our confidence. And if the constituted authorities of our Church have commissioned him to undertake a difficult and peculiar work, and he has left home and country, and spent many of his best years, in a faithful effort to fulfil the object of his appointment, amongst strangers in a strange land, he has a right to the stipulated support from the Church, and if we refuse to perform our part of the contract, we virtually nullify the powers of our Board of Missions, and expose our whole Communion to the grievous charge of disregard to our ecclesiastical obligations, in the eyes of all Christendom.

I am aware, however, that there is an answer to this view of the matter. It may be said, and very truly, that the peculiar arrangement made by the sanction of the Board with regard to this Mission, was expressly intended to throw the burden of sustaining it upon its advocates alone, and that those who were convinced of its inexpediency had a right to consider themselves exonerated from all responsibility. Such, I acknowledge, was my own distinct impression at the time. But can we suppose that our credit, as a Church, in the judgment of foreigners abroad, will suffer the less on this account, if Bishop Southgate be reduced to difficulty and discredit through the non-payment of his promised salary? Will the world at large take any note of the peculiar arrangement made in his case? Does he not still bear the office of a Missionary Bishop of the whole Church, through the action of our General Board of Missions? And is not the character of the whole Church substantially involved in the failure to sustain him?

To my mind, the reply to these questions is obvious and conclusive. And, therefore, I beg of you, my Reverend brethren, to make such effort as you can to sustain the credit of our Church in this matter, until it can be disposed of in some other way by the future action of our Missionary Board, or by our General Convention. And remember, I pray you, that whatever is to be done in the present exigency, must be done quickly. Some months of privation have already passed, and more must follow, even with our best exertions, before our Missionary Bishop, can receive the relief of necessities, to which I cannot but lament that he has ever been exposed. Commending you and your labors to the divine blessing, I remain,

Your affectionate brother in Christ,

JOHN H. HOPKINS,
Bishop of the Diocese of Vermont.

Burlington, Vt., March 10, 1849.

Selections.

THE STRANGER AND HIS FRIEND.

Matthew xxv. 35-40.

I.

A poor way-faring man of grief
Hath often crossed me on my way,
Who sued so humbly for relief
That I could never answer Nay;
I had not power to ask his name,
Whither he went, or whence he came,
Yet there was something in his eye
That won my love, I knew not why.

II.

Once when my scanty meal was spread
He entered; not a word he spake;
Just perishing for want of bread,
I gave him all: he blessed it, brake,
And ate, but gave me part again;
Mine was an angel's portion then,
For while I fed with eager haste,
The crust was manna to my taste.

III.

I spied him where a fountain burst
Clear from the rock; his strength was gone;
The heedless water mocked his thirst,
He heard it, saw it hurrying on;
I ran and raised the sufferer up,
Thrice from the stream he drained my cup,
Dipped, and returned it running o'er;
I drank, and never thirsted more.

IV.

'Twas night—the floods were out, it blew
A winter hurricane aloof;
I heard his voice abroad, and flew
To bid him welcome to my roof;
I warmed, I clothed, I cheered my guest,
Laid him on my own couch to rest,
Then made the earth my bed, and seemed
In Eden's garden while I dreamed.

V.

Stripped, wounded, beaten, nigh to death,
I found him by the high-way side;
I roused his pulse, brought back his breath,
Revived his spirit, and supplied
Wine, oil, refreshment,—he was healed;
—I had myself a wound concealed,
But from that hour forgot the smart,
And peace bound up my broken heart.

VI.

In prison I saw him next;—condemned
To meet a traitor's doom at morn:
The tide of lying tongues I stemmed,
And honoured him 'midst shame and scorn:
My friendship's utmost zeal to try
He asked—if I for him would die;
The flesh was weak, my blood ran chill,
But the free spirit cried, "I will!"

VII.

Then, in a moment, to my view,
The stranger darted from disguise;
The tokens in His hands I knew:
My Saviour stood before mine eyes:
He spake,—and my poor name He named—
"Of me thou hast not been ashamed;
These deeds shall thy memorial be;
Fear not, thou didst them unto me."

JOHN BUNYAN.

(From "Shaw's Outlines of English Literature.")

The book from which we make the following extract, has long been wanting among the text books for the higher classes of our seminaries. It presents a history of the literature of England from the earliest times, marking its progress and its changes, and embodying vivid sketches of the lives and writings of the prominent authors, in the style of the one subjoined. A pleasanter reading book we have not met with for many a day, nor one better calculated not only to impart a knowledge of its subject, but also a desire to extend that knowledge by further study.

"The impressiveness of Bunyan resembles that of the old woodcuts executed in the infancy of the art of engraving: there is in both cases a rude vigor and homeliness of outline, a strange ignorance of costume, and a powerful tendency to realize even the most abstract things by connecting them with the ordinary details of everyday life; there is also the same earnest intensity of purpose, and incessant struggle to bring the objects within the comprehension of the uncultivated minds to which the work was addressed. Above all there is visible, in the rude woodcut of the old German artist, as in the hardly less rude narrative morality of the English tinker, the unmistakeable and inimitable originality of genius. It is this quality which prevents the style of Bunyan, though often coarse, from ever being vulgar. Southey has excellently remarked, in his preface to the 'Pilgrim's Progress,' 'His is a homespun style, not a manufactured one; and what a difference is there between its homeliness and the flippant vulgarity of the Roger L'Estrange and Tom Brown School! If it is not a well of English undefiled, to which the poet as well as the philosopher must repair if they would drink of the living waters, it is a clear stream of current English, the vernacular speech of his age—sometimes, indeed, in its rusticity and coarseness, but always in its plainness and strength. To this natural style Bunyan is in some degree beholden for his general popularity; his language is everywhere level to the most ignorant reader and to the meanest capacity; there is a homely reality about it; a nursery tale is not more intelligible, in its manner of narration, to a child."

"In speaking of the causes of the extraordinary attraction which this book possesses, particularly to the young, we must not forget the immense command which Bunyan had over the whole vast store of Scripture language and imagery. He was emphatically a man of one book, a circumstance which was of itself almost sufficient to give his mind and productions a stamp of sincerity, originality, and force. He is a man of one book, and that book was the best. It was religion which first raised Bunyan from the slough of coarse indulgences and brutal ignorance in which, as he relates in his strange autobiography, he was plunged during the early part of his life: it was religion that first stirred up the depths of his honest and enthusiastic soul, and taught him to think as well as to feel; and much as his fanaticism (which was undoubtedly in some degree extravagant, proportioned to the greatness of the change produced in him by the vivifying influence of religious conviction acting on a powerful, imaginative, and uneducated character) may have exaggerated the extent of that transformation, we cannot wonder at his profound meditations on the instrument that produced it.

"His life may be recounted in a few words; he was the son of a tinker in Bedfordshire, and was born in 1628. Having acquired no education beyond reading and writing, he followed his father's less than humble occupation, and travelled about the country, indulging in all manner of profligate and sinful habits, among which that of swearing appears to have been perhaps the most reprehensible, though he speaks himself with almost equal horror of his reprobate taste for dancing, ale-drinking, and bell-ringing. After having been awakened, as he himself imagined (as do all enthusiasts in a similar case,) by a direct miraculous interposition of God, to a sense of his lost and wicked state, he appears to have gone through all the phases of transformation, from a careless and debauched peasant—'Christopher Sly, old Sly's son of Burton-heath; by birth a pedlar, by education a cardmaker, by transmutation a bearherd, and now by present profession a tinker,'—into an eloquent and celebrated preacher, and an author of enduring reputation. His religious convictions having gradually acquired consistence and certainty, he was admitted, in 1655, a member of the sect or congregation of Baptists; and he in time became a distinguished spiritual leader of that society. In this position he remained for five years, when he fell under the provisions of the law enacted against various denominations of Dissenters, and was imprisoned during twelve years in the jail of Bedford. Part of this long seclusion he employed in the composition of his works, the principal of which are the singular and interesting autobiography to which we have more than once alluded, and to which he gave the title of 'Grace Abounding to the Chief of Sinners;' the 'Pilgrim's Progress;' and another religious romance or allegory, entitled 'The Holy War made by King Shaddai on Diabolus, for the regaining of the Metropolis of the World, or the losing and retaining of Mansoul.' Under this last strange fanatical title it may easily be understood that we have a description of the fall of man, typified in the siege of the city of Mansoul, by Immanuel, the son of Shaddai or Jehovah, who ultimately retakes it from the usurper Diabolus. The 'Pilgrim's Progress' is divided into two parts, of which the first is by far the most striking, the latter exhibiting considerable marks of inferior originality and vivacity, and thus following the ordinary course of second parts and continuations. The first part describes the adventures of Christian in his pilgrimage to the Heavenly Jerusalem; and the second goes over the same ground with a manifest and unavoidable diminution of interest, detailing the journey taken by the wife and children of Christian.

In the manner of thinking, in the subjects selected by this singular genius, no less than in the style by which he conveys his conceptions to the reader, we find innumerable traces of that enthusiastic and fanatic spirit which was prevalent in England during the Civil War and the Republic, and which still characterizes the opinions and the language of those numerous sects which dissent from the discipline and doctrines of the Church of England. It is an ardent, sincere, and active spirit, and, if not always very philosophical, or very charitable, we must remember that it has generally been lighted up and cherished by proscription and persecution, and consequently is generally found burning most brightly in the hearts of the obscure and the uneducated. It is not surprising, therefore, that the exclusive study of the Scriptures, and incessant meditation upon a topic so mysterious and so all-important as religion, should lead poor and ignorant and persecuted men first into enthusiasm and then into fanaticism and superstition, and make them fall into the error, so universal in all ages, of overrating the importance and misinterpreting the significance of their own internal sensations, and investing the phantoms of their own heated imaginations with the sacred character of direct inspirations of God.

"Bunyan was liberated from prison by the generous and charitable interference of Barlow, Bishop of Lincoln, and continued to exercise his occupation of itinerant preacher till the proclamation of James II. appeared, recognizing the right of the dissenting sects to liberty of conscience and worship. He then was enabled, with the assistance of several friends, to build a meeting-house in Bedford, where he continued to preach with great and increasing reputation, occasionally making visits to his brother nonconformists in London, until his death. This event took place in 1688. Few of his numerous works are now read, with the exception of the 'Pilgrim's Progress,' a book whose admirable originality will ever cause it to retain its place in English literature beside the 'Robinson Crusoe' of De Foe, a fiction to which it bears in many points a very strong resemblance—a resemblance for which we shall endeavor to account in another place, when we come to speak of the last-named production. The two works are equal favorites with the young; they are read with equal interest, and remembered in after life by all who ever read them with equal tenacity."

FROM DR. UPFOLD'S SERMON ON FILIAL DUTY.

Filial duty involves, as another general leading principle, its due discharge in word. This relates to and comprises that, in which we sometimes find children painfully and discreditably deficient or indifferent—the maintenance of a respectful demeanor and address in all their intercourse with their parents. It is a most important, nay indispensable part of the obligation to "honor and fear our mother and our father," the omission of which admits of no excuse, while its observance constitutes one of the loveliest features of the filial character. Nothing, indeed, is more attractive, prepossessive, and bright in promise and in hope, on the part of a child, than this habitual practical reverence; and nothing more disgraceful, offensive and odious than its opposite. The language and deportment of children towards their parents, ought ever to be the echo and manifestation of their reverential thought. They should associate with the authors of their being, as inseparable ideas, an ever present sense of their natural superiority of position and authority, and whether in their presence or absence, in speaking to them, or in speaking of them, invariably treat them with all deference, kindness, and affectionate respect, in words, in attitude, in every movement and every action. Their tone and manner and language, on all occasions, should be that of subordination, carefully avoiding all harshness, rudeness, and petulance in their presence, and in their absence as carefully eschew the practice in which children sometimes indulge, of talking about them complainingly, disparagingly, with undue and irreverent familiarity, coarsely, flippantly, and insolently. Not only the "cursing tongue," the "mocking and despising eye," which the royal moralist so emphatically and awfully denounces, but every approach thereto, in the use of reproachful and derogatory epithets, and in the assumption of a scornful, supercilious manner, is equally unfilial, and as such, aggravatingly sinful. The character and reputation of parents should be very dear to their offspring. Even their foibles and faults should be treated with delicacy, tenderness and forbearance, and instead of being, as they sometimes are, made matters of ridicule, harshly animadverted on, and wantonly exposed, they should, as far as a good conscience, and truth and justice allow, be extenuated, and at all events as far as possible, concealed. No matter what the social position of parents, their disadvantages of education and intelligence, their frailties and defects, in the eyes of their children they should be ever venerable. They are our parents, and it should be our aim and endeavor to secure them all rightful consideration and respect by respecting them ourselves, in word and in behavior. It is a sacred as well as an unalterable relation, clustered about with endearing associations, and affecting and weighty claims; and it must be some great negligence, injustice and cruelty on the part of parents, something exceedingly wicked and criminal, something monstrous in conduct, which can throw these associations into shade, and impair, weaken and forfeit those claims. And even in such cases, kindness and gentleness, though they may not be reciprocated, and courteousness and forbearance, though they may be harshly repelled, are still their due. Indeed there are no conceivable circumstances, in any stage or condition of the mutual relationship when tenderness, kindness, reverence in word and deportment, are not demanded from children to parents, and when the refusal, omission or evasion of them, admit of any reasonable plea, or just apology. When the parental office is duly discharged, they are imperative, and are to be "invariably rendered, without qualification, without reserve, without reluctance." When it is neglected or perverted, though they may seem to be undeserved, and may be hard to practise, yet they are then the dictates of nature, and the command of God: and if, as has been well remarked, "the duty be difficult, it is proportionally excellent, honorable, and lovely."

Have we then, any of us, children, youth, or those of maturer years, been unmindful of, or indifferent to this important relative and social duty, this indispensable part of the law of our spiritual life, and are still careless and neglectful of the obligation? Let it enter into the self scrutiny which the close of the year so significantly suggests and urges. If conscious of the offence in any manner or degree, let us, with penitence deep and unfeigned for all past derelictions in this respect, piously resolve, and earnestly endeavor, in the ability of heavenly grace which God giveth in answer to prayer, an amendment and reformation, in spirit and in act. At the close of another year we may not have parents to honor and fear, to love, and cherish and obey. We may be bereaved of them, and of their kindness together; our negligence may be irreparable, and the opportunity of redeeming the past be denied, though it be desired earnestly, importunately, and with tears. The grave may cover them, and from it issue a voice of lasting condemnation and reproach. Would we save ourselves this bitter and clinging remorse? would we avoid the sin and the shame of the blackest of all ingratitude! would we approve ourselves to God and to our own consciences, in a point of duty relatively to which the will of God is plain, and its demands imperative and extensive?—and conscience, however much and purposely deadened, will from time to time rise up in all its energy of remonstrance, and with trumpet tongue accuse and condemn—would we desire in our subsequent career to command the respect and secure the esteem of the virtuous and the good, make the days of youth delightful, manhood pleasant, and old age serene and tranquil? let us never, never forget, but be ever practically mindful of the commandment with promise, "Honor thy father and thy mother," and "Ye shall fear, every man his mother and his father," sanctioned and enforced as the command is, by the brilliant, impressive, and winning example of our blessed Lord, as the child Jesus, who, at the remonstrance and desire of his virgin mother, "went down with them,"—his parents according to the flesh—"and came to Nazareth, and was subject unto them."

Filial piety, my brethren—I would impress it upon your minds—is fraught with blessings in this world, and with the purer, abounding and enduring blessings of the world to come. As a practical principle, its influence and power are extensive, ramifying secretly, but efficiently, through all the social relations of life, from small to great. It is the delight, the charm, the attraction of home; the talisman of the domestic circle, promotive and conservative in a large degree of its harmony, its comfort, and its prosperity. It is the basis of social order in the family, in the community, and through these, in the more extended organizations of government. The state indirectly feels the influence of its individual and personal exercise in the spirit of subordination which it creates and diffuses; for in proportion as that prevails, the general social fabric is strengthened, established, and sustained. Particularly and generally, near and remote, personally, and collectively, it is eminently beneficial. And its rewards are great. Here, in this probationary pilgrimage, besides the inward peace it generates and cherishes, it encircles all who exercise it with an halo of virtuous brightness, seen, admired, and honored of all. It is a pledge of confidence, an assurance of integrity to our fellow creatures, in whatsoever employment we may engage, and in whatever station we occupy; and thus, is ordinarily a presage of success and prosperity. And when our earthly course is finished, it will meet with a glorious recompense of reward; will be recognized prominently among those good works, those graces and virtues of the Christian life, which through the infinite and alone merits of Christ Jesus our Lord, will constitute us worthy and approved of God, and will "minister unto us an entrance abundantly into his heavenly kingdom and glory. Amen."

STORY OF IRISH EMIGRANTS.

At a meeting of the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel, which was held at Armagh on St. Matthew's Day, (21st Sept. 1848,) under the presidency of his Grace the Lord Primate of Ireland, the Venerable Archdeacon STOKES spoke as follows:—

"Among the numbers who left my parish during the past year, were three young persons from the first class in the Sunday-school. Each before her departure called upon me to receive her Pastor's last advice—his parting blessing. I well remember the deep shade of sorrow that clouded the bright and sunny countenance of one; she was a very intelligent girl, and diligent, as far as opportunity was given her, in attending on all the means of religious instruction. She was present at the last Sunday-school at which she could be present—she joined the last meeting in the House of Prayer—she knelt at the Lord's Table, and received from my hands the hallowed bread, the last time the Holy Communion was celebrated before she left the country. And these were to her the last opportunities she ever enjoyed. She fell a victim to fever on the wide ocean, and her body was committed to the deep, to rest until "the sea shall give up the dead that are in it." No pastor sat beside her bed of sickness; she had not in her dying hour the comfort of the ministrations of religion. The other two young persons crossed the Atlantic in safety, but one was seized with fever immediately on landing, carried to the quarantine station, and at Grosse Isle breathed her last; but she had the comfort of the Minister of the Gospel kneeling at her side, guiding her with his counsel, and strengthening her for her coming trial. Yes, the Missionaries of the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel hurried to that scene of pestilence, devoted themselves night and day to the sick and dying; and, as you have just heard, more than one was called from that trying scene, to rest from his labours and enter upon his exceeding great reward. Of the third young person I could only learn, that she had passed on in health and safety with her family to Upper Canada. About three or four months ago, I received a Canadian newspaper. I looked over its pages, and was just throwing it aside, wondering who had sent it to me, or why it was sent, when my eye caught a well-known name, and revealed the history of my poor young friend. With your permission I will read it for you.

"At Port Robinson, District of Niagara, on the 12th Feb., in the sure and certain hope of a glorious resurrection, Eleanor Winslow, aged 24. She was a native of the parish of Aghnacloy, Diocese of Armagh, whence she came with her father and family last summer. On her passage up Lake Ontario, her father asked her to do some washing for a poor woman who was ill, and had a large family, so that they might be clean and neat when arriving at Toronto. This she was glad to do; but whilst engaged in this act of charity, a shower came on, and, being strong and hearty she continued at her work till she became drenched with rain. She had hardly reached her destination, when she was seized with a severe attack of fever. Immediately I was sent for; and, on my arrival, I was shown a letter of commendation from her parish clergyman, which speaks for itself:—"Eleanor Winslow having signified to me her intention of emigrating to Canada, I hereby certify that she is a member of the Church, has been confirmed and is a communicant. She was a diligent attendant upon the Sunday-school under my superintendence, and bears an excellent character. I commend her to the special care of the Minister of the Church, wherever she may be placed." This excellent letter,* (the like of which every one emigrating should have,) and some valuable religious books given her by her Clergyman and her old Sunday-school teacher, led me to expect much pleasure from my visit to such a person; nor was I disappointed. When I was announced to her as the Clergyman of the parish, her countenance became lit with a pleasing smile, as if I had been an old and well-known friend. She took me cordially by the hand, and expressed her gratitude to God for allowing her once more to hear His precious words from the mouth of one of His ministers. Though she had never heard my voice before, it appeared to her not as the voice of a stranger, for it brought to her remembrance truths with which she had been long and well acquainted. Her firm and unwavering reliance was placed upon the Lord Jesus Christ as her all-sufficient Saviour. She was willing and ready to die, if He saw good to call her hence; or she was willing to live, if He saw good to restore her again to her father and friends. By God's blessing on the skill and attention of her physician, she recovered from the attack of fever; but she soon fell into a rapid decline. During the whole time I visited her, I never saw any change except in her bodily appearance. She was always calm, cheerful, ready in reliance on the strength of her heavenly Father to brave and endure anything that might be in store for her; and, trusting in the merits of her dear Saviour, she had no fear of death. About a fortnight before her death, she partook, with a grateful heart, of the blessed Sacrament of the Body and Blood of Christ. It was to her a rich feast—a spiritual banquet. Though extremely weak in body, her soul was strengthened to behold, by faith, her blessed Saviour bleeding, dying upon the accursed cross for her; and this feeling begat in her a spirit of humility and gratitude—a sense of her own unworthiness, and of Christ's great love for her, an unworthy sinner. Two nights before her dissolution, as her father was speaking to her, she bid him 'not grieve for her, as she was going to her grandfather and grandmother—to her dear mother and sisters, who had gone to heaven before her;' and almost the last thing she did was to take her Prayer-book, and read two of her favourite psalms; after which she sank into a state of great peace and quietness, from which she gently glided into another and a better world."

"The writer of this simple, unaffected record is a Missionary of the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel. It was his voice that she welcomed, not as the voice of a stranger, though she had never seen his face before; it was his hand she grasped with affection as that of 'an old and well known friend.' And why? Because she recognised him as her Pastor, a Minister of the Church. I appeal to you, if facts such as these were generally made known (and the Quarterly Papers of the Society contain many similar statements,)—if by means of Parochial Associations the operations of the Society were laid before the members of the Church, we might not safely affirm the Resolution now proposed, that such Associations would procure for the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel that sympathy and support to which its labours are so justly entitled."

THE HOLY WEEK.

There is great significance in the names, chosen by general consent, to designate particular things. The character of an age may almost be determined by the forms of expression in current use. It is certain that the terms, commonly employed by any class of Christians, exhibit the tendencies of their Theology.

It may seem a fanciful thought to some, but it appears to us, that the difference between the Christianity "of old time," and that of our day, might almost be discovered from the change which has taken place in the names given to the same things. We are led to these remarks by the fact, that the coming week, which is now called "Passion Week," used to be called by the Church, in primitive ages, the Holy Week, and sometimes the Great Week.

In the substantial faith of those times, each holy doctrine and truth of the Gospel was viewed in connection with man's improvement of it to the great end designed. All their religion was practical. Thus the Week marked by the wonders of Redemption, distinguished by a Saviour's Cross and Passion, derived its name from the improvement or use man made of it in advancing, on his part, the great purpose for which all this was done. It was called Holy because its solemn period was consecrated by greater devotion, by more faithful vigilance, by more constant prayer in the closet, and in the sanctuary. Those who thus appropriated its great results, might well call this also the Great Week.

The common name, by which this period is now designated, is Passion Week. This change marks the difference in our present religious system. It is too common to hold up the great truths of our faith as mere objects of wonder or adoration. Those who would not bow before an image, fear not to worship an abstraction. Those who would not, for worlds, adore the Cross, often pay empty worship to the doctrine which it symbolizes. The Passion of our Blessed Saviour may be regarded by us as a most certain reality, and it may excite the liveliest emotions of sorrow, wonder, and gratitude, yet this will avail us nothing, unless we are thus delivered from sin, and strengthened in holiness. It is not by a historical remembrance of the great truth, that we are to be blessed, but by making our Christian lives, during this week, the evidences of the truth we commemorate. Not from our lips alone, but from our hearts, in our lives, we should now utter that solemn Litany:—"From all inordinate and sinful affections, and from all the deceits of the world, the flesh, and the devil; by thine Agony and Bloody Sweat; by thy Cross and Passion; by thy precious Death and Burial: Good Lord deliver us."

Thus we should strive to mark this week not only as the "Passion Week" of our Saviour, but as a "Holy Week" of our own, even as it was at first distinguished by the early followers of Christ. How these observed it, we may learn from one of the Lent Sermons of St. Chrysostom: "In this week many increase their labors; some adding to their fastings, others to their watchings; others give more liberal alms, testifying the greatness of the Divine goodness by their care of good works, and more intense piety and holy living. As the Jews went forth to meet Christ when he raised Lazarus from the dead, so now, not only one city, but all the world, go forth to meet him; not with palm-branches in their hands, but with alms-deeds, humanity, virtue, fastings, prayers, watchings, and all sorts of piety, which they offer to Christ their Lord. And not only we, but the emperors of the world honor this week, making it a time of vacation from all civil business, that the magistrates, being at liberty from the business of the law, may spend all their days in spiritual service. Let the doors of the courts, say they, all be shut up: let all disputes, and all kinds of contention and punishment, cease; let the executioner's hand rest a little: common blessings are wrought for us all by our common Lord; let some good be done by us his servants."

Is the business of the world of more importance now than it was then? Or, is the work of salvation, and the undying soul of less comparative value? Why cannot ALL those who profess obedience to the Church, which commands this service of her members, find time for the small public duty now enjoined? In the proper place will be found a list of services in some of our Churches. Surely these services should be attended by all who would so faithfully follow their Lord in this world, that He may lead them, with Him, through the grave and gate of death, to a Joyful Resurrection. As the Holy Week, though darkened by the shadow of the Cross, is crowned with the Easter Festival, so may our mortal lives, shaded oft by darkness, brighten into the cloudless light of immortality.

POSITIONS OF THE CONGREGATION IN THE BAPTISMAL SERVICE.

"Layman" has asked us several questions on this subject. We fully agree with our Correspondent, that it is important to have uniformity in these matters, and that, to secure this, it is the plain duty of Churchmen to sacrifice individual preferences. The truth is, people like to know what they are to do, when they come into the House of God. Those who have been brought up in the Church, especially dislike to appear ignorant of her proper practices. But really, as things now are, our oldest Clergy have sometimes to take lessons from their younger brethren, when officiating in their Parishes. We do think this is a fair subject for the consideration of the House of Bishops, and we hope the day will come when both Clergy and Laity will know how and when to kneel, sit, or stand in all our services, and not only know what's right, but practise what they know.

As to the particular questions of "Layman," it is impossible to give any express decision when there is no express law in the case. But sound principle will ever lead to right practice. We think that a universal principle, in all the services of our Liturgy, is, that all the congregation share in the solemnities of the Sanctuary, and none are to appear as mere idle spectators. The solemn mysteries of our holy religion are never to be gazed at with vacant unconcern. All present are to feel and express their interest. Every "exhortation" is to be listened to with reverent attention, as if it applied to all present. The postures of the congregation should, throughout, coincide with those of the party at the Font. Clearly they should stand when the Holy Sacrament is administered to show their reverence, and to express their readiness to welcome the new member into the congregation of Christ's Flock.

The general practice is not for the people to repeat audibly the prayer after the exhortation following the Gospel. In other cases where this is to be done, as in the general confession, &c., the rubric is very explicit.

As another Correspondent refers to the practice of the Clergy sitting during the singing of the Psalm, &c., we can only say, that sometimes it may be necessary. If not, he should set the proper example to his people. And we are sorry to observe, that the practice of sitting, during the Psalter and other similar parts of the service, is becoming very common. This is a plain departure from the wise usage of the Church, and can only be excused when age or infirmity makes it necessary. Of course the charitable supposition is, that those who are under such necessity are either afflicted with the infirmities of growing age or some physical weakness.

CALIFORNIA.

The Rev. Flavel S. Mines, who for some time after his ordination was the beloved assistant of the "venerable Milnor," and subsequently officiated with great acceptance in the island of Santa Cruz, and more recently, was rector of St. Luke's Church, Rossville, Staten Island, sailed on Thursday last, in the 'Crescent City,' for San Francisco via Chagres. Mr. Mines does not go as a Missionary, but to establish himself as a parish minister, having been informed by several gentlemen who purpose settling there that such a course would be most conducive to the interests of the Church. In this plan he has been assisted by several friends, both clerical and lay, and we cordially rejoice that their praiseworthy efforts have been favored with such prompt success. We earnestly pray that our estimable and gifted brother may be blessed by the Great Head of the Church in his high and holy enterprise.

The Courier and Enquirer gives the following interesting intelligence: "Mr. M. has had presented to him by the congregation of Van Voorst Church, (New Jersey,) a full communion service for the use of his Church; and the lady of Henry I. Seaman, Esq., [one of the Wardens of the Church at Rossville,] sent him, on the eve of his departure, a private communion service of silver. Samuel B. Ruggles, Esq., tendered most handsomely a bell for his Church, to be forwarded by him to San Francisco, and Mr. Wills, the architect, furnished an admirable design and elevation for a Church edifice, which has been beautifully lithographed, and copies of the same forwarded by the Crescent City, the owner of which noble vessel, as before stated in this paper, furnished a free state room and passage to the Reverend gentleman."

We are told that copies of the beautiful design of Mr. Wills may be obtained of Messrs. D. Appleton & Co., D. Dana, jr., 20 John street; Stanford & Swords, and at the office of the Courier and Enquirer, at 50 cents each. The proceeds are to be applied to the benefit of the object.

We would also state that a Seraphine is much wanted, and would be a most acceptable donation.—Churchman.

BURLINGTON COLLEGE.

This Church Institution closed its Winter Term on Tuesday last. The various classes were examined upon their course of studies, during the half year. A friend, well qualified to judge, informs us that the Pupils in all departments fully sustained the high character of the College for sound and faithful instruction.

The young gentlemen, of the Junior and middle classes, read compositions on well selected subjects, in the Hall of the College, and the usual interesting exercises marked the closing of the Term.

This institution is now in a most flourishing condition. And we may hope for it even greater vigor and success from the fact, announced in another part of our paper, that the Bishop, with renewed health and unembarrassed by its financial arrangements, will be able to give to the supervision of the College even greater care and attention.

COLLECTION FOR CALVARY CHURCH.

Next Sunday is the day designated, by the Bishop, as an occasion for a general collection throughout the Diocese for this Church, to be erected as "a Monument to Bishop White." We hope that the offerings of the Church in Pennsylvania, will suitably express the reverence felt for the memory of her first Bishop.

PASSION CONTEMPLATIONS.

Our thanks are especially due to the learned Author of this able article. We invite the serious attention of our readers to this communication so wisely suited to the present season.

NEW PUBLICATIONS.

We have received from Messrs. STANFORD & SWORDS, of New York, a beautiful Pocket Prayer Book. It is sufficiently large for use, and yet small enough to be conveniently carried. The binding is particularly worthy of notice. Though rich, it is so flexible that it may be almost doubled up and bent in any way, without injury. It is just the thing for those who wish to make their Prayer Book a constant companion. We hope it may influence many thus wisely to choose their company.

PRACTICAL CHARITY; a sermon, delivered in Trinity Church, Pittsburgh, on Quinquagesima Sunday, February 18, 1849, in aid of Domestic Missions. By George Upfold, D. D., the Rector.

This is another strong and earnest voice from beyond the Alleghanies, speaking to the Church of an important duty, and speaking with no uncertain sound. This sermon is inscribed, with a most appropriate dedication, to the first Missionary Bishop of our Church, Dr. Kemper. It is a just tribute to his services in this noble cause, as few have done more to excite and to give the right direction, to Missionary feeling in the Church. Surely, in the white harvest fields of the West, is a glorious chance for the exercise of "Practical Charity."

We have marked some passages to extract, from this excellent sermon, which is the best notice we can give of it.

We must also find room for at least, a portion of Mr. Breck's letter to the Children of the Sunday School of Trinity Church, Pittsburgh, which is appended to the Discourse. Perhaps it will help to make up the remainder of the one thousand dollars for NASHOTAH. We only need four hundred dollars.

A CHEAP, SAFE AND EASY VOYAGE TO EUROPE.

Most indubitably we live in a wonderful age—an age of progress. Each new wonder seems but the step to another. A little while ago we thought it a marvel that the wide Atlantic could be traversed in ten days. Again, we have another miraculous discovery in the Magnetic Telegraph. And now, as if to overtop them all, Europe itself is brought to our doors.

Through the kind invitation of the Proprietor, we had the pleasure of visiting Bayne's Series of Panoramas, entitled a voyage to Europe. Of a portion of the views we can attest the perfect accuracy. We could hardly conceive it possible to give such a correct idea of the originals. Even the representation of the storm at sea is admirable. In fact, if the Artist could only infuse a little sea-sickness into the spectators, and throw them a little about the room, the illusion would be perfect.

The sail up the Mersey and the Thames, and Liverpool and London, are most truthful pictures. We cannot speak from our own knowledge of the Rhine, though it is said to be equally accurate. Surely none will refuse to take this "voyage to Europe," when it can be done for twenty-five cents, including all necessary provisions, and excluding sea-sickness, shipwreck, &c.

From Late English Papers.

We have received, by the last steamer, Church papers from England, up to March 8th.

An important debate has taken place in the House of Commons on a motion of Lord Ashley, "that an humble address be presented to Her Majesty, praying Her Majesty to appoint a commission to inquire into the practicability and mode of subdividing, into distinct and independent parishes, for all ecclesiastical purposes, all the densely-peopled parishes in England and Wales, in such manner that the population of each, except in particular cases, at the discretion of the commissioners, shall not exceed 4000 souls."

Under the present system, in many large towns there is but one Parish, though the churches may be numerous. A Rector or Vicar, has charge of the parish church, and the clergy of the other churches are his curates. He is, in fact, a Presbyter Bishop, and this is a corruption of the old church system when each larger city had its proper Bishop. Dr. Hook, of Leeds, set a noble example by voluntarily surrendering his rights, and using his influence to secure the division of Leeds into separate parishes. Lord Ashley's motion was carried by a large majority. The Colonial Church Chronicle informs us of the following contemplated meeting:

"We are informed that the Bishops of the five British North American dioceses propose to meet at Halifax on Ascension Day (17th of May next.) This will be the first Episcopal Synod in the Colonial Church, and must, therefore, be regarded, as an occasion of great interest and importance. Considering the vast distance by which the Bishops are separated from each other, and the various anomalies and embarrassments by which they are severally beset in building up the Church in a new country, we are led to anticipate much good as the result of their joint deliberations. Perhaps something in the shape of general rules or canons for the government of the Church in their several dioceses may be agreed upon."

OXFORD.—"Mr. J. A. Froude, late Fellow of Exeter, who has just resigned his Fellowship, has lately published a work, entitled the 'Nemesis of Faith,' in which the hero, supposed to represent himself, boldly avows that he cannot believe in the Bible. Mr. Froude is a brother of the gentleman whose 'Remains' were published some years since, and he was formerly at Littlemore, under Mr. Newman's influence. The same subtle philosophy which led the master to Rome, has, apparently, led the pupil into infidelity. Incredible as it may appear, it is confidently reported that Mr. Froude is about to proceed to one of our Colonies, as a Tutor or Professor in some Educational institution, in connection with University College, Gowerstreet. Mr. Sewell burnt his book in College last week."

"The senior wrangler of this year at Cambridge, Mr. Pell, is a native of California."

"One of the first fruits of Miss Sellon's persecution at Devonport is announced by the Liverpool Mail. Our contemporary says that 'a Protestant Sisterhood will shortly be established in that immediate neighbourhood,' and that on Sunday a sermon was preached in St. Martin's Church in that town, in aid of the Orphan's Home at Devonport."

On this subject the English Churchman has the following judicious remarks. Speaking of the probable effect of the examination at Devonport, the hope is expressed that all parties "will for the future lend a less willing ear to charges which are brought against those who are manifestly devoting themselves, with much earnestness and self-denial, to relieving the spiritual and temporal wants of the much-neglected poor of this land. There must, we are convinced, be some among them who now—as men, and as Christians—feel grieved and ashamed that ladies, who had left all, and followed their Lord and Master into His Vineyard, should have been subjected to misrepresentation and calumny. They must acknowledge that had the few trifling errors in judgment, which have been proved against the Sisters of Mercy, been ten-fold greater in number and importance—in an opposite direction, we should have heard nothing from them in the matter—e. g., had there been a pulpit in the 'Oratory,' instead of an altar, from which the Sisters, by turns, had preached to their household; and had Clergymen and Dissenting Ministers been allowed alternately, or indifferently, to have joined in their spiritual exercises, not one word would have been uttered, or written, against them by their present accusers."

"Had the error been even to this extent, and in this direction, although we do not say that the opposite party—that we ourselves—would have been silent, yet we are convinced that these ladies would not, even in such an extreme case, have been subjected to the painful ordeal through which they have recently had to pass."

"It appears to us, that in all such cases—whether Churchmen, or Churchwomen, 'High Church' or 'Low Church,' are concerned—the most effectual, sensible, and Christian way is to remonstrate plainly, faithfully, and affectionately, with regard to any deeds or words which are inconsistent with the requirements of the Church, and which give offence to weak brethren. If all parties—those who appeal and those who are appealed to—have their mind, and soul, and strength in the work, the appeal will never be in vain: it is only when private fancies, and prejudices, are ignorantly or perversely exalted and exaggerated so as to be mixed up and identified with the work itself, that such appeals are rejected.

"Did the 'Protestant' Clergy of Plymouth, and Devonport, adopt this Christian course—did they go to Miss SELLON, or the Clergy of the district, and say, 'We sympathise with your work, and are willing to co-operate with you in it; but we do not quite like some of your ways: prove them to be enjoined or sanctioned by the Church, or necessary to the work, and we shall be satisfied?' We fear that nothing like this, either in its letter or its spirit took place between the parties."

ITALY.—It is announced that the Pope, after having consulted the Sacred College, has applied to the Governments of France, Austria, Spain, and Naples, for an armed force to enable him to return to his capital. The Grand Duke of Tuscany, it is also stated, has resolved to demand the intervention of the Austrian Government to restore him to his dominions.

The occupation of Ferrara appears to have been temporarily made to obtain reparation of alleged murders of three soldiers of the Austrian garrison. A fine of 206,000 scudi was levied, the assassins of the soldiers were shot, the Pope's arms, which had been removed from the public buildings restored, and citizens were carried off as hostages by the retiring Austrians.

All the Austrian property in Rome has been confiscated, as a retaliation for the exaction made at Ferrara. On the 21st the Assembly decreed the confiscation of the entire property of the Church. The parish clerks only were to have salaries paid to them by the State. The salaries of all the Cardinals, except five who continued to reside in the Roman territory, were suspended. The Carnival had been observed with much merriment, but little splendour.

The English Churchman thus wisely speaks of the causes which have produced such unhappy effects, within a year past, in the countries of Europe.

"The times in which unbelief has prevailed are uniformly times of earthly calamity; for the moral depravation which accompanies unbelief necessarily destroys the foundation of all earthly prosperity. Never was the truth of this fact more strikingly displayed than in the last European Revolution, of which the French people celebrated the anniversary on Saturday last. We have seen the three most profligate capital cities of Europe—Berlin, Vienna, and Paris—the scenes of bloodshed, robbery, and every other atrocity that can disgrace human nature. And why was this? Because in these very cities, and in the countries dependent on them, religion was almost entirely neglected. Races, balls, theatres, buying and selling, planting and building, were going on constantly on the Lord's Day, as if there was no difference between it and the other days of the week. The great object of the Governments of those nations was to gratify all the sensual appetites of the masses of the people, and to make war against the spiritual and intellectual nature of man. They were quite successful. The population of those countries was the most immoral in Europe. We have seen the result."

From the same paper we add the following summary of general news:—

Though Paris was tranquil during the three glorious days of February, there have been several disturbances in the Provinces. The principal subject of public interest in France at present is undoubtedly the Italian question. The Ministry wish to interfere in favour of the Pope, while the people are in favour of the Revolutionary Government. As the President has himself conspired against the Pope in former days, and his cousin is Vice-President of the Roman Republic, there can be no doubt which way his inclinations tend. He will maintain his Idees Napoléoniennes.

The Danes have given notice that they do not mean to renew the armistice, which expires on the 26th inst.; but it is believed that peace will be made with Germany before that date.

Prussia seems to be uniting more closely with England, whilst Austria and Russia maintain their old alliance.

On the 23rd ult. Dembrowski was close to Pesth, and Windischgrätz was about to attack him. The Hungarians have evidently made greater progress than the Imperialists are willing to allow.

In Spain, Marsal has beaten the Government troops, and Cabrera is at the head of 200 men.

The Grand Duke of Tuscany has arrived at Gaeta on his way to Naples. His troops all deserted General Langier, and joined the Republicans. It is said that the Austrians mean to march into Tuscany.

The Neapolitan troops are moving towards the Papal Frontier. The King hopes to settle the Sicilian question in an amicable manner, on the basis of the Constitution of 1812. A great deal however must depend upon the turn which events take in other parts of Italy.

The Pope is still at Gaeta. The Revolutionary Government intend to confiscate the property of the Church in the Roman States; paying the Clergy out of the proceeds, and keeping the surplus for the use of the State. How the Clergy will be paid under this system, let France and Spain answer. The Pope has publicly notified that all sales and bargains connected with the property of the Church will be absolutely null and void.

The Austrians have asked the Sultan to send his fleet to help them in the Adriatic; whilst the Russians have demanded a free passage for their fleet through the Dardanelles. The Sultan has refused both these requests. The Russians say they will force the passage. It is evident that our Indian embarrassments have infused new vigour into the Russians. They hope to march to Constantinople, whilst we are hampered with Shere Singh.

A good understanding with France is the only way to check the encroachments of Russia. An English Fleet in the Baltic and Black Seas, and a French army in Poland, would bring the Emperor of Russia to his senses. Nothing short of this will do any good.

Disturbances have taken place in Cracow; where the Poles are anxious to regain their independence. They had better wait till the Russians march to Constantinople. Then will be the time for them to strike a blow against their oppressors.

The Viceroy of Egypt left Constantinople on the 5th ult. The Sultan has invested him also with the Pachalic of Nubia.

The news from India is important. The Citadel of Moultan surrendered on the 22d of January. At Chillianwallah a sanguinary battle was fought on the 13th of January, between the English under Lord Gough, and the Sikhs under Shere Singh. On the English side 26 officers and 600 men were killed, and 66 officers and 1,446 men were wounded; whilst the Sikhs had 4000 killed and about 3,000 wounded. The engagement may be called a drawn battle. When Chuttur Singh and Dost Mohammed with Gholab Singh join the enemy, as they most probably will, and General Whish from Moultan and Brigadier-General Wheeler from the Jullundur Doab, join Lord Gough, the relative strength of the opposing armies will be pretty much the same. We are happy to be able to announce that Sir Charles Napier will soon take the command of our Indian forces. His name alone is a tower of strength. Lord Gough, though as brave as a lion, has not sufficient knowledge of strategy for a Commander-in-chief.

In Ireland there is quite a turmoil about the rate in aid of the Poor Law. The emigration still continues, and the country is as wretched as ever. Nevertheless, the Romish Priesthood, having no O'CONNELL rent to raise, have taken this opportunity of making a collection for the POPE.

In England, the reduction of the army, which ought never to have been commenced in the present state of European affairs, has been stopped in consequence of the news from India.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE BANNER.

REV. AND DEAR SIR:

If you think it will minister to edifying, the following Exposition of the most remarkable chapter in the Old Testament, written in 1815, during my noviciate, and since imperfectly revised, is at your service. It is divided, for convenience, into two papers. They are offered, I trust, in time for your editorial arrangements for furthering the pious improvement of the holy week.

Yours truly,

For the Banner of the Cross.

PASSION CONTEMPLATIONS.

AN EXPOSITION OF ISAIAH LIII.

No. I.

Approaching the solemn day on which we are to commemorate the Sacrifice of our Lord, we open with peculiar interest the prophetic writings which are "the testimony of Jesus." There are predictions of both His humiliation and glory, of His life and death. They may be collected from every prophet, and from every promise;—the promises that the Seed of the woman should bruise the serpent's head, and that in the Seed of Abraham all nations should be blessed,—the prophecies, that the Redeemer would stand at the latter day upon the earth, that His hands and feet would be pierced, that Messiah would be cut off, but not for Himself, that the sword of the Lord would awake against the Man who was His own fellow,—these promises and prophecies extend from the beginning to the end of the inspired record. These, and many like them, persuade attention to the one great subject of the Bible, the shedding of the blood of Jesus, to take away sin.

Isaiah is the most conspicuous in the "goodly fellowship of the prophets;" he speaks more of the Saviour than either of the rest; he speaks of Him more plainly. It is Isaiah who foretells that He would be the offspring of a Virgin. It is Isaiah who expressly names Him the "Mighty God." It is he who describes the Saviour as a precious and tried corner-stone, laid in Zion, the Church, and a sure foundation. He it is who bids all the ends of the earth look to Christ,—and declares that the Gentiles shall come to His light, and that every one that thirsteth may drink of the waters of salvation. So accurate are the prophetic announcements of Isaiah, that he has not inaptly been termed a fifth evangelist. The Eternal Spirit, to whom a thousand years are but as a day, speaks by His early servant the prophet, almost as clearly as by His later servants, the historians of Christ. Hence the chapter before us, especially, is not only a prediction, but history likewise, history anticipated, because fore-seen, and because of its continuous and wonderfully minute accuracy. From it, Philip "preached Jesus" to the Ethiopian. It points to His whole course, from His birth to His crucifixion; and, including all in the Atonement, describes the Victim as suffering for us both in life and in death, suffering at the hand of God. This doctrine had grown dim to the Jews, some of whom had turned to idolatry, and some regarded their sacrifices as but forms,—almost all forgetting that they were types of the real Sacrifice yet to be made. Such being the persons addressed, the prophet loudly alarms them, "who hath believed our report," or "doctrine?" who is faithful to the "doctrine" of deliverance from sin and its penalty, the "doctrine" of reconciliation with God, declared to our fathers and proclaimed to us?—"and to whom is the arm of the Lord revealed?" who discerns that the course of the Messiah, the promised Redeemer, will be ruled by no ordinary providence,—that all has been ordered by God, and will be effected by "the arm of the Lord?" Such is the prophet's invitation to the study of the wonderful particulars he is about to unfold; which comprise a history of the Messiah, or sketch of His earthly course, drawn in the 2d and 3d verses,—the doctrine connected with these His fortunes and actions, unfolded in the 4th, 5th, and 6th verses,—and various circumstances, relating to the same Personage, given in the remainder of the chapter. The two former heads of history and doctrine, will occupy us at present,—the third, of circumstantial notices, will be considered in the next paper.

I. The history of the Messiah. The prophet begins with His earliest humiliation, His being made flesh, and proceeds, in order, to His death. Hence we find, that Immanuel, so exalted that to have assumed the nature of angels would have been humility, is introduced in the prophetic description, as of the humbler constitution of men,—“He shall grow up as a tender plant.” There is no childhood in the angelic state; but in the nature the Messiah was to have, infancy, weak and helpless infancy, must be undergone. Jesus, becoming human, was exposed to the accidents and diseases of that early period, and it was only through Providence that He was guarded from them. As taking our nature was his first humiliation,—so resigning Divine prerogative and becoming a dependant of Providence, must be accounted the second.

The “Word thus made flesh” might have been a child nursed with peculiar attention and care, growing up vigorous and in prosperity, soaring above His fellows in every desirable accomplishment, superior in all that gains a youth esteem and applause. But this would not consist with the humiliation that gave the whole life for the Sacrifice. Sorrow, danger, and adversity, were essential parts of His undertaking,—the humblest earthly portion. And thus He is described, “He shall grow up,” not only as a tender plant, but “as a root of a dry ground; He hath no form nor comeliness; and when we shall see Him there is no beauty that we shall desire Him.” Accepting human nature, He did not forget that it was not for enjoyment, but to be “made perfect through sufferings.” “As a root out of a dry ground,” He struggled with poverty; at birth, was laid in a manger, destitute of many of the appropriate and rightful comforts of that early period; afterwards, maintained Himself by labour. “Without form or comeliness,” wanting the advantages of personal address and appearance which greatly facilitate a course through the world, which excite favourable prepossessions, and make smooth the road to advancement. “There is no beauty that we shall desire Him;” no pageantry, though a prince of the line of David,—no retinue of angels, though the King of glory,—nothing in outward appearance to make Him desirable, though in truth the “Desire of all nations.” For the Sacrifice, it was necessary, that He should, from even the beginning of His human career, forbear all outward superiority.

But excellence of heart, and integrity of life, and devotion to the good of others, often compensate for external deficiencies, and gain friends from the community and admirers from the world. As therefore our Saviour was conspicuously benevolent,—as, in the midst of His own sorrows, He was never weary of promoting the happiness of others,—He should have received public honour, or at least public gratitude. But had these awaited,—had affliction ceased,—the work of Atonement would not have been perfected. Hence the prophet continues: “He is despised and rejected of men.” “He is despised,”—when they say, “is not this the son of the carpenter,”—“can any thing good come out of Nazareth,”—“He is the friend of publicans and sinners,”—“He casteth out devils by Beelzebub, prince of the devils,”—“say we not well that thou art a Samaritan, and hast a devil.” Such was the repeated language, by which nearly the whole people testified that they “despised” Him: all were guilty, the rulers and the multitude. “He is rejected,”—when, after declaring, “the Spirit of the Lord is upon me, because He hath anointed me to preach the gospel to the poor,” His countrymen “rose up and cast him out of the city, and sought to throw Him headlong;”—when, being adjured and declaring Himself to be the Christ, the high-priest rent his clothes and called it blasphemy;—when, after Pilate asked, “shall I crucify your king,” the people cried out, “we have no king but Cæsar.” His own nation made Him an outcast, and the Gentile authority would not protect the friendless being in whom they “found no fault:” He was most truly “rejected of men.”

The prophet continues the description: “A man of sorrows and acquainted with grief: and we hid as it were our faces from Him; He was despised and we esteemed Him not.” The expression, a “man of sorrows,” denotes His dark portion among men; our Saviour was not a man of wealth, a man of pleasure, a man of honours,—none of them; sorrow was His distinction. He was “acquainted with grief,”—not like the children of prosperity, by seeing it in others more than in themselves,—grief was His own companion:—not like the most of mankind, by only moderate occasional pressures of the divine hand,—but by its continual weight;—not by a partial and imperfect knowledge of affliction, but by a thorough acquaintance with its almost every form. These words continue the history of the Redeemer’s soul to near the end of His course. Then came the “hiding of faces from Him,”—not so much the hiding of our faces, as more eminently the turning away of the FATHER’S countenance from Him because it was turned away from us,—which interpretation the marginal letter affords. The consoling presence of God was withdrawn in His agony and in His death. A verse in the previous chapter, supposed by commentators to have been in copying accidentally taken from this, and misplaced, will properly come in here,—“His visage was so marred more than any man, and His form more than the sons of men.” What could mar, not the face only, but the whole form, so much as the sweat of blood, and the extreme pains that accompanied and produced it? And from whom else of the “sons of men” has the preserving power of God been so withdrawn as to occasion such a sweat and such an agony? This anguish in the garden was most truly a “hiding of God’s countenance.” This was the “awakening (more fully announced by a later prophet) of the sword of the Lord against the Man who was His own Fellow.” He suffered the like upon the cross, and without the help of the “angel,” when exclaiming, “My God, why hast Thou forsaken me!” In these unknown agonies, we trace the “offering of His soul for sin.” “He is thus despised,”—an outcast apparently of Heaven,—and men “esteemed Him not.”

Behold then this account of events and scenes portrayed in vision, by the Spirit, to the prophet! What is it but the evangelical narrative anticipated! Behold the Saviour, “from youth up, suffering the terrors of God with a troubled mind!” Not one occurrence of joy is predicted; and, when the actual history of this Personage is given, of not one occurrence of joy (usually so termed) do we read. The language of both prophets and gospel-historians, is, “come and see if there be any sorrow like unto my sorrow, wherewith the Lord hath afflicted me in the day of His fierce anger.” From both we learn that “the plowers plowed upon His back, and made long their furrows.” Both exhibit Him with visage deformed by the extremity of agony,—with face and person soiled with the blood that started forth when under pains greater than those known to the “sons of men.” And both declare, that, thus imbued in His own blood, He was an emblem of the benefits of that blood upon men; “so shall He sprinkle many nations,” is the voice of the prophet,—“they have washed and made white their robes in the blood of the Lamb,” is the record of an apostle. What the disciples saw with their own eyes, or heard from the very discourse of Jesus, the older inspired men saw and heard, by the operation of the Spirit. It was the same Person, with the same incidents, and the same course of sorrow, that was made known to them both, by different methods.

Bearing this in mind, we wonder not that the description of the prophet has a very perfect arrangement. He does not pass from one to another and distant stage of the Redeemer’s course, noticing the several events irregularly, and mingling them together without order,—but begins with the very infancy of Christ, and sketches the outlines of His history throughout, to that “hiding of faces” which ended not till, on the cross, He was forsaken of the Father. It is this peculiar accuracy that confirms to Isaiah the appellation of an evangelist. From the moment that the “Word was made flesh and dwelt among us,” to that awful hour in which He cried, “it is finished,” the prophetic history, though more brief, is as regular and accurate as any of the gospel narratives.

II. The doctrine connected with these humble fortunes of the Messiah is that of the Atonement. Shedding of blood for sin was a rite familiar to the world, and especially to those to whom this inspired book was addressed; all mankind had known it well for three thousand years; and the prophet here declares that the sorrows and death of the Mediator were to have a similar effect: He was to bear Divine indignation which was due to our wickedness. Included therefore in the doctrine of the Atonement is that of the fallen and degenerate nature of human beings: Our unworthiness has separated between us and our God, and we are under the awful penalty of His displeasure. But the appointed One intercedes, offers a propitiation to God, and procures our pardon and ransom by the expiating virtue of His own blood.—Such is the doctrine we are to find in the passage now coming before us.

“Surely He hath borne our griefs, and carried our sorrows.” Immanuel shared the common sufferings of mortality: this would at first seem the amount of the prophet’s language; but the meaning is deeper. He sustained woes which are justly ours as fallen, but did not rightly belong to Him. What is the occasion of our grief and sorrow, but loss of innocence? for no troubles were to harass man in his pure primeval condition. And it is intimated that Christ was in that perfectly holy state, when it is said that He bore our calamities,—calamities not due to Himself by any fault. He came within the sphere of mortal sin, but was never contaminated: He plunged into the waves of mortal affliction, and was overwhelmed. He had no burden of guilt to bear him under,—“He bore our griefs, and carried our sorrows.”—Behold then, Christian, your Saviour as a Lamb without spot or blemish! He must be such, or He is unfit for the altar of God. The prophet, in asserting that the troubles He bore were not justly His own, declares, in language almost as clear as that of the apostle, that the Messiah “did no sin, neither was guile found in His mouth.” It is essential to the doctrine of the Atonement, that the Victim have no sin of His own to answer for, as that would be unfitness to expiate the iniquity of others.

This however would not be the view taken by the people in general in our Saviour’s time;—“we did esteem Him stricken, smitten of God, and afflicted.” They referred His calamitous portion to the hand of the Almighty, and accounted the unhappy man as great a wretch as He was a sufferer,—an abject, abandoned by Heaven, and devoted to chastisement. In one sense, the thought was not incorrect,—He was indeed “stricken, smitten, and afflicted of God,”—and it is one of the highest acts of faith, to see the “arm of the Lord revealed” in every event of the Redeemer’s course. But the Jews failed of this high spiritual apprehension of the case of Jesus: while they imagined He was suffering for the punishment of His own ill-desert, they could never view Him as undergoing atoning pains for themselves and for the world. Nay more; they not only supposed His daily sorrows to be merited, but claimed a Divine sanction for their own acts of violence which terminated His life. “It is expedient,” said the high-priest, under a prophetic impulse, “that one man should die for the people.” The prophetic voice was true,—there was a supreme expediency in His death. But the high-priest and people mistook the nature of the expediency, and pleaded the inspired sanction, not for the Atonement, but for a murder. And it may have been this deluded notion of His being “smitten of God,” that emboldened them to exclaim, “His blood be on us, and on our children.”

Placing thus conspicuously before Israel their erroneous view of the “arm of the Lord” in the affliction of Christ, the prophet immediately introduces in contrast with it the correct doctrine,—“but He was wounded for our transgressions, He was bruised for our iniquities; the chastisement of our peace was upon Him, and with His stripes we are healed.” He was “smitten of God;” but it was “for our transgressions,” not for His own. It was “the Lord who bruised Him;” but “for our iniquities” only. He bore the whelming load to lighten ours; His anguish was our consolation. The prophet, like the apostles, declares that the “just suffered for the unjust,”—that “we have redemption through His blood.” The Old and New Testaments, both, regard the Messiah as the Substitute for fallen man, His punishment bringing our pardon. Nay, we have more than pardon; through His “chastisement” we obtain “peace,” through His “stripes” our wounded spirits are “healed.” How could the doctrine of the Atonement be more fully declared?

The prophet, with the Sacrifice of the Lamb of God in view, answers yet more explicitly the natural inquiry,—proper if it spring from holy care, but otherwise gratuitous,—how has such a work become necessary? Hear the reply in his own words: “All we, like sheep, have gone astray; we have turned every one to his own way; and the Lord hath laid on Him the iniquity of us all.” Our wandering, “like lost sheep,” from the paths of innocence, our continual depravity, is the fundamental truth. It was our guilt that was laid on Jesus, when He was lifted up as the monument that God was “just although He justified the believing sinner.” How supremely welcome such doctrine to the faithful of that age! Do we not share the joy of those who learnt from the prophecy that there was a sure pardon for them in the counsel of God? The anticipating evangelist “holds not his peace” till he assures them that “on the Messiah were laid the iniquity of ALL.” To Him therefore, whether displayed by prophets or by apostles, may “all” look and be healed.

Here we leave our work for the present,—to be completed in the next Banner. Forget not, worthy reader, the wonderful agreement between the prophecy and the fulfilment. Of what man, in that early day, could such language be used? Of what man, at any period,—except only the “Man Christ Jesus?” The prediction is a concise but regular history of His humiliation on earth, from the manger to the Cross.

CALIFORNIA—THE CHURCH’S DUTY.

It cannot but be highly gratifying to every one, who desires the extension of Christ’s kingdom under that organization which he himself gave it, to see the Church awaking to a becoming interest in California.

We owe it not only to them, but to the great Head of the Church as well, to take care that those of our countrymen, who for purposes of worldly interest, leave these established seats of religion, want not in the new regions to which they go, the warnings and invitations of the gospel. We must go with them, and there, as here, in season and out of season, remind them of that great salvation to which they are called.

Our mother Church of England has set us a glorious example, in the affectionate solicitude with which she pursues her emigrating children and still embraces them in their distant seats. We shall be unworthy our lineage if we do not the like for those who go out from among us.

It is not to be doubted that we have hitherto lost much by being among the last to send the gospel into our new territories. Those who go thither first on that holy errand gain great advantage over all who come after. Their forward zeal commends them to the esteem of even the most godless of those whom they show a desire to save. While by companionship in the hardships of border life, and by various offices of kindness of which the destitute circumstances of a new country afford unusual opportunities, or give to them when performed an uncommon value, they often fix themselves permanently in the affections of the kindhearted pioneers. This attachment and all the advantages that grow out of it, the church by timely action may acquire for her own ministers, instead of, as has too often happened, by a tardy movement letting them fall to others.

But there is a circumstance connected with California to which I wish particularly to call the attention of our brethren, as the consideration of it cannot fail to impress them with the peculiar importance of missionary operations in that country—I mean its situation as lying opposite to the eastern coast of Asia, and within a comparatively short distance of that part of the world hitherto more remote from all Christian nations.

This circumstance will make California, especially after some mode of steam communication across this continent is established, the great depot of commerce between this country and Europe on the one hand, and all eastern and southeastern Asia on the other. But commerce is the great civilizer in this age, as war was in previous ones. Trade cannot be carried on without intercourse, and intercourse breaks down prejudice and all peculiarity of habit and opinion, and in the contest of habits and opinions the more rational and intelligent will prevail over those that are less so. Thus the intercourse which commerce will occasion between our countrymen and the Asiatics will result in the eventual adoption by the latter of our civilization—and that civilization so thoroughly pervaded, as it is, by our religion. They will learn our science, acquire our arts, imitate our customs, read our literature, and then inevitably their superstition and idolatry will yield to our reasonable and holy faith. They will become Christians, not so much by the direct preaching of the gospel among them, though far greater facilities for that, than now exist will be afforded, as by being brought to the light of Christianity, as it exists among us.

In respect to its position, California bears a singular resemblance to the land of Canaan, in which God placed Abraham and his posterity, that they might be a blessing to all families of the earth.

On the one side was Egypt, the native land of civilization, on the other Syria and Babylonia, the earliest seats of commerce and empire, and opposite was Europe, the quarter of the world where civilization was to have its greatest development.

Thus placed these servants of the Most High God, were in a situation, to affect with their particular knowledge, at the proper time, the springing civilization of the world. They were missionaries, and on missionary ground, though their action was for ages repressed by God himself, lest that which they had to communicate to the world should be wasted without effect by being communicated immaturely.

When at length the chosen time arrived, God by the revelation of his Son, perfected that knowledge which his people had hitherto had only in part, and the apostles were sent forth to preach the gospel in all nations.

Thus the knowledge of God was let fall like leaven upon the civilization of the world at the very moment when it had acquired its greatest power of progress, and circumstances favored its rapid and wide diffusion, and changed by that which it had received, it was presented to the barbarous nations as Christianity.

That heaven working ever has more and more penetrated the mass until they are one and the same—Civilization is Christianity, and Christianity is civilization. Therefore in bringing our civilization into contact with the nations of Eastern Asia, we bring to them Christianity—not its pure form indeed, but perhaps, not on that account, the less effectual. As the Physician, to give greater efficacy to his medicine, sometimes finds it expedient to exhibit it in combination with other substances, which promote its being taken up into the system, so a spiritual doctrine may be aided in affecting an ignorant and superstitious people by being combined with the arts of life and general knowledge. It is the duty of the Church however to take care that, in this civilization there be as little as possible that is detrimental to Christianity, by doing what she can to render those who are to have intercourse with the heathen, a religious people. She should therefore use her utmost liberality to supply them with ministers, and all the accessories of ministerial labor, such as churches, bibles, prayer-books and tracts, having the confidence that for every one who by these means is turned into the way of righteousness, or preserved from apostasy, we not only save a soul alive, but also prepare a missionary to the heathen.

I am persuaded that no amount of effort, however vast and engrossing, would be disproportioned to the immense consequences of rendering California at once a gospel land. I believe that nothing in the end would be lost if the Church were to call in every one of her foreign missionaries, and concentrate all her energies on this new territory.

The providence of God has clearly indicated that by its settlement Eastern Asia shall be brought to the knowledge of Christ. Does it not strikingly appear so, when we consider that—at which all men are wondering—for centuries, that country belonged to and was partially occupied by the Spaniards and their offspring, during all which time those wonderful treasures, which are the great inducements to emigration thither, were hidden as if they had no existence though so near the surface, but as soon as the country fell into our hands, they were revealed by an accident? The former possessors of the country were themselves so ignorant and so inactive that the gospel could receive no furtherance by them: or if they had attempted to impart it, it would have been as the corrupt doctrine of popery. But we are a people of boundless enterprise, and unceasing activity, and inferior to none in enlightenment, and professing the pure word of God for our religion. Christianity, as it exists among the Mexicans, is utterly unfit for the purpose of God to make known his grace to heathen Asia; wherefore California in their hands could in no degree subserve the accomplishment of that purpose; but among us Christianity is zealous, purifying, proselyting, and if not without error, still acknowledging the supremacy of God to direct the conscience, and therefore eminently capable to extend itself in new regions.

The consideration of these things confirms me greatly in the impression, that the settlement by our people of this newly acquired territory, is designed by God for the conversion of the opposite countries of Asia. I regard those persons who are emigrating to it, however selfish and unholily their aims may be, as being moved by a Divine impulse no less than was Abraham when he left his kindred at God's command. Even to Abraham a personal inducement was offered, "I will make of thee a great nation," but God's design was that in him all nations should be blessed. So is God used to avail himself of the selfish aims of men to accomplish his designs. They follow their narrow instincts, building up and casting down with no knowledge beyond their own immediate purposes—and lo! in time appear the glorious and beneficent ends of God's providence!

Let us then to whom He has given the understanding, through faith of all that is being done, heartily co-operate with him in this great purpose, and bring it to a speedily accomplishment, by planting the gospel in California. What an honor He has conferred upon our people in selecting us to be the instruments of imparting the gospel to those nations who are now uniting to complete its circuit around the earth! Let us enter earnestly, actively into that strife in which all the christian denominations in this country will engage, to be most efficient in doing that which is appointed us.

MR. EDITOR:—

There is a want of information exhibited in many of our congregations, as to the part they should bear in the baptismal service, the effect of which does not produce that uniformity of action which is so desirable in an Episcopal congregation. I will therefore, with your permission, ask a few questions through your columns, hoping to receive information from you or some of your learned correspondents, which may enlighten the writer and many others who wish to obey the rubrics understandingly.

Does the Minister direct his address to the whole congregation, or to the sponsors and witnesses assembled "at the font," in the first exhortation? In what position, (standing or sitting,) should this address be listened to by the congregation?

"After the Gospel is read, the Minister shall make this brief exhortation." Are the people to stand during this "exhortation"? What should be their position during the following prayer? Should the whole congregation audibly unite with the Minister in repeating this prayer?

"Then shall the Minister speak unto the Godfathers," &c. Should the congregation stand during this address? And should the congregation be seated while the Sacrament is administered? And if seated, should they remain seated until after the declaration that immediately follows?

"Then all standing up, the Minister shall say to the Godfathers," &c. Is it intended that the whole congregation should arise and stand during this address?

These questions may appear unimportant and even trivial to many, but correct answers to them will be important and highly beneficial to more.

With much respect, I remain yours, &c.,

THE AUTHORS OF THE HOMILIES.

The history of the composition of the two books of Homilies is very obscure. The different writers for the most part are unknown. The two books were published at different times—the first in 1547,—the second in 1563. Of the first book it is generally believed that Archbishop Cranmer wrote the Homilies on "Salvation," "Faith," and "Good Works," and probably most of the others, assisted by Bishop Ridley. The Homily on "Brawling and Contention" is evidently, from its style and peculiar phraseology, the work of Latimer; and the one on "Adultery" is given to Thomas Becon, one of Cranmer's chaplains, because it is found published in his works in 1564.

In regard to the writers of the second book, Archbishop Parker speaks of them as being "revised and finished with a second part by him and the other bishops." Burnet (in the preface to the XXXIX Articles) says that Bishop Jewel was particularly engaged in compiling the second, while Blunt, in his History of the Reformation, says "nothing is known but the merest conjecture" in relation to the particular writers.

I have lately accidentally found out one of the authors. Reading the other day the Homilies of St. Chrysostom on 1st Cor., I was struck with the familiarity of the thoughts presented, and was sure I had seen them elsewhere. Upon further reflection it seemed to me that I had met with them in our own Homilies. Upon examination it proved to be so. The last seven pages of the Homilies on Matrimony are only a close translation from St. Chrysostom's 16th Hom. on the 11th ch. of 1st Cor. I thought the fact worthy of being noticed, as I had never before seen it mentioned. I suppose the first part of this Homily is probably taken from some other part of St. Chrysostom, though I have not met with it,

Let all things be done decently and in order. 1 Cor. xiv. 40.

Will you be diligent to frame and fashion your own selves, and your families, according to the doctrine of Christ; and to make both yourselves and them, as much as in you lieth, whole-some examples and patterns to the flock of Christ?

ORDINATION OFFICE.

Is it decent?

Is it in order?

Is it a wholesome example to the congregation, for a minister (not sick or infirm,) habitually to sit during the singing of the Psalms in metre and hymns, whenever they are used in the service? and

If a clergyman sits during the singing of the psalms and hymns, is it proper for the congregation to follow his example?

I ask these questions in the hope that the answer of them in the Banner of the Cross, by its editor or some of his learned correspondents, may produce uniformity and a correct practice in a congregation where the clergyman habitually sits, not only during the singing of the Psalm, but during the singing of the hymn in the communion service:—and about one half of the congregation follow his example.

Obituary.

For the Banner of the Cross.

On the 19th inst., at the Christ Church Hospital, Cherry st., Mrs. PHEBE LOUGEAY, in the 83rd year of her age.

"Blessed are the dead which die in the Lord from henceforth; yea, saith the Spirit, that they may rest from their labors; and their works do follow them."

The aged saint whose death we record, and to whose memory affection offers this imperfect tribute, was for many years a member of St. Paul's Church in this city. Quiet and unobtrusive in her demeanor, she was known to comparatively few, her humility kept her from being foremost in good works, even when her heart devised liberal things, ever obeying the injunction, "Do not your alms before men to be seen of them."

Happy and contented, even when her circumstances were the most untoward, when blindness for so many years shut out from her view the face of nature and the countenances of dear friends, she bore it with the patience which ever characterized her, thankful that the light of the Spirit illumined her mind.

Peace, humility, content, love to God and man, were imprinted so visibly on her countenance, that not even a slight observer could fail to notice it. Her affectionate heart went out in love to those who were so happy as to be her friends, in whose hearts she will ever remain embalmed, and who weep the tears that affection and nature dictate, though they mourn not without hope.

S. C. J.

Departed this life in Philadelphia, on Wednesday, the 21st of March, Miss MARGARET PEPPER.

In the character of this estimable lady, were united all the virtues that adorn humanity; actively benevolent and of an exceedingly tender heart and amiable disposition, it appeared to be the chief business and delight of her life to promote the happiness of all within the circle of her acquaintance. The poor always found in her a certain help in every time of need and distress. Though her life had been passed in unusual conformity to the precepts and spirit of the Gospel, yet she was too thoroughly grounded in vital Christianity to place her hopes on any works of righteousness which she had done. During the whole of her long and painful illness she never murmured, but sweetly submitted to the will of her Heavenly Father, and yielded up her spirit to Him who gave it, with entire composure and resignation and with the cheering hope of a blessed immortality. Thus lived and thus died this excellent lady, respected, beloved, and lamented by all who knew her.

Miscellaneous.

From Dr. Stevens' Address.

DISINTERESTEDNESS OF THE MEDICAL PROFESSION.

"Was the introduction of inoculation for the small-pox a speculation? Was the discovery of the preventive power of vaccination (the labor of close, unremitting, and careful research during a period of several years), was that made, or conducted with a view to personal emolument? As a matter of course Dr. Jenner, as soon as he had completed his discovery, published it—made it free to all mankind.

"When quinine was first discovered, the mode of preparing it was immediately made known. Recently when some feeble attempts were stated to have been made to obtain a patent for the use of either, or to conceal the process of etherization, the indignation of the profession was aroused from one end of our country to the other. The money changers were driven from the temple of Humanity.

"Medicine a money making profession! Why one third or more of the whole practice of medical men in the city of New York, is done without remuneration. The hospitals, the almshouses, the dispensaries, the medical and surgical clinics, the eye infirmary, the orphan and lying-in asylums, the colored home, the institutions for the blind; in fine, all institutions of a charitable kind, so far as I know, are attended gratuitously; and many of them by some of the oldest and most eminent medical men. Nor are the out-door poor neglected. When they appeal to physicians, not for advice only, but even for services which keep us from our beds, they rarely ask in vain.

"I have witnessed examples of self-denial, of steady holding fast on integrity, by scores of medical men; who, amid the pinchings of poverty, have refused to embark in schemes which would have given them wealth, had they chosen to seek it in the walks of quackery. When will the world do justice to such self-denying philanthropy?

"A money making profession! Why the number of destitute widows and orphans of medical men became so great that a few years since, an association was formed, and is now in progress and successful operation, with a fund raised by their own contributions in New York, to secure from destitution after their death, their wives and children. It would have broken our hearts to have encountered them, in our daily visits to the almshouse or asylums."

PROGRESS OF UTILITARIANISM.—The Advantages of having a House of Worship.—The journals of the day inform us that "the railroad celebration at Brattleboro' went off with much spirit." 700 persons from Boston were present—2000 persons sat down to a collation; and there was a ball in the evening. "The most hospitable arrangements had been made by the people of Brattleboro' for lodging their numerous guests. About 500 were received into the houses of the inhabitants, and the remainder were furnished with Buffalo skins, wrapped in which they reposed in the pews of the church, which was properly warmed and lighted for the purpose."

This is not quite so bad as the turning of venerable Abbeys and Cathedrals into mews and hostleries and riding schools, by Cromwell's officers, but it is a long stride towards it. We observe that the building in which this abomination was committed, (for it does not appear to have been a case of necessity but a deliberate arrangement,) is called a church; yet we hope, nay, we are confident, it is not an Episcopal church. Brattleboro' is in the diocese of a Prelate who is not behind any one in outward reverence for sacred things, and than whom there is not a greater observer of forms and ceremonies. If, therefore, there is an Episcopal church edifice in Brattleboro', we are sure the people have too well learned of him to defile the house of God by huddling 1500 persons in it. We had a few years ago to deplore the desecration of a sacred temple in a neighboring diocese, and that too immediately after—on the very day of—its solemn consecration. But the feeling of utter disgust that the occurrence caused in all right minded churchmen—and the prompt expressions of such feelings, have had the effect, as we believe, to prevent a repetition of the offence.—Churchman.

From the London Times, 17th.

"The President of the Republic is gaining ground every day in the popular favour. This is evident from the hundreds of stories told of him, and which, if true, prove the existence of either much benevolence of heart, or considerable tact. The following, amongst others, is said to be authentic. On the occasion of the distribution of crosses of the Legion of Honour a few days since to the troops assembled in the Champ de Mars, it was observed that a sergeant whose name was on the list of candidates for the honour failed to answer when his name was called. The President having demanded the cause was informed that the sergeant had obtained leave of absence to visit his mother, who, it was feared, was dying. On hearing the words, 'dying mother,' Napoleon, who idolizes the memory of his maternal parent, turned to an aide-de-camp and ordered him forthwith to send an express after the sergeant, at the private expense of the President, in order that his mother should see the croix d'honneur on her son's breast before she expired. 'Perhaps,' added he, 'the sight of the cross may restore her to health.' A courier was forthwith despatched at the command of the President. It is said that the joy occasioned by the good news actually effected a revolution in the poor woman's health, and that she is now in a fair way of recovery. The sergeant on his return related to his companions the noble conduct of the Emperor's nephew, and of which he cannot speak without shedding tears."

The strictest observation of the law, from slavish fear, or other spurious motives, never worked any man one jot nearer to heaven. Without a true hearty principle of love and obedience to God, we are as much out of his way of happiness as utterly unqualified for it, and as destitute of real goodness, as if we lived in the known continual breach of all the commandments.

the instance before us, the understandings of the people were as besotted as their hearts were callous; for the very deed they were now doing had been foretold, not obscurely but literally, by the Royal Prophet:—"All they that see me laugh me to scorn: they shoot out the lip and shake the head, saying, He trusted on the Lord that he would deliver him, let him deliver him if he delight in him." Nay, the same Psalmist, in the same psalm, minutely predicted the conduct of the Gentile soldiers; declaring, not only that they would part among them the garments of the Messiah, but also that they would cast lots for his vesture.* And lo! these things the soldiers did. When they had crucified Jesus, they took his garments and made four parts, to every soldier a part; and also his coat: now the coat was without seam, and woven from the top throughout. They said therefore, among themselves, Let us not rend it, but cast lots for it, whose it shall be.†

Let us, my brethren, pause a moment, while, turning from this awful and appalling scene, we reflect on the object of the Son of God in thus permitting himself to become a man of sorrows, without form or comeliness, despised and rejected of men. Remember that for us he laid down his life;†† for our sins he died.‡ He came to put away sin by the sacrifice of himself;§ "to wash us from our sins by his own blood;"¶ "to be a propitiation for the sins of the whole world;" "to give his life a ransom for many;"††† "to redeem us with his precious blood;"††† not to multiply quotations, and multiplied they might be from every Epistle and Gospel, he has done what the evangelical prophet foretold he would do, "He hath borne our griefs and infirmities, and carried our sorrows; he was wounded for our transgressions; he was bruised for our iniquities; the chastisement by which our peace is effected, was laid upon him; and with his stripes we are healed. All we, like sheep, have gone astray, we have turned every one to his own way; and the Lord hath laid upon him the iniquity of us all."§§ Thus, though, it surpasses man's understanding to conceive how that justice can be infinite which is tempered by mercy, or that mercy infinite which is controlled by justice, yet what is impossible with man is shewn to be possible with God; justice and mercy have kissed each other, and he can be just, and yet the justifier of us sinners. The countless intelligences who people infinite space, and have for ages desired to look into this mystery, may learn from this, that in the nature of things it is impossible for sin to pass unpunished; while they magnify the transcendent mercy of the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost, which deigned, which achieved, and which is even now administering the means by which a fallen and apostate race might escape from the wrath to come. The work is the work of the undivided Trinity: for, while the Father appointed and accepted the sacrifice; the Son, having full power over the body which he assumed, became the High Priest to offer it; and the Holy Ghost, by dwelling without measure in the human nature which suffered and was sacrificed, rendered it free from spot or blemish, "a savour of life unto life."

But all this might have been accomplished without having been revealed to man. For what purpose, then, has it been not only accomplished, but also revealed? For what but for this: to show to men, as well as to angels, principalities, and powers, "the exceeding sinfulness of sin,"|| which required so awfully a preface to others, which, to further the "obedience of faith," I feel constrained to address to my whole diocese, I hereby commend them to your earnest and prayerful consideration, and through you to your respective congregations.

"Convinced," I say, "of the peculiar necessity of these truths to the present time," let me not in the outset be misunderstood. It is not that I have discovered any special resistance, in our day, to the due exercise of the priestly functions. But it is that I feel these functions have not been duly exercised by ourselves, who are entrusted with "the ministry of reconciliation." That one and all of us, either from the continual pressure from without, or from opposing principles and influences within, have sadly failed in the fulfilment of our sacred office and trust. It is true, we may not have been guilty of keeping men back from Baptism, Confirmation, and the holy Eucharist. And this would be much if understood as meant by Christ, and received by the early saints. But what is it now? what is it as too generally expressed in our own work and in the lives of our people? Let us take our liturgical offices for Baptism, Confirmation, and the Holy Communion, to our closets, and on our knees examine each part of them—mark the spiritual system they unfold—the deep self-consecration to God which they require—the high spiritual gifts they witness to—the heart-searching vows they record—the spirit of Christ, the education of conscience, the thorough self-examination, the earnest self-discipline, the heavenly pursuits, the exalted attainments they imply; how, by the power of a new nature, of a life-giving union with the incarnate God, of "a life hid with Christ in God," they seem to raise the Christian above, and as by a great gulf, separate him from the unbaptized or the professed votaries of sense; and then with the actual state of our people before us, ask ourselves whether this awful failure to realize in their spirit and lives that which is so solemnly taught in the divine sacraments to which they have come may not, in a humiliating degree, be owing to our own want of earnestness and fidelity in the discharge of our priestly functions? And whether this does not more than justify your Bishop in here setting before your minds the nature and reality of these functions, with some of the weighty duties which necessarily result.

You have received "the Holy Ghost for the office and work of priests in the Church of God."

All authority in the Church is from God, to be exercised for God. To check in us the sin of presumption and cultivate within us the grace of fidelity, this great truth must be kept before our minds. Men, set apart for holy things in the Church, are sometimes led to think themselves in some sort proprietors of the Church; as having a right to impress upon it their own wisdom and skill; or to modify and build it up in their own way. Whereas "all things are of God." The Church, is "the Church of the living God,"—founded by Him and to be ruled by Him. Even Jesus, the Divine Head of the Church, did nothing of Himself,—nothing as of His own undivided authority and power. "All power is given unto me," He says. "As the Father gave me commandment even so I do." Hence "the Son of Man has power on earth to forgive sins." If it be so with the master, how much more with the servant! If "God manifested in the flesh" was under necessity, as our great High Priest, of submitting in all things to the will of Him that sent him; what must be the depth of our self-subjugation as ministers commissioned by His authority, and acting in his stead, for his body the Church!

Our first and highest care, then, is to keep before our minds the divine power by which we act, and the divine will made known as the guide and end of our action: that "all things are of God;" that all, in the scheme of redemption, sprang from the depths of His infinite love, and was fashioned in every essential feature, by His sovereign will—through whatever channel, or by whatever agency, it has been enjoined upon men: nothing being left for them, no matter what may be their place in the Church, but faith, and submission, and obedience; that all truth in the religion of Christ is the mind of God, over which no other mind unauthorized and uncontrolled by God, can have the smallest power; that the Church, which embodies and sets forth that truth, is the institution of God, concerning which, and in which, no one can, without great hazard to himself, speak or act, except he be commissioned from above.

Another caution is to be observed. Whatever power may be committed to us, as Christ's ministers, can be effectual, in its exercise, only within the limits of His laws, and through the merits of His perfect sacrifice. "God hath reconciled us to Himself by Jesus Christ," though He "hath committed to us the ministry of this reconciliation." So that whatever terms of fellowship may have affixed to the covenant of redemption—whatever priestly acts he may have made necessary to our union with Him, or life in Him; or whatever good works we may be required or encouraged to do, "to turn away his displeasure and perfect holiness in His fear;" all must be submitted to and done by the aid of His Spirit; and draw their entire value and efficacy from the rich fountain of His blood. Let us be careful then to bear this in mind, in all our doings, however essential as "the obedience of faith," lest we be guilty of ascribing to them, the virtue which cometh only from the all-prevailing merits of our incarnate Lord.

Still God hath made men the instruments of salvation in His Church—hath empowered them to act, as His representatives, in reconciling sinners unto Himself, and fitting them for his eternal fellowship. For to them hath He committed "the ministry of reconciliation."

Let us see how this is. The history of it cannot fail to throw light upon its nature and reality. This history begins with Christ, "the Head over all things unto the Church, which is His body." Having received from God the Father, "all power in heaven and earth," He came to set up His kingdom and bring men back to His communion and love. The first step was to humble Himself, and take our nature in the womb of the blessed Virgin; thus presenting Himself to us as God and man, with his invisible divinity clothed in His visible humanity. Here, then, we have in the person of our great High Priest, the beginning of the Church in its perfection on earth, and a type or representation of what the Church was ever after to be—a union of the divine and human—God uniting Himself with man, that man might again be united with God—united not only by an interchange of will, but by a positive interchange of nature. The Head of the Church is God manifest in the flesh. The body, surely, cannot, in nature, be different from the Head. If the Head be both human and divine, so must be the body. If the Head be thus both visible and invisible, so must be the body. Hence, according to St. Paul, the end of our being called into the Church and placed under its ministry, is, "that we may come unto a perfect man, unto the measure of the stature of the fulness of Christ;" "may grow up into Him in all things, which is the Head, even Christ, from whom the whole body, fitly joined together and compacted by that which every joint supplieth, according to the effectual working in the measure of every part, maketh increase of the body unto the edifying of itself in love." Here is a union between Christ and His Church, like unto that which He Himself expressed when He said, "I am the vine, ye are the branches." But the vine cannot be essentially different from the branches.

We see then that the relation which Christ bears to His Church forbids the idea of any important difference, in nature, between them; and hence requires that where one is divine and human, the other in a certain sense, and to a certain degree, must be divine and human also; where one is both visible and invisible, the other must be the same; justifying the language of St. Peter, where he affirms that by "the exceeding great and precious promises of the Gospel," or by their fulfilment in ourselves, "we are made partakers of the divine nature."

The reconciliation, therefore, of man to God by Jesus Christ, the ministry of which is committed to us, is a much more exalted and vital union, than is sometimes supposed. A union implying not only that the sacrifice of the incarnate Son, avails to our justification; but also that the gracious communication of His nature, puts us into a justified state—makes us again one with Himself; not so much covers us with His righteousness, as fills us with His righteousness; not declares us just on the ground of his own justice merely, but makes us just by the infused power of that justice; not stands without us an ideal holiness, but is formed within us a real holiness. He became the Son of Man, that, by a mysterious union with Him, we might become the sons of God; condescended to be born of a Virgin, that we might have a new birth into Himself; to take our nature, that we might be made partakers of His.

Here then is the foundation of the ministry of reconciliation—a union to be established and perfected between Christ and redeemed sinners, calling for the intervention of the priestly office.

The Son of God became incarnate; offered Himself a sacrifice for sin; rose from the dead for our justification; made the Church his body; placed Himself at its head; breathed into it His spirit and life; commanded men to "be born again" into His fellowship; to be "made alive unto God in Him;" to become "members of His body, of His flesh and of His bones;" and was then "received up into glory." But who was left to carry out this glorious design of his incarnation—to fulfil the ministry of His reconciliation with man? It is true, the Holy Ghost was given to the world to "convince of sin, of righteousness, and of judgment;" was given to the Church to "sanctify and cleanse it, that it might be a glorious Church, not having spot or wrinkle, or any such thing;" but God hath ordained that the Holy Ghost shall act upon the world, and in His Church, through an outward, visible agency. Now what is that agency? Who was commissioned to act in Christ's stead after His ascension—to exercise His authority and dispense instrumentally the manifold gifts of His grace? Was each individual to act for himself—to be his own Prophet, Priest, and King? To teach himself—accept his own submission—remit his own sins—impose his own discipline—be his own judge? St. Paul answers this question in the following words: "And He (Christ) gave some apostles, some prophets, some evangelists, some pastors and teachers, for the perfecting of the saints, for the work of the ministry, for the edifying of the body of Christ, till we all come in the unity of the Faith and of the knowledge of the Son of God, unto a perfect man, unto the measure of the stature of the fulness of Christ."

And we see how Christ did this. As He was about to be taken up into Heaven, He called the eleven disciples to Him and said: "All power is given unto me in Heaven and earth, go ye therefore, disciple all nations, baptizing them in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost, teaching them to observe all things whatsoever I have commanded you, and lo, I am with you always, even unto the end of the world." "As my Father sent me, even so send I you." "And he breathed on them and said: Receive ye the Holy Ghost; whose-soever sins ye remit, they are remitted unto them; and whose-soever sins ye retain, they are retained."

Who can listen to these words and not feel that Christ, before His ascension, ordained a living, visible ministry in His Church, and committed to that ministry an awful power to be exercised for the comfort, and edification, and salvation of its members! Let us examine into the nature and fullness of this power thus originally conveyed. "All power is given unto me—go ye therefore." "As my Father sent me, even so send I you." This language teaches, as plainly as it is possible for language to teach, that with whatever ministerial power Christ came invested from the Father, with that same power did His first ministers go forth invested from Himself. The words of a commission, from its very nature, must be taken literally, according to their natural order and force. And the words we are considering, let us bear in mind, are those of Christ's commission to His disciples. Now what do these words import? or what are the special powers they define, or may, from the subsequent claims and acts of the Apostles, be safely supposed to embrace?

The first of these is the power to remit sins. A power inseparable from the idea of that ministry, whose object it is to reconcile sinners to God through Christ. Sin makes them His enemies and interposes the chief bar to their restoration to His fellowship. This, then, first of all, must be remitted. Its curse taken away; its dominion overthrown. We ought not to be surprised, therefore, that the first and largest power, yea, in one sense the sum of all others, committed to the ministry of reconciliation, is the power to remit sins through Christ. Not only to preach the Gospel which provides for their remission; not only to declare that remission upon contrition and confession, but also to do priestly acts by which, through the virtue of Christ's sacrifice, the pardon of sin, and the grace to resist it, are conveyed to the soul. At the head of these stands baptism. This sacrament, where due qualifications exist, takes away sin. "Repent and be baptised in the name of Jesus Christ for the remission of sins." "Arise and be baptised, and wash away thy sins."

But sins may be committed after baptism—committed against the vows of the holy covenant made to God, as represented by His ministers. Hence they were entrusted with power to remit, upon true repentance, such sins, and restore the offenders to the forfeited blessings of their baptismal state.

This power of absolution is not only necessary to the solemn relation which the priesthood bears to the baptised, but has always been held by the one Catholic Church as having been explicitly entrusted to the Apostles by the words of their commission—"Whosoever sins ye remit, they are remitted unto them," &c.

This remission of sins, too, was more or less connected with the sacrifice offered in the Holy Eucharist. The Apostolic Church was led to this conviction by the words of her Divine Head at the institution of this blessed sacrament; and hence always encouraged those who came to it with a penitent heart and lively faith, to expect forgiveness of all their sins. Besides, the sacrificial character of the sacrament itself, furnished to all true penitents a pledge of such forgiveness.

In addition, however, to the remission of sins, dependent upon these priestly acts, there were also, as dependent the same acts, a new-birth into Christ's Kingdom—a vital union with Himself—a participation of His spirit and life. Who can, for one moment, doubt this, that has not received his impressions from other sources than the teaching of Christ and his Apostles? Who can doubt it, that has not shut from his understanding and heart, the true force of such words as these? "Except one be born of water and of the Spirit, he cannot enter into the Kingdom of God." "As many of you as have been baptised into Christ have put on Christ." "I am the Vine, ye are the branches." "He that eateth me, even he shall live by me." "Except ye eat the flesh of the Son of Man and drink his blood, ye have no life in you." Thus was it when the ministerial commission was first given.

But our Lord embraced still other things under this commission; authority to teach was one. Having empowered His disciples to baptise all nations. He gave them commission and command to teach their converts all things which he had taught them; commission and command to "feed his flock;" to "feed his sheep and lambs." So that instruction to be right, and safe, and sure of God's blessing, was, in the Church of the Apostles, to be given under ministerial commission.

Besides, to give the young disciple power to resist manfully the world, the flesh and the devil, and stability in "the faith once for all delivered to the saints," there was instituted the further rite of laying on of hands. This rite, in its sacramental character, was first received, as shadowed forth in the descent of the Holy Ghost upon our blessed Lord after His baptism, and as enjoined in the teaching and exemplified in the practice of His immediate disciples. And although its administration was confined to the highest order of the ministry, it had respect in a degree to the priestly function of that order, sufficiently so at least, to justify us in classing it under the priestly powers at first committed to the holy ministry.

We have then before us this solemn fact—that the forgiveness of sins, the engrafting of sinners into Christ, and training their souls in the life of faith for the eternal fellowship of heaven, were entrusted by our Lord to the ministry of reconciliation, and that this ministry was committed to the Apostles. In their day, therefore, it is clear that if men would be saved, they must seek salvation from Christ through the priestly office. That the first ministers stood "in Christ's stead," and in such a sense as that whosoever submitted to their just authority and received the blessings which they, as His instruments, had to give, submitted to Christ Himself, and received His grace in the only way of His appointment.

(To be concluded in our next.)

MASSACHUSETTS.

CONFIRMATION.—On Sunday morning last, the Rt. Rev. Bishop Eastburn administered the Apostolic rite of Confirmation in Trinity Church, in this city. Fifteen were confirmed. In the afternoon, the Bishop visited Christ Church, Cambridge. The Bishop preached, confirmed three persons, and made an address to the candidates. In the evening, the Bishop attended the Seamen's Chapel. The Bishop made an address, and confirmed three.

ST. ANNE'S CHURCH, LOWELL.—The Rt. Rev. Bishop Eastburn visited this Parish on the 11th inst., the third Sunday in Lent. The sermon was preached by the Bishop.

In the afternoon, the Rector, administered adult baptism. The Bishop preached to a very large and attentive congregation. After the sermon, he confirmed thirty persons, and made a very appropriate address; the preface to the confirmation service, having been read by the Rector.

The Bishop preached again in the evening.—Christian Witness.

We appended to the letters of Bishops Henshaw and Hopkins on the Constantinople Mission, the statement that the Bishop of Connecticut had also addressed a letter to his Diocese on the subject.

Our Printer, having that city in mind, made it "the Bishop of Constantinople"! Though we corrected this in the proof, by a very unusual oversight, the change directed was not made. We now present the letter, accredited to its rightful author.

CONSTANTINOPLE MISSION.

To the Clergy and Laity of the Diocese of Connecticut.

BRETHREN:—I have received a communication from the Foreign Secretary of the Board of Missions, informing me that "at a stated meeting of the Foreign Committee, held the 27th of February, a Resolution was passed directing the Secretary to lay before the Bishops of the Church, the pecuniary wants of the Mission at Constantinople, and the inability of the Committee to meet them."

The Secretary states that "the failure of the Committee to provide the full amount of salary quarterly in advance, has been entirely owing to the backwardness of the church in contributing to the object."

"The Secretary further states that 'the amount required for this mission to the 15th of June next, which ought to be remitted at once, is two thousand dollars.'"

From a private letter from Bishop Southgate to one of his friends, (which has been communicated to me,) I learn that he has heretofore been subjected to great inconvenience from the delays attending the receipt of his stipulated allowance, and has suffered much from embarrassment in meeting his pecuniary engagements.

I regard the Mission to Constantinople as well calculated to exert the most salutary influence on the character of the Eastern Christians. The position of the Missionary Bishop brings him into intimate relations with the Patriarchs and chief dignitaries of the Eastern Churches, and affords him favorable opportunities of discussing with them the most practicable means of enlightening the ignorance, and removing the load of superstition, by which they are now oppressed. If, through the good providence of God, these Churches could be restored to a primitive Christianity, they would become the most ready instruments for extending its light and its blessings to the numerous Heathen and Mahomedan nations, with which their position connects them.

Under these circumstances, I earnestly recommend that the first monthly collections, or other contributions to Foreign Missions, in this Diocese, be mainly appropriated to the Mission to Constantinople, and that they be forwarded to the Treasurer of the Foreign Committee without delay.

THOMAS CHURCH BROWNELL,
Bishop of the Diocese of Connecticut.

Hartford, March 19th, 1849.

DIOCESE OF ALABAMA.

We are happy to learn from the following letter, that this growing Diocese is to have the advantage of a Church School. Nothing can more contribute to the growth and prosperity of any Diocese. The fact that it is to be "under Episcopal control" in the Diocese of Alabama is a sufficient promise to secure confidence and patronage.

Tuscaloosa, December 22, 1848.

MY DEAR SIR:—At several of the Conventions in this Diocese the subject of a Diocesan School has been one of interest and deliberation; and while all were agreed upon the point of its necessity, and its importance to the Church, yet no decided steps were taken to organize it.

Having myself always regarded such a school as the most efficient means of ultimately building up the Church in Alabama, I have recently taken measures for having it opened on the 2d of January next, at Tuscaloosa, under the name of the CLASSICAL INSTITUTE AND MISSION SCHOOL.

The design is to have it consist of a Theological and Classical Department—the former for training young men for the work of the ministry—the latter for the classical education of boys. My intention is to erect suitable buildings a short distance from town, so soon as the funds, requisite for that purpose, can be obtained. In the mean time, however, the state authorities have very kindly granted us the use of a part of the former State House.

The Classical department will be under the care of the Rev. C. F. PEAKE, as Principal, who will be duly furnished with assistant teachers.

As the Institution is established for the sole benefit of the Church, the whole of the income will be expended in securing instruction; by which arrangement, I hope to be able to place in it, more teachers, in proportion to the number of pupils than there usually are in schools of this character. It is my design that the pupils shall be well and truly taught in the classics, and other academical studies, and be thus qualified for admission into college, or for entering upon the active duties of life. My object will also be to afford religious improvement, by the systematic teaching of the truths of the Gospel, by the habit use of evangelical forms of devotion,* and by domestic association with teachers of established Christian principles and habits.

The pupils will reside in the same building, and eat at the same table, with the Principal and teachers, and will be, at all hours, under their control and supervision. The Chapel will be furnished with an organ, that the services may be rendered the more attractive and pleasing to the boys, each one of whom will be instructed in the principles of sacred music.

But inasmuch as this Institution is avowedly under Episcopal control, it can only depend upon the Church for patronage. By the Church it must be sustained, or it cannot succeed. As it has been a matter of deliberation in our Conventions, and as individuals, from different parts of the Diocese, have desired its establishment, I confidently expect, other things being equal, that churchmen generally will patronize this School in preference to others. If I can only have the co-operation of my brethren in this work—a work which I cannot but regard as of first importance to the Church in this Diocese,—a School will be established every way worthy of confidence and support.

Will you, my dear Sir, aid us by your influence and patronage in carrying forward this important work? In no way, probably, could you labor more directly for the prosperity of the Church, and the furtherance of the cause of religion, than in giving to this Institution your hearty co-operation.

I am, dear sir, very truly yours, &c.,

N. H. COBBS,

Bishop of the Prot. Epis. Church in Ala.

N. B. The scholastic year will be divided into two terms of five months each—the first term to commence on the 1st day of October—the second on the 1st day of March.

To the preceding we add the following just reflections from Dr. Hook's lectures on the Last Days of our Lord's Ministry. We pass over the description of the awful scene enacted upon Mount Calvary. The record is given in the words of inspiration, and human rhetoric is not needed to impress the powerful truth. Nothing can add to the vividness of the picture called up before the mind in these words—"Behold the Lamb of God which taketh away the sin of the world."

"But the malice of his enemies nothing could appease. While the people stood beholding, the chief priests, and scribes, and elders, took steps to prevent their pity from being excited, or their sympathies awakened; they mocked him, and said, 'He saved others, himself he cannot save; if he be the King of Israel, let him now come down from the cross, and we will believe him.'* 'He trusted in God; let him deliver him now if he will have him, for he said, I am the Son of God.†' So reasonable was the proof which they demanded, according to the notions of their hearers, and so specious the inference which they drew from his apparent inability to save himself, that the populace and soldiers, nay, the very thieves who were crucified with him ('for he was numbered with the transgressors'),‡ were seduced by their example, and 'cast the same in his teeth,§

Now here you will observe, my brethren, that the grand objection urged against the claims of our Lord (an objection considered to be irresistible and triumphant), was, that he was enduring tortures and submitting to ignominy inconsistent with the dignity of the Son of God and King of Israel. They had learnt from Scripture, that the Messiah was to be both the Son of the blessed, and, like David, a Viceroy of Jehovah. From these premises they proudly deduced what they regarded as the inevitable conclusion; and they dogmatized, without hesitation, on what it was or was not becoming in such a being to do. Let those of our contemporaries reflect on this, who, admitting the existence of the Deity, and having formed their hypothesis with respect to his nature, attributes, and perfections, either partially receive or entirely reject revelation when it cannot be bent to their preconceived notions or made subservient to their interests, their wishes, and their expectations. Let them compare the New Testament with the Old; the facts recorded in the former with the predictions delivered in the latter, and they will soon learn that the 'foolishness of God is wiser than men, and the weakness of God is stronger than men.'|| Indeed, in the instance before us, the understandings of the people were as besotted as their hearts were callous; for the very deed they were now doing had been foretold, not obscurely but literally, by the Royal Prophet:—"All they that see me laugh me to scorn: they shoot out the lip and shake the head, saying, He trusted on the Lord that he would deliver him, let him deliver him if he delight in him."¶ Nay, the same Psalmist, in the same psalm, minutely predicted the conduct of the Gentile soldiers; declaring, not only that they would part among them the garments of the Messiah, but also that they would cast lots for his vesture.* And lo! these things the soldiers did. When they had crucified Jesus, 'they took his garments and made four parts, to every soldier a part; and also his coat: now the coat was without seam, and woven from the top throughout. They said therefore, among themselves, Let us not rend it, but cast lots for it, whose it shall be.†

Let us, my brethren, pause a moment, while, turning from this awful and appalling scene, we reflect on the object of the Son of God in thus permitting himself to become a man of sorrows, without form or comeliness, despised and rejected of men. Remember that for us 'he laid down his life;† 'for our sins he died.‡ 'He came to put away sin by the sacrifice of himself;|| 'to wash us from our sins by his own blood;¶ 'to be a propitiation for the sins of the whole world; 'to give his life a ransom for many;†† 'to redeem us with his precious blood;††† not to multiply quotations, and multiplied they might be from every Epistle and Gospel, he has done what the evangelical prophet foretold he would do, 'He hath borne our griefs and infirmities, and carried our sorrows; he was wounded for our transgressions; he was bruised for our iniquities; the chastisement by which our peace is effected, was laid upon him; and with his stripes we are healed. All we, like sheep, have gone astray, we have turned every one to his own way; and the Lord hath laid upon him the iniquity of us all.‡‡ Thus, though, it surpasses man's understanding to conceive how that justice can be infinite which is tempered by mercy, or that mercy infinite which is controlled by justice, yet what is impossible with man is shewn to be possible with God; justice and mercy have kissed each other, and he can be just, and yet the justifier of us sinners. The countless intelligences who people infinite space, and have for ages desired to look into this mystery, may learn from this, that in the nature of things it is impossible for sin to pass unpunished; while they magnify the transcendent mercy of the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost, which devised, which achieved, and which is even now administering the means by which a fallen and apostate race might escape from the wrath to come. The work is the work of the undivided Trinity: for, while the Father appointed and accepted the sacrifice; the Son, having full power over the body which he assumed, became the High Priest to offer it; and the Holy Ghost, by dwelling without measure in the human nature which suffered and was sacrificed, rendered it free from spot or blemish, 'a savour of life unto life.'

But all this might have been accomplished without having been revealed to man. For what purpose, then, has it been not only accomplished, but also revealed? For what but for this: to show to men, as well as to angels, principalities, and powers, 'the exceeding sinfulness of sin,'||| which required so awfully stupendous a sacrifice, oblation, and satisfaction. Now, this is a fact which can be only spiritually discerned; for, among the arts of Satan, none are more successful than those which he uses to render us deaf to so unwelcome a truth; to blind us to our own imperfections, and to exalt our confidence in our own righteousness. The secular man sees it not, feels it not, believes it not. Tell him that he is a sinner, and he acknowledges it. But what then? He finds excuses for his conduct, by appealing to the strength of temptation, to the circumstances under which he is placed, or to his natural character, propensities, and temperament. And these excuses he imagines that his God will admit, because he builds on the sandy foundations of human sophistry, and not on the firm rock of God's Word. Although 'the Lord, the Lord God be merciful and gracious, long-suffering, and abundant in goodness and truth, keeping mercy for thousands, forgiving iniquity, transgression and sin,'—yet he expressly declares, that he 'will by no means clear the guilty, but visit the iniquity of the fathers upon the children, and upon the children's children, unto the third and fourth generation.*' His mercy is infinitely great, but it is far different in its nature from what the reasoner of this world conjectures, or the self-satisfied expects.

Look to the natural effect of sin, and what do we find, but that its natural effect is to plunge us into misery, and involve us in ruin? Take lust or intemperance, or any of the greater vices, and their natural consequence is, disease, premature old age, and untimely death. This may not, indeed, be the invariable consequence, so far as human vision can discern; but it is the consequence which we invariably anticipate and predict. Now, what we perceive to be the case with respect to the more heinous sins, God declares to be true with respect to sin of every kind. So that there is as close a connexion between sin of any kind, (that is, every breach of the Creator's laws,) and everlasting misery, as between cause and effect. Why it is so, is impossible for us to ascertain, while we know only in part, and see only as through a glass darkly; but that it really is so, is what nature hints, and revelation unequivocally declares. To impress this solemn, important, and overwhelming truth upon our minds; to awaken us to a detestation, as well as a dread, of sin; to animate our endeavours to overcome the whole body of sin by the proffered graces of the Eternal Spirit, . . . these are among the most prominent reasons, not, indeed, why God designed the redemption of our race, but why the record has been preserved to us, that such a mode of redemption was required, and has been effected.

From Chambers' Journal.

A WALK AMONG THE EAST OF LONDON JEWS.

We had occasion the other day to wait for a brief space near the India House, in Leadenhall street. Time passes but slowly with the listless lounge of the pavement; so it did with us. We inspected ten times over the stores of nautical instruments, the masses of ready-made clothes for the hurried emigrant, the libraries of books of colonial interest, the plates of Indian men in hurricanes off the Cape, and of apocryphal naval battles, where with most of the shop windows in that most maritime of the city thoroughfares are stocked; and at length, tired of what we saw, turned down St. Mary Axe into the great Jewish colony of London.

It is not a savory locality the city Ghetto. Picturesqueness and dirt, however, frequently go together, and here assuredly were both. For hundreds of years, the labyrinth of small, crooked streets, blind lanes, and tortuous passages, ending in tiresome cul de sacs, which stretches away north of Leadenhall street, has been inhabited, as it is inhabited now, by Jews. The ancestors of the bearded men you meet lived and died in those quaint, dirty, high-gravelled houses about you. For hundreds of years the Passover has been kept in these streets, and the probability is, that it will be observed there hundreds of years to come. Everything about you is entirely and essentially Jewish. Five minutes' walk has brought you from a Christian city to a Judaic colony. It is not a solitary example of such isolated colonies. Every now and then, in exploring the swarming-regions of Eastern London, you come upon a cluster of Jewish lanes. You may know them by the almost universally-opened windows, by the men and women seated in chairs upon the pavement before their dwellings—perhaps a memorial of the patriarchal times when every man sat under his own fig-tree—by the dingy shops of secondhand wares, the clusters of dirty frippery hung from door-posts, the plates of oil-fried fish displayed in the cook-shops, and the masses of old iron and rusty rags, blurred phials with unwholesome breath, and all the chaos of grimey odds and ends which go to make up the stock in trade of the dealer in marine stores.

The West End Jews are few and less characteristic, being in general more or less fallen off from the nation. Many, in point of fact, are in no way distinguishable from the better classes of English gentry; they are in reality Englishmen, only of Jewish descent, and of the ancient Hebrew faith; and that such persons, not to speak of the Jews generally, do not possess all the ordinary privileges of British subjects, is by no means creditable to our national policy. To neither the Hebrew gentlemen, nor the Hebrew merchants and tradesmen in the central and western parts of the metropolis, can we refer for the true Jewish characteristics. We must look to the Jew in the East as the true object of interest. He lives where his father lived; he drives the trade his father drove; he marries a woman of his own race, and sends his children to the synagogue to do after him what he has done himself. Such is the class of people you meet about the "Clothes Mart" off Leadenhall street. To the eye accustomed to the polished Judaism of the Quadrant or the Haymarket, these East End Caucasians appear exaggerated Jews. Noses seem more hooked, ringlets more greasily black, and eyes more piercingly lustrous. Everything about their quarter wears a dirty, slovenly, yet bustling aspect. The houses are old and high, and appear crumbling and fading away. There is a damp, fusty odor lingering over the whole district. The glimpses you catch of old stained wooden panelings and musty, moth-eaten window-curtains, bring up unpleasant associations of spiders spinning undisturbed, of ancient hereditary black beetles, and other haunters of places unsavory. These suspicious mansions are evidently crowded from the ground to the roof. Unshorn men, in their shirtsleeves, smoke at the opened windows; children go screaming about the doors; dirty drabs of women shout to each other from house to house; and knots of men, many of them bearded, all of them black-haired and black-eyed, lounge round the thresholds, bargaining and disputing in that harsh, snivelling, Jewish accent, which makes you sometimes doubt whether those who use it be speaking English or no. And thus you fish your way along the guttery stones, amid rotting vegetables, fish-offals, well-churned and trampled mud, and a host of other abominations, turning from one narrow dirty lane into another, catching glimpses of close-confined courts and narrow, sodden wynds, with yellowish-hued linen fluttering aloft from poles, and everywhere surrounded by the same piles of high, grimey houses, smoke-hued, and reeking with hot fetid vapors.

At length, perhaps, you will turn unexpectedly into a small square. Instantly you feel that you are in a new hemisphere. Although still on Jewish ground, you have left behind you the smell of fish, and the frowzy odors of old clothes, to experience in exchange an intense effusion of the perfume of oranges. You tread on something soft, and perceive that you are trampling on a small mountain of orange-peel, mingled with mashy lumps of soft and decayed fruit. All round you are orange-shops, or rather stalls,—dark, dismal places—on which you can see piles of the fruit arranged upon low tables and counters, and superintended by dirty Jewish boys and as dirty Jewish matrons. You are in the Orange Change, where all the itinerant Hebrew dealers in the fruit come to purchase their stocks, and whence they roll it about on their barrows through all wide London. The houses of the square are of much the same class as those we have been describing. A tavern at the corner boasts a sign, decorated with Hebrew inscriptions and Jewish symbols; and if you look about, you will recognise, what you never see on the dead walls of any other part of London, placards couched partially, or altogether, in the Hebrew language, and addressed to "the Jewish public." Many of these documents refer to cakes, meats, and other viands in exclusive use amongst the Jews, principally at their times of religious festivity. You will be sure to see advertisements of "Coshier Rum," and "Motsos"—the latter being, we believe, the appellation of the Passover cakes of unleavened bread. Here and there too you will observe a news-vender's or bookseller's shop, full of Hebrew literature, and generally displaying in the windows the extended sheets of Jewish journals, of which there were, until lately, two, now reduced to one; very little, if at all, known beyond the Israelitish community.

Leaving the Orange Mart, and proceeding some little way westward, we come upon another distinctive feature of the district—the Clothes Mart. Here is the very centre of the trade carried on throughout all London in old clothes. The tribe of shabby, black-muzzled hawkers, who wander from street to street, shouting their monotonous chant of "Old clo!" bring their treasures of cast-off raiment here. Running along and across broad yards, are squares and rows of rickety old sheds, with benches and frames for exposing the peculiar merchandise to the best advantage; whole streets or avenues, it may be said, of shabby-genteel garments; crowded by a multitude of shabby-living men, chaffering over their wares, exalting or depreciating their merits, disputing about the texture of a stuff, accosting likely customers, pushing, bustling, laughing, and joking. The buyers and the sellers group, and swarm, and cluster around throngs of dark, mildewy-looking men, most of them with their professional black bags over their shoulders. Nor, outside the mart, is the activity and bustle less great: there vendors and purchasers are seen going in groups to cement their bargains in the low-browed, dark public houses; the narrow street is choked up by the carts and barrows of sellers of vegetables and fish; slatternly women scream and scold over slimy piles of flounders, and soft, sodden lumps of salmon; the cheap cook-shops are crowded by amateurs of simmering, three-days-stewed meat, and pies of unknown materials; barefooted urchins drive hard bargains with apple-women and baked-potato men, or perhaps over the trays of whelks and periwinkles deposited upon hampers at every corner. Alternating with these cheap provision-shops and stands are magazines of old iron, brokers' establishments, and grimey coal and potato sheds; while, crowding backwards and forwards, chattering and hallooing, there swarms hither and thither the coarse, dirty, Jewish population, only broken here and there by the blue uniform of the policeman, who stands with all his eyes about him at the corner, or by the stately form and the long, flowing robes of the rabbi, as he slowly picks his way amid his flock to the neighboring synagogue.

Altogether, the scene is a strange, but not a pleasing one. Dirt is the prevailing feature—dirt in the street, dirt in the houses, dirt in the men and women. Pity it is that of all their Oriental customs, cleanliness should be almost the only one which the Jews have entirely forgotten. Yet they look content and happy in their foulness; reflecting, no doubt, that as good a bargain can be made in tainted air as in the wholesomest breeze. That important point settled, the Jews, although they may make an article of merchandise of soap, appear to consider it as a commodity with which they have no other necessary connection.*

When I am forward to speak the evil I know, or perhaps only surmise of others, what can it proceed from but a desire that they should be universally despised, or fear lest they should not? How diabolical! Leave an evil report to shift for itself: you need not say a word to set it forward.—REV. THOMAS ADAM.

* "Constant readers" will readily understand that the writing and publishing of this paper are not prompted by anything like a wish to amuse, by ridicule of a depressed and everywhere unjustly-treated race. It has seemed to us, however, that even a somewhat high-colored sketch of the Jews' quarter of London might have a beneficial effect, in leading to improvement in those personal habits and domestic conditions on which health, and even morals, so intimately depend.—Ed.

THE VALUE OF A LITURGY.

Can any stronger testimony be given in favor of a Liturgy, than the following from the learned Dr. Miller, the great champion of Presbyterianism?—ED. OF BANNER.

A FAULT IN PUBLIC PRAYER.—Every thing approaching to flattery is a serious fault in public prayer, and ought to be carefully avoided.—Flattery in any man, and on any occasion, is criminal. In the pulpit it is eminently so: but to convey any thing like flattery in prayer, is undoubtedly liable to still heavier censure. Yet, something nearly resembling this, not unfrequently occurs in the public devotions of the sanctuary. I refer to the language often employed in prayer, after a brother in the ministry has preached, or performed some other equivalent service. That prayer is often employed as a vehicle of strong commendation, not to say flattery, of the preceding preacher. It is by no means uncommon, in this part of the public service, for him who performs it, to express himself in some such language as the following: "We thank thee, O Lord, for the interesting, the solemn, and the truly scriptural discourse to which we have just listened;" or, "We pray that the richly instructive, powerful, and excellent discourse which thy servant has just given us, may sink down into our hearts." And on some rare occasions, thanks are returned that "such a burning and shining light has been raised up;" and a petition offered, "that he may shine with increasing lustre as he advances in years;" and that "his departure, like the setting sun, may be serene and full of glory." I short, with many preachers, the closing prayer, in all such cases, is considered as furnishing a kind of theological thermometer, by which we may graduate the warmth or the coldness of the approbation felt for the sermon just closed. This ill-judged and very exceptionable practice has become with many preachers, so common, that if one should omit to convey, in some form, the usual compliment, he is by some considered as wanting in civility, and as manifesting a want of respect to the preacher. And although persons of sound judgment and good taste generally avoid this impropriety, yet, as might be expected, the more injudicious and indiscreet, are most apt to launch out in language of warm eulogy, and, through this devotional medium, to pay compliments altogether unmerited, and if ever so much merited, altogether unseasonable. It would, indeed, be over fastidious to forbid, in a closing prayer, any reference to a preceding preacher. To pray that the word delivered by him may be accompanied with the Holy Ghost sent down from heaven; that it may prove like good seed sown in good ground, and bring forth abundant fruit to the glory of God; and that the preacher may be graciously rewarded for his labour of love, and may see the work of the Lord prospering under his ministrations, may undoubtedly be allowed without offence, nay, without impropriety. But nothing that savours of compliment, direct, or indirect, either to the talents or the piety of the preacher, is, in any ordinary case, allowable. And certainly, it is in all cases, safest and best to err on the side of reserve and abstinence, than of excess.—Dr. Miller on Public Prayer.

A SAVIOUR DESPISED AND REJECTED OF MEN.

In the "Passion Contemplations," for which we thank, in our readers' behalf, the learned and able writer, we have presented the great theme of this week, as set forth in the clear prediction of the Messiah's most faithful prophet. What Isaiah made known as prediction, we are called upon to contemplate in the still clearer light of history. In the marvellous narratives of Gospel history, we have followed during this week, the mysterious path of our Blessed Redeemer, from His triumphal entry into Jerusalem, through the dark shades of Gethsemane, even to the summit of Calvary. In all these fearful exhibitions, we behold a SAVIOUR DESPISED AND REJECTED OF MEN. And let the fearful consequence of this awful sin, as exhibited in the woes which soon overtook the apostate people and city, be a warning to those who may be tempted to commit like sin. The present condition of this once favored people of God, is a standing record of the manner in which Divine justice shall visit those who reject or despise the invitations and warnings of mercy, addressed to us by Him who endured the cross.

It is with the view of presenting this contrast in a strong and clear light, that we have given, in another place, the extract which describes the present state of the Jews in London. Compare their condition, as a marked and devoted race in the heart of a flourishing city, with that which they enjoyed, even up to our Saviour's time, when their glorious temple towered in its magnificence over the splendour and beauty of Jerusalem. Oh, fearfully has that dreadful imprecation been answered—"His blood be on us and on our children!" And if the Jews were thought worthy of such severe punishment for despising and rejecting a Saviour who was presented to them as "a man of sorrows," how much more aggravated is the sin of those who treat a Redeemer, exalted and glorified, with the same contempt and indifference? It is not necessary to show the various ways wherein the world now rejects and despises its Saviour. None can be so blind as not to see that His claims are treated, by many in our Christian day, with the same indifference and disregard which filled up the measure of Jewish iniquity. Even His avowed followers share in this awful sin. By some He is again betrayed, by more He is denied, and by others He is "crucified afresh." With solemn particularity it behoves us to ask that question, "Lord, is it I?" With earnest thoughtfulness should every Christian consider, as each Good Friday brings back the remembrance of that awful scene, whether his place is with the penitent disciples at the foot of the cross, or with the rude multitudes who gazed in sullen indifference and bitter enmity upon that spectacle of woe. To suggest such inquiries is the great practical use of these solemn observances. Let us then strive so wisely to fulfil this blessed object, that we who have truly mourned by a Saviour's cross and sepulchre, may rejoice in the happier lot to which He invites us, at the right hand of His glorious Throne.

An article appeared in "the Calendar," for the week before last, which we had hoped might be passed over in silence. Having the most friendly feelings towards this journal, and sure that this kind disposition has always been reciprocated, nothing short of the plain demands of justice would induce us to make any reference to this matter. We are more especially unwilling to do so, because we believe the Editor is at present absent from his post, in attendance upon a member of his family, driven to a milder climate by ill health.

The temporary editor has favored us with an article which bears the ominous title of "Romanizing." The following extract will give the substance of this article:—

From the Calendar.

ROMANIZING.

We have felt unwilling to annoy the Church with any new alarms, or we should long since have expressed our concern at the existence of a Romanizing clique in the city of New York, which has been thrusting itself into notice in the pages of the N. Y. Churchman, and the "Ecclesiologist." When we speak of Romanizing, we wish to be understood as weighing our words. We are not crying wolf, wolf; as it has been done by others, till the Church is fairly insensible to the sound. By Romanizing we do not mean a cross, or a stained window, or a surplice, or a musical service, or anything else consistent with the Prayer book, and dictated by a love of its spirit; we mean a contempt for the prayer book, and a manifest going after other things, many of which are contrary thereto. By Romanizing, we mean disaffection to the Nicene Faith, and the adoption of the Tridentine Creed, as necessary to its completion; or, what is the same thing, disloyalty to the Anglican Church, and its standard theology, and a practical reception of popish standards of discipline and doctrine. Thus Romanizing is a definite idea with us. It means—leaving the straight line of Catholicity, in which Ridley, and Andrews, and Laud, and Sancroft and Seabury have gone to God, following Ignatius, and Clement, and Cyprian, and Augustine; and striking into the via devia by which Newman and his troop have made themselves as Korah and his company, following Peter Lombard, and the Aristotelians, who changed theology into a system of philosophy, and cast it over at the Council of Trent. This is what we mean by Romanizing, and this is what we now feel it our duty to point out, as infecting the neighborhood of our General Theological Seminary, and rendering the labors of its able professors almost ineffectual, by the ensnaring influence which it exerts through young men, upon young men engaged in the study of divinity.

The peculiar condition of the diocese of New York has very much favoured the production of this rank and noisome growth, and now prevents its correction. The clique are, therefore, pushing things to a daring length in the face of the Church, and nothing can be done. They commend Mochler's Symbolism as the only theology to be thought of, and force its fascinating and mild Tridentinism upon the raw recruits of the Seminary, by sneering at those who are ignorant of it, or who retain some regard for Hooker. They talk and lounge in book-stores, picking up the Romish works which are carefully thrust into their way, no one knows precisely how; they are always prating the scraps and shreds which they have gathered from translations of the Fathers; and they assert with the boldest self-sufficiency, the absolute certainty that auricular confession, transubstantiation, and the invocation of saints, are Catholic doctrines, and necessary to be believed. If any clergyman is distinguished for fidelity to the Church of which he is a minister—these creatures have a way of turning up their noses, and calling him a "mere Anglican." The present Bishop of Maryland, with Hobart and Dr. Jarvis, and such men as Hugh James Rose, and Jones of Nayland, are constantly mentioned in this way; and it produces its effect on the inexperienced and ignorant youth, who come under such influences. And who are the accusers? The juveniles, whose profound opinions, and astonishing attainments are to be seen paraded in the pages of "the Ecclesiologist," or ministers whose career notoriously began in Calvinism, or the lowest Evangelicalism!

Now we would have preferred allowing this article to experience the usual fate of editorials, and not disturb its ephemeral existence with any voice of ours. There is such a harmless vagueness about it, such an imaginative cast that we think it should rather have found a place in the Poet's corner, than among the sober records of history. In truth we are almost justified in supposing that by an error of the types, the Printer had put "Romanizing" for the more appropriate title of "Romanizing."

This article, however, is at once seized upon, with eager avidity, by the Roman papers on the one side, and by that class of journals in the Church which have always exhibited hostility to the General Theological Seminary, and the principles with which this noble Institution is identified. The former discover in it the promise of a rich harvest of "converts," a fresh supply of editors, professors, &c. The latter see a glorious vindication of their own sagacity, in this verification of their evil predictions, and seem to think themselves fully qualified for a professorship in a school of the prophets. The following is the language of one paper:

"Those who have been familiar with the Recorder for the last twelve years, may remember that long before the above unvarnished avowal was made, repeated notes of warning were sounded from its editorial columns, of the results which would inevitably follow the teachings of this revived school of theology."

And, by a dexterous change of title, this journal turns the whole tide of the groundless prejudice, thus excited, against the "Theological Seminary," and makes this head its article.

And then, to give greater weight to this dexterous application, the much respected name of the Bishop of Connecticut is unwarrantably introduced, as endorsing this particular article, because Bishop Brownell has given the usual Episcopal recommendation to the Calendar, expressing his general confidence in it! Is it supposed that the Bishop of Connecticut examines every editorial and sanctions it before it can appear in the Calendar? If not, where is the justice or honesty of the following remarks?

"The Calendar has at length spoken, and we hope its voice will reach where ours could not be heard. This paper is published at Hartford, in Connecticut, under the direct sanction of the Rt. Rev. Bishop Brownell, who has 'entire confidence in the ability, doctrinal soundness, and Christian charity, with which it is conducted.' Bishop Brownell was consecrated within a few months of Bishop Chase, nearly thirty years ago, and has the reputation of being one of the most cautious, prudent, and peace-loving members of the bench. We regard the following statement, therefore, as coming with high authority, and we hope that the Episcopal endorser of this article will feel it to be his duty to institute such measures with reference to the General Theological Seminary, as shall free it from the contaminating influences to which we have so often adverted."

Now, this is doing great injustice to the Bishop of Connecticut, and forcing upon him a responsibility that no bishop of the Church should have imposed upon him.

The whole turn of the article is unjust to the Calendar. Its article merely says, that this "Romanizing" is "infecting the neighbourhood of the General Theological Seminary, and rendering the labors of its able professors almost ineffectual, by the ensnaring influence which it exerts through young men, upon young men engaged in the study of divinity." And in last week's paper the charge is still further removed from the Seminary.

We think that the "Calendar" has, most unwisely and unjustly, connected the General Theological Seminary in any measure with this grave charge. The injustice of this association is proved by the indefiniteness of the connection which it pretends to establish. Even supposing that a few of its "young men" were guilty of the folly charged, is it not unjust to bring their sin to bear against the Seminary, of which they are the unworthy students?

But the whole charge is vague and indefinite, and surely the Calendar should have brought forward more specific facts before it violated the wise rule which before made this journal "unwilling to annoy the Church with any new alarms." It should have remembered that the position which it occupies, as a sound Church paper, would give a most injurious force to its slightest charge against the Seminary. The cry of "wolf" is so familiar, coming from other quarters, that it can hardly frighten the most timid of the flock. But the ominous word "Romanizing," from one who would adopt as standards "Ridley, and Andrews, and Laud, and Sancroft, and Seabury," is truly terrific to all weak minds. Some would think it very much like the cry of "wolf" lifted up by one of these ravening animals, for the time covering himself with "sheep's clothing!" The Church has been wearied with the senseless and vindictive outcries raised against the General Theological Seminary. The emptiness of these charges has been proved by the most particular examinations. The professors have, in charity to this feeling, submitted to the most particular scrutiny of their views and opinions. They have always shown themselves ready to take hold of any thing in the Seminary which seemed contrary to the standards of the Church. Their views and opinions are upon record.

We wish to say distinctly that this article has been penned without the slightest consultation with any one connected with that Institution. And it is only now printed lest our silence might be misunderstood.

We can speak from particular knowledge of "the neighbourhood of our General Theological Seminary." It so happens that we spent several days lately in that vicinity. And we neither heard nor saw any thing to justify the remarks of the Calendar. We visited also the various Church bookstores in New York frequently, and we never met with "the clique" designated. We have the best evidence that the Seminary is in a most excellent condition. It has a noble and devoted band of students, young men from whose future course the Church has much to hope, and whose fair fame should not be blighted by prejudices founded upon vague and empty charges.

In conclusion, although we must admire the heroic determination of our friend of the Calendar, "not to be brow-beaten," we have too high an opinion of his good sense and feeling, to suppose that he will maintain a wrong position to prove his editorial infallibility.

CLOSING EXERCISES OF THE SCHOOLS AT BURLINGTON.

The following communication is from a most devoted and intelligent member of the Church. We are sure that he gives an account free from exaggeration. We were prevented from witnessing the interesting scene in the Chapel, when the young ladies, who had concluded the regular course, received their testimonials and were addressed by the Bishop in a most affecting and impressive manner. We were assured, by many witnesses, that all present were greatly affected by this ceremony.

We had the pleasure of hearing the Musical Rehearsal, and it was a refreshing occasion for all who enjoy sweet sounds, or the sight of happy faces.

We rejoice to learn that the Hall and the College were never in a better condition, and that their influence, for good, was never more fully developed. We trust they will continue to enjoy the signal prosperity with which they have hitherto been blessed, and in this wish all who truly love the Church must heartily unite.

ST. MARY'S HALL.

It may be, Mr. Editor, and I trust it will be, that some one more favored than myself, will give you a full account of the result of the examination of the pupils, just finished, at this most invaluable institution, and which circumstances prevented me from witnessing; but I had the high gratification of being present at the closing exercises on Thursday, when the graduating class read their several compositions and received their diplomas, and the whole was concluded by a musical rehearsal by all the pupils. The only matter of regret in connexion with the day was the fact of there being so few auditors. I wish that the whole Church could have been there; I am sure that there then would be no lack of means to place this institution, where, as a Church institution it should be. As a school of education, in its highest sense, it has the strongest claims upon all who wish to see the young trained up in the way they should go. Seven young ladies received diplomas, each of whom had previously read compositions in three different languages, viz. English, French, and Italian, Spanish or German. I am not skilled, Mr. Editor, in all these languages, but judging from what I did understand, from the testimony of others, and from the ease and grace and fluency with which the young ladies performed their several parts, I am free to say that never did a whole class—for they were indeed a very good—anywhere do more credit to themselves or their instructors.

I am told by those who were present at the examinations in History, Grammar and Mathematics, as well as the languages, that they were all equally admirable, and superior to any thing which they had ever witnessed, not excepting the highest colleges in the country.

While my pen is in hand let me say a word for Burlington College. There I was more fortunate; I had the privilege of hearing the examinations of two or three of the classes in Latin, Greek and Mathematics, and all that has been said for St. Mary's Hall, may be repeated here; that system must be good and that instruction thorough which will enable a class of twenty boys—some of them not over twelve years old—to take up Homer or Virgil, without knowing a moment beforehand from which part of the book they would be called upon to read, and without a single instance of failure—to translate it into English as fluently as if they were reading their native language.

But I must stop, this paper is already longer than I had contemplated. I will only repeat my deep conviction that churchmen could not bestow a greater blessing on their country than by giving that aid, which is now so much needed, to place these institutions on a firm and permanent basis.

NASHOTAH.

A letter, just received from Mr. Breck, informs us that he has in hand another hundred dollars towards making up the $1000. Three hundred more are only needed. It is of great importance that the sum should be made up, so that advantage may be taken of the whole season for building. Mr. Breck says that, with the money received, they have been able to haul the stone, so that they can begin at once. Nothing more will be done until the whole sum is made up. They would like to have the word given them to go on by the middle of this month. Unless the sum of $300 is added to that promised they lose $700! Are there not those who would rejoice to give for such an object, and who would shrink from the responsibility of withholding an offering when it is not only so needful, but when its value may be so multiplied? We are sure there are some waiting to see whether there is a likelihood of the whole amount being raised. Let these wait no longer and the result is certain. In no way can money be given with a more certain prospect of usefulness.

EPISCOPAL FUND OF PENNSYLVANIA.

We have received the following notice for publication, and trust it will secure general attention.

For the Banner of the Cross.

NOTICE.—The undersigned respectfully calls the attention of such parishes in the Diocese of Pennsylvania as have made no contribution to the Episcopal Fund during the current year, to the following recommendations of the Convention, and gives notice that any payments which the contributors wish to have introduced into his account to be submitted at the next meeting of the Convention, ought to be made before the 1st of May.

JOHN WELSH, JR.

Treasurer of the Episcopal Fund.

Philadelphia, March 27, 1849.

Extract from the Revised Regulations of 1829.

"On every such occasion (an annual sermon on the Episcopal office, &c.) a contribution shall be received for the sole and express purpose of making provision for the support of the Episcopate."

Resolution of 1846, "Resolved, that it be earnestly recommended to the several parishes of the Diocese, which have not as yet pledged a specific annual contribution to the Episcopal Fund, to assume the yearly payment of a sum for that purpose not less than five per cent. upon the amount paid as a salary of the Rector or Minister."

SCHOOL FOR YOUNG LADIES.

The next term of the "Retreat," the School for Young Ladies on the School House Lane, under the supervision of the Bishop of Pennsylvania, will commence on Tuesday, the 10th instant.

We have great pleasure in giving the above notice, and in commending this excellent School to the favor of the Church. Its vicinity to the city is a great recommendation to those living in Philadelphia, who may thus have their children near at hand while they enjoy the benefit of pure country air. We have reason also to think that the discipline and instruction in this School are of the highest order.

NOTICE.

We have received a letter from "Hertford," bearing the date of March 24th. Will our correspondent inform us whether the amount enclosed is to be conveyed to its object through the Domestic Missionary Committee?

A correspondent wishes to know where Dr. Upfold's Sermons are to be found. He complains bitterly against us for giving extracts from such good sermons and not telling our readers where to obtain the discourses themselves.

THE CHURCH REVIEW AND ECCLESIASTICAL REGISTER. Volume II., Number I. April, 1849.

We are happy to find that this Periodical, which has always been regarded with much interest by us, begins its second volume with a spirit and determination which are always the earnest of success. We have received, along with this number, a circular from which the following is an extract:—

THE CHURCH REVIEW AND ECCLESIASTICAL REGISTER, which was commenced about one year since, enters now upon a new volume. In behalf of that publication we respectfully bespeak your kind consideration. The effort was begun as an experiment; in the full conviction of its importance, and yet with fear as to its success. Its calm and Catholic tone, appealing to, and depending for support upon, no warmth of party zeal, has received the most marked and gratifying commendation; while the support, already enlisted, in every section of the Church, forbids the belief that the work ought now to be abandoned. Arrangements have been made to prosecute the undertaking with new vigor. Writers of the most distinguished reputation have already appeared upon its pages, a list of whom may be seen upon the cover of the next number. The Second Volume will appear in a new and elegant dress, from type purchased expressly for the Review, and from a house of the highest reputation. To sustain the effort our subscription list must be increased; and we now earnestly appeal to the friends of sound and Christian literature, for such co-operation as the effort in their judgment deserves.

The first number of the new volume of this Quarterly will be published on the 1st of April next.

The present number is, we think, a very able one. The following are the subjects of the Articles:—

- Art. I. Macaulay's England.
- " II. Memoir of Dr. Milnor. by Bishop Henshaw
- " III. Clerical Changes.
- " IV. Present aspect of Unitarianism.
- " V. The Religious Condition of New England.
- " VI. Church Missions and Church Extension.

Notices of Books. Ecclesiastical Register. Summary of Home and Foreign Intelligence.

These interesting subjects are all treated of, by writers well qualified for their discussion. We have only had time to look over the critique on "the Memoir of Dr. Milnor," written by one of our Bishops. It is a very interesting article indeed, written in a fair and candid spirit, yet sufficiently decided withal.

We do not think that we can better commend this Review than by giving the following list of those who have already contributed, or from whom communications may be expected:

Rt. Rev. J. P. K. Henshaw, D.D., Rt. Rev. Alonzo Potter, D.D. LL.D., Rt. Rev. George Burgess, D.D., Rev. Samuel Far-

THE ORIGIN AND USES OF THE CREEDS. By the Rev. Samuel Fuller, D.D., late Milnor Professor of Divinity in the Theological Seminary of Ohio, Gambier.

This is a useful and excellent Tract "printed by the Tract Committee of the Diocese of Massachusetts." The object of this Treatise is to show "from historical documents, the authenticity of which has never been called in question, THE SOURCES WHENCE THE CREEDS ARE DERIVED; and also to mention THE SEVERAL VALUABLE PURPOSES THESE CREEDS SUBSERVE IN THE CHRISTIAN CHURCH."

The following is the conclusion of the Tract:—

To what resistless conclusion are we conducted by the facts now before us? What but this: WE ARE BOUND BY THE DEFERENCE OUR REASON REQUIRES US EVER TO PAY TO VALID EVIDENCE, TO RECEIVE THE TESTIMONY OF THE EARLY CHURCH, AND TO ABIDE STEADFASTLY BY IT. Primitive testimony, written, but not oral, PRIMITIVE WRITTEN TESTIMONY, this is the adamant rock, on which we must take our immovable position; the only position, which will save us, on the one hand, from the changeable errors of a proud and unguided individual judgment, and, on the other, from the iron yoke of a pretended infallibility, which claims for itself the exclusive prerogative of determining and prescribing, even though in opposition to primitive testimony, and at this late period in the history of the Christian Church, what are the doctrines which all must admit, or be bound by a chain of excommunication in this world, and suffer the pains of the second death in the future life!

We should then receive the testimony which the early Creeds embody: should hold fast these forms of sound words, which God in his merciful providence has delivered us: hold them fast, to the exclusion of all diverse doctrinal standards of subsequent invention: hold them fast in faith and in love: believe them firmly; love them fervently; spread them widely; continue grounded and settled in the faith they teach, and be not carried about by every wind of novel doctrine and metaphysical subtlety; for in the Creeds of the early and testifying Church, we know, on the ground of infallible evidence, not only Whom, but also what we are to believe. As we are required, we should "contend earnestly for the faith once delivered unto the Saints:" delivered once, and no more; delivered once for all; and consequently, incapable of either addition, or diminution, of either change or development; but forever precisely the same faith, neither more nor less, that it was when first delivered. It is not a matter of indifference what religious faith we embrace. A correct faith is vitally connected with a correct practice. Our religious faith is the basis of our religious principles; and our lives will never be better than the maxims we adopt. A correct faith is also essentially associated with the divine life in our souls, and with our victory over this sinful world. "Whatsoever is born of God overcometh the world, and this is the victory that overcometh the world, even our faith. Who is he that overcometh the world, but he that believeth that Jesus is the Son of God?" But above all, we should take care that our hearts accompany our lips, whenever we repeat these primitive standards of faith, since it is only "with the heart that man believeth unto righteousness. If thou shalt confess with thy mouth the Lord Jesus, and shalt believe in thy heart, that God hath raised him from the dead, thou shalt be saved."

LETTERS TO N. WISEMAN, D.D., on the Errors of Romanism, in respect to the worship of saints, satisfactions, purgatory, indulgences, and the worship of images and relics. By the Rev. William Palmer, M.A., of Worcester College, Oxford. Second American Edition. Baltimore: printed by Jos. Robinson. 1849.

We are glad to see that a second edition, of these well known and able Letters, is called for. They should be put in the hands of all who have any "Romanizing" tendencies.

THE SPIRIT WORLD, A POEM; AND SCENES FROM THE LIFE OF CHRIST. BY JOSEPH H. WYTHES. Philadelphia, 1849.

This is a neat and unpretending little volume of Poetry, in blank verse. The thoughts are, evidently, the offspring of a devout and religious mind, and are expressed in a pleasing manner.

PASSION CONTEMPLATIONS.

AN EXPOSITION OF ISAIAH LIII.

No. II.

The inspired penman of this remarkable chapter, part of which was explained last week, recorded his prophecy seven hundred years before the appearance of the Messiah. The Spirit opens to him a vision of Immanuel, as He would appear when "manifest in the flesh," and gives him the pencil of heaven to sketch the pictured history. Ages, however, accumulate upon it their obscurity,—till the very nation to which the vivid oracle was committed, forgot that their Messiah was to be humble and suffering, and required a princely conqueror. In the depth of this oblivion, "the arm of the Lord is revealed," the obscurity of the heavenly portrait cleared; and its every outline and shade are found the identification of the Prophet of Galilee. Thus did "the Spirit of Christ testify beforehand the sufferings of Christ." The prophetic chapter is a gospel in itself,—and will throw new light on the evangelists, when compared with them. The two are to each other 'like wax to the seal;' we may inspect both the divine stamp or seal in the prophetic writing, and the divine impression taken from it, as preserved in the writings of the apostles; and, by a study of the corresponding features of each, understand more completely the image they both present of the Messiah. The one exhibits the mould by which God had pre-determined to model the Atonement exacted of His Son; the other displays the Atonement actually thus modelled. Of the Saviour's life and entire passion, agreeing thus with prediction, we may say, in the language of Job, "it is turned as clay to the seal."

In the last paper were presented the historical and the doctrinal parts of this remarkable chapter. The brief history, in clear and unambiguous language, announced the humble course of the Messiah, from the incarnation to the gloomy death. The doctrinal passage rehearsed the great truths, that men are depraved and deserve punishment, but that Jesus gave Himself for us, ransomed us from the curse, and made our peace with God.—In the third place,—

III. We open the remainder of the chapter, which recounts particular CIRCUMSTANCES in the Redeemer's labour of love.

"He was oppressed and He was afflicted; yet He opened not His mouth: He is brought as a lamb to the slaughter, and as a sheep before her shearers is dumb, so He openeth not His mouth." The prophet gives emphasis to the meekness and patience of Jesus: it was wholly peculiar to Him who "opened not His mouth" either to complain before men, or to mourn before God. Complaint when persecuted, no human being can deny another; it is the privilege of our infirmity. And although we admire silent fortitude as heroic virtue, yet to open the heart before God in lamentation is natural and pious. Moses often complained of the obstinacy, rebellion, and ingratitude of the Israelites; David, in the psalms, commended his griefs to his Maker very frequently; and Nehemiah prays God to reward his enemies according to their evil deeds,—as do several others of the inspired men. But Jesus never once gave way to repining. In the garden indeed He acknowledged the bitterness of His cup,—but spoke not of His enemies. And when we consider the transcendent bitterness of that cup, we acknowledge how beautifully this sorrowful prayer distinguishes patience from apathy. It was no small addition to the wo, that He rejected the consolation of mourning for Himself.

"He was taken from prison and from judgment; and who shall declare His generation?" The expression "taken from judgment," we interpret, deprived of a proper and equitable, an honest and honourable trial. And this will throw light on the words "taken from prison;" which do not mean brought out of a prison for trial or execution, but deprived of an imprisonment,—"exempt," though not through kindness. Confinement would have been a small addition to the suffering of the Redeemer, and would not have distinguished Him from others. But to be deprived of a fair and impartial trial, and of the respite of incarceration both before and after it, indicates a persecution more determined and more rapid than, when legal forms were regarded, has been the fate of most other martyrs. Our Saviour was seized before morning, hurried through some forms, and crucified the same day. St. Paul was put in prison to defend him from the Jewish mob; but not our Saviour. St. Paul, when at Rome, in order to "appeal unto Cæsar," was for a long time in custody, before his appeal was tried; but no delay is permitted our Saviour. Most literally was He "taken (exemptus) from prison and from judgment."—Nor were there any to speak in His behalf, to make interest and intercede, or, as the prophet speaks, to "declare His generation," of the line of David, an honour, which ought certainly to have been as much respected by the Jews as was by the Romans the Roman citizenship which protected St. Paul. Or, "His generation" may mean his history: and not one interposed to plead the many labours of love,—not one of the multitudes He had healed and befriended by miracle. Even the disciples abandoned Him.

We next read,—"He was cut off out of the land of the living; for the transgression of my people was He stricken,"—was actually slain, and went from among the "living;" and that, as the Atonement for our "transgressions;" and moreover, "He made His grave with the wicked, and with the rich in His death;" because He had done no violence, neither was any deceit in His mouth." At first view, the prophecy seems not to resemble the event; for Jesus (we think) "made His grave" with the "rich," the "rich man of Arimathea," rather than with the "wicked;" and was with the "wicked;" in death, with the thieves, rather than with the "rich." But the prediction is entirely accurate. The "grave," in scripture, (whether in the original word, or by metonymy, or from the mode of use), often means, directly or indirectly, the place of departed spirits,—there, the Messiah was to be "gathered" "with the wicked." And, as Christ promised the penitent thief that he should "be with Him in paradise," He clearly "made His grave," connected His going to hades, with that of this person, confessedly "wicked," and so stamped by his execution. This was the destiny of His soul; "cut off from the land of the living," it entered "the land of the shadow of death." His body was interred among the wealthy,—a rich man, Joseph of Arimathea, having begged the corpse, and laid it in his own sepulchre: "with the rich in His death." These two circumstances most completely distinguish our Saviour from any martyr whose persecution and suffering might chance to resemble His. For no martyr would foretell his going into the place of spirits with a wicked man. Nor was it likely when the fury of the people and the magistrates was at its height, that there would concur the further circumstances, of a rich man who should have boldness enough to ask the body, interest enough to obtain it, and affection enough to lay it in the costly tomb he had prepared for himself.—The other clause is worthy of attention. It was a remarkable fact, that He who was persecuted with unabating malice should be honourably buried on the very day of His death. But it was because He was innocent: as the prophet speaks, "because He had done no violence, neither was any deceit in His mouth;" He was guiltless both in word and deed; and the Jews, by permitting Him to be honourably buried, themselves testified to this effect. When a bad man, a great tyrant, or an obnoxious traitor, is hunted to death by popular rage, great indignity is usually offered the body, or was in those ages, nor are ages more refined without examples. But when innocent men are destroyed, the fury commonly subsides when the abhorred person is dead. The Jews then, by this very working of nature, have left an involuntary and unimpeachable testimony of the innocence of the Nazarene.

The prophet completes the narrative of the suffering of Jesus, with the words,—"yet it hath pleased the Lord to bruise Him; He hath put Him in grief." Although men persecuted the Messiah, yet the hand of God was pre-eminent in the matter. The Lord had laid on Him the iniquity of us all,—and now the same 'Lord bruised and put Him to grief,' to expiate the "iniquity;" God thus reconciled the world unto Himself. The Deity "bruises and puts to grief" many among the children of Adam; but it is for their spiritual good, inasmuch as they are sinners. Christ however knew no sin: for what then was he afflicted? not for Himself, but for us; "the just suffered for the unjust, that He might bring us to God."

Hitherto we have gone no farther than the crucifixion and burial of Christ;—the prophet now carries the account onward. "When Thou shalt make His soul an offering for sin, He shall see His seed, He shall prolong His days, and the pleasure of the Lord shall prosper in His hand." The "soul" as well as the body of Jesus was "offered for sin,"—which act was anciently typified by pouring out the blood of the animal victim. And as the apostle declares that "without shedding of blood there is no remission," we learn the importance of this crowning work in the Sacrifice of Christ. The offering of the soul began in the garden of Gethsemane, when "His soul became exceeding sorrowful even unto death;" and it was completed on the cross, when "He poured out His soul unto death." The offering of His soul is here regarded as already made, and His spirit to have left the body. When this is done, i. e. after His death, "He shall see His seed, He shall prolong His days." He did see His seed, spiritual children, of whom He is the "Everlasting Father;" some of the faithful, those of former times who had looked for a Messiah to come, He doubtless saw in the place of spirits; and some, who believed in a Messiah already come, He saw on earth after rising from the dead. By the resurrection, He "prolonged His days,"—continuing forty days connected with the earth. And "the pleasure of the Lord prospers in His hand," for He is the universal Mediatorial Lord, being made "Head over all things,"—"all things are put under Him,"—"all power is given Him in heaven and in earth." He is the CENTRE of all the purposes and proceedings of Jehovah. Looking upon all creation, above and below, He is seen in the whole, when the Father declares, "I am well pleased."

The exaltation of Jesus to heaven, and His sitting at the right hand of God, being thus implied, the prophetic recital is continued; "He shall see of the travail of His soul and shall be satisfied; by His knowledge shall my righteous servant justify many; for He shall bear their iniquities." The expression "travail of His soul" is equivalent to the words in the New Testament, "born of God;" and the apostle, as a spiritual parent, (appointed thereto by the Omnipotent,) says of the Galatians, "of whom I travail in birth again until Christ be formed in you." The whole alludes to that change in the inner man by which we are converted from sin to holiness, and are "transformed from glory to glory to the image of Christ." Of these spiritual children the Redeemer in heaven sees a great multitude from all nations, and is "satisfied;" and "by His knowledge, He justifies these many." His "knowledge" is the experimental acquaintance that Christ has with human nature, having been "tempted in all points like as we are." Through this united humanity and divinity, He is not only a merciful, but a faithful High-priest,—interceding with God, and justifying the sinner, with impartiality towards both: "He is the Author of eternal salvation to all them that obey Him:" of these only, does He eventually "bear the iniquities;" while on those who are unrepentant the burden is thrown back, and they bear their own iniquity and their own punishment in the world to come.

Thus are predicted the known particulars of the mystery of redemption, from the first appearance of the "tender plant," to the ripening of its fruit in the final work of justifying us, as our Advocate, at the right hand of the Father. We now turn to an additional and mysterious act, intimated in the words, "Therefore will I divide Him a portion with the great, and He shall divide the spoil with the strong, because He hath poured out His soul unto death." Of creatures opposed to God and Christ, the fallen angels are "the great" ones, and Satan the chief among these; being likewise "the prince of this world," with dominion over all mankind through their fallen nature. But, of these captives to Satan, his miserable prey, a "portion" is "divided," separated, imparted to Christ, viz. those "many" whom He finally "justifies," and whose iniquities He will thus have finally borne and cancelled. The moral victory of the Atonement makes Him this mighty conqueror; yet not to the exclusion of some more personal encounter of the Man Jesus with the wicked archangel,—expounded by theologians of a conflict, in the unseen world, between the Captain of our salvation and the evil adversary: Jesus, the stronger, "entered the strong man's house and bound him." He also "divided the spoil with the strong,"—or, as the apostle writes, He "spoiled principalities and powers." And, He "made a show of them openly, triumphing over them," when, on the day of crucifixion, "many bodies of the saints arose and appeared unto many." This proved that He had overcome the foe that held "the power of death, i. e. the devil." This was the recognisable fulfilment of the first promise; for the Messiah, the Deliverer from condemnation then made known, now "bruised the head of the serpent;" and it was "because He poured out His soul unto death;" for "through death He destroyed him that had the power of death."

The concluding words of the chapter are, "and He was numbered with the transgressors; and He bare the sin of many, and made intercession for the transgressors." These may be tokens, distinguishing Jesus beyond mistake:—while "bearing" and expiating "sin," He was crucified between "transgressors," the two thieves, and prayed forgiveness on the greater "transgressors," His murderers. Or, the words may likewise be a concluding summary of the doctrine just announced:—"He was numbered with the transgressors," when He took human nature, and was in the likeness and in the lot of sinful man;—"He bare the sin of many," when making the Atonement through which they are reconciled to God;—and as our Advocate with the Father, "He makes intercession for those transgressors" among whom He was "numbered." Both the interpretations are sound and edifying. As a summary, it makes rhetorically complete the pronouncement of the admirable seer.

Probably this chapter is the fullest of doctrine of any in the Bible; it certainly is the most connected body of doctrine in the Old Testament: the Holy Spirit, as before remarked, seems here to have dictated a full account of the mystery of the Atonement, now commemorated by the Church. First, are recited the humiliation and suffering of the Messiah,—and they are set forth as the price of our restoration. Next, are asserted the doctrine of human depravity, and the mysterious doctrine that our guilt was laid upon One mighty to save. Then, are declared the patience and submission of the Saviour,—His innocence,—His being deserted by friends, and destroyed by enemies. Nor does the prophet omit that the chastisement was from God,—that it pleased Jehovah that His soul be made an offering for sin. And the victory of the Messiah in the world of spirits is added, to identify Him, actually as well as morally, with the promised Seed who was to bruise the head of the author of evil.

Never, until we feel the unrestrained wrath of God, can we know the full value of the Atonement. The godly will never realise all that their Victim suffered for them. The wicked will experience greater wo than His, when they are past the opportunity of sharing the benefit it gained. Isaiah demands, with emphatic rebuke, "who hath believed our report?" and if unbelief was hardened folly in his day, what would be his criminality of the faithless under the complete gospel! Let us not, then, procrastinate our contrite and loving faith:—or, "the arm of the Lord will be revealed" in our chastisement more signally than it was in that of the Redeemer.

Some of you, I trust, my readers, feel your hearts burn while thinking on these things,—whenever (as at this holy season) the glowing subject of Christ in humiliation, in agony, on the cross, comes over the heart burdened and disburdened of sin; for the wondrous Atonement, while, as a doctrine, it enlightens the understanding, speaks also to the soul, a topic of ardent spiritual gratitude to Him by whose stripes and wounding we are healed, by whose chastisement we have peace. Here it becomes the human monitor to be silent. Your glow of hallowed feeling towards the Saviour should not be regulated by persuasion from without, but by the testimony of conscience, and the yearning power of faith.—Holy Spirit, it is Thy work! sanctify our affections, that they may be wholly Thine!

MR. EDITOR:—

The system of convocations for the promotion of the Missionary work in the Diocese, and for the collection of funds for Missionary and Educational purposes, was recommended to the Convention of Ohio by the Bishop about eight years ago. By a resolution of the Convention, the Diocese was divided into six convocation Districts; the clergy of each were instructed to meet, organize, and engage in the work. It was farther resolved, that it should be the duty of the Parishes having Rectors to release them at least two Sundays in each year, to be spent by them in missionary labours, having in view the collection of funds for the missionary cause. The clergy of all the Convocations met, organized, and commenced the good work, but many of them soon discontinued their attendance.

During the last three years, of the six Convocations, one only has continued to meet. The Scioto Convocation has met four times in each year. They have done much towards the support of a missionary, who, labouring within its bounds, has collected a congregation in an important and long neglected field, and has erected as neat a Gothic church as is to be found in the Diocese, and has also prepared the way for the establishment of two other Parishes. At the last meeting of the Scioto Convocation, they appointed a Committee to secure the services of another clergyman to labour as a missionary within their bounds, each of them to receive from the Convocation $250 per annum towards their support. Besides this the Parishes in this Convocation have contributed liberally to the Missionary and Education Committee of the Diocese, to the Domestic and Foreign Missionary Committee, and to feeble Parishes for erecting churches, &c., &c. Of the nine Parishes within the bounds of this Convocation only four are able to contribute much to its funds, those of Columbus, Chillicothe, Portsmouth and Circleville.

The following communication, prepared with the hope of awakening the attention of our brethren to the importance of reviving our Missionary Convocations, has been refused a place in the Western Episcopalian. In asking you to be so kind as to allow it a place in the Banner of the Cross, which is circulated in Ohio, I thought it proper thus far to explain.

WHAT CAN BE DONE FOR OUR FEEBLE DECLINING PARISHES?

MESSRS. EDITORS:—

I was not a little surprised to learn from your correspondent "Order" in the Episcopalian of 22d of Nov. last, that from the list of Parishes in the Diocese of Ohio published in the last journal of our Convention eleven were struck out. My first impression was, that it must be a mistake. But on turning to the journal I find that in 1844 we numbered 78 Parishes, and that ten have since been admitted into union with the Convention, making our present number of Parishes 88. The list published in the last journal is 77. It appears then that "Order" is correct. This is a painful, humiliating fact, eleven Parishes gone during the last four years; and where have they gone, to Rome, or to the World and rationalism? Not one of them, nor a single individual thereof has been published as having gone to Rome, it is therefore to be feared that they have sunk down to the world and unbelief. And what has been the cause of the loss of so many Parishes during the last four years? Where were the shepherds, whilst the wolves were among their flocks? Were they "feeding and providing for the Lord's family: seeking for Christ's sheep that are dispersed abroad, and for his children who are in the midst of this naughty world"? Were they endeavouring to "drive away from the Church all erroneous and strange doctrines, contrary to God's word"? If laying too much stress on the Ordinances is an error, surely the rejection of them is a much greater and more fatal error.

I cannot however believe that these Parishes are as yet irrecoverably lost. In looking over the present list of Parishes I find eight of them are now in a destitute feeble declining state. Of the 88 Parishes then in Ohio, eleven are struck off as dead, and eight others are in a perishing condition; of these nineteen Parishes thirteen have churches erected. Shall we leave these feeble Parishes to take care of themselves, or perish? Sooner let the mother leave her infant child to take care of itself, or perish. Let every Clergyman in the Diocese ask himself, What can I do towards saving these nineteen Parishes from utter ruin? Let us not wait for an invitation to come, but let us go to them without delay, let us go before the last hope of recovery has expired. Has not our Lord and Master commanded us to "go," and did we not at our Ordination bind ourselves to go? And has not the Church in Ohio made provision for destitute infant Parishes? Whenever a Parish becomes vacant, the 7th Canon makes it the duty of the Vestry immediately to give notice to the Bishop. The Bishop is then their Pastor, and it becomes his duty to visit them, or provide that they be visited by his clergy.

Again, our Diocese is divided into Missionary Convocations, and each clergyman is required to spend at least two Sundays in each year in destitute feeble Parishes. In this way provision is made for services at least one Sunday in each month in every destitute Parish in the Diocese. If the clergy of Ohio will henceforth go forward in the faithful performance of these duties, we shall soon hear that our declining Parishes are revived; and shall soon see the names of those absent Parishes appearing in our list.

From this humiliating view of the state of our beloved Church in Ohio the clergy of the different Convocations will see the necessity of rousing themselves at once to the missionary work. May we not indulge the hope that every Convocation in the Diocese will meet to hold services in some Parish within its bounds between Easter and Whitsunday. I would respectfully name the second Wednesday after Easter, or as soon thereafter as may be convenient. At that time let the Convocational system be revived; let the clergy of each Convocation look over their field, subdivide it, and each one take a portion under his care. Let each one put his hand to the plough, and keep his eye steadily fixed on his work, that the whole field may be tilled, and that no destitute Parish, or family may be longer neglected. Even a monthly visit to our feeble and rejected Parishes would revive and strengthen them. It would inspire them with confidence in the Church, and with hope yet to live and become useful. It would also save some $30,000 or $40,000 which has been expended in the erection of Churches in those Parishes.

Obituary.

From the New York Churchman.

Died, at his residence in this city, on Sunday, the 25th inst., the Rev. HUGH SMITH, D.D., in the 54th year of his age.

At a meeting of the Clergy of the Protestant Episcopal Church, assembled at the Rectory of St. Peter's Church, on Tuesday morning, March 27th, 1849, to attend the funeral of the late Rev. Hugh Smith, D.D., the Rev. Bird Wilson, D.D. was called to the Chair. Whereupon a resolution was offered by the Rev. B. C. Cutler, that a committee of three be appointed to present to this meeting resolutions expressive of the sentiments of the clergy present on that solemn occasion. Whereupon the Chair appointed the Rev. D. Cutler, the Rev. Dr. Taylor, and the Rev. Mr. Balch, to prepare such resolutions. The following resolutions were submitted and adopted by a unanimous vote:—

1. Resolved—That while we bow submissively to an Allwise Providence, we cannot but mourn at the loss of a beloved brother in the great work of the vineyard of our Lord and Saviour, Jesus Christ; and of one who has been endeared to the Church by a long, arduous and faithful course of ministerial labor, terminated by a peaceful and happy death.

2. Resolved—That we most sincerely and affectionately sympathize with the widow and children of our departed brother, and pray that God may abundantly support and console them under their present bereavement.

3. Resolved—That a copy of these Resolutions be sent to the Church papers in New York, for publication, also to the family of the deceased, and to the Vestry of the church of which he was lately the Rector.

B. C. CUTLER,
THOS. HOUSE TAYLOR,
LEWIS P. W. BALCH.

At a special meeting of the Vestry of the Protestant Episcopal Church of St. Peter, held in the Vestry Room, on Monday evening, March 26, 1849, the following resolutions were unanimously adopted:—

1. Resolved—That this Vestry have learned of the decease of their late Rector, the Rev. Hugh Smith, D.D., with profound grief. During a long and intimate intercourse, for many years, the church in which he ministered was blessed with the services of a faithful, untiring and devoted servant of God, and his people with the ministrations of a Pastor, who preached the Gospel of which he was a Herald, with ability, energy and earnestness, and who as a Christian, afforded in his own life and conduct, a pure and bright example to his flock.

2. Resolved—That we deeply sympathize with the family of the deceased, in the loss of a Husband and Father, whose warm and affectionate nature, and kind and tender heart, endeared him in all his social relations. We fervently commend them in their calamity and bereavement to the blessing of the God of the Fatherless and the Widow, in the humble trust that the wind will be tempered to the shorn lamb, and that consolation may be found in that "memory of the just," which liveth here, and in the precious assurance of immortal felicity which attends the departure of those who have died in faith.

3. Resolved—That as a mark of respect for their late Rector, the Vestry attend his funeral, and that the chancel of the church be clothed in mourning for thirty days.

4. Resolved—That the Rev. Henry Anthon, D.D., be requested to preach a funeral sermon upon the deceased, on Sunday the first day of April next.

5. Resolved—That the clerk of the Vestry transmit a copy of these proceedings to the widow of the deceased, and that the same be published in the church papers.

THE SUN AND THE CLOCK.—The Scripture is the sun, the Church is the clock, whose hand points us to, and whose sound tell to us the hours of the day. The sun we know to be sure, and regularly constant in his motions; the clock, as it may fall out, may go too fast or too slow; we are wont to look at, and listen to the clock to know the time of the day, but where we find the variation sensible, to believe the sun against the clock, not the clock against the sun. As, then, we would condemn him of much folly that should profess to trust the clock rather than the sun, so we cannot but justly tax the miscredulity of those who will rather trust to the Church than to the Scripture.—Bishop Hall.

If an injury is done to me, why should I do myself a much greater, by resenting it?

Miscellaneous.

MINISTERS' SALARIES.

I knew a young man who entered the ministry a few hundred dollars in debt for education. To break the back-bone of his debt at the onset, he asked, and the committee of the church over which he was settled agreed, that two hundred and fifty dollars of his salary should be paid in advance. Without experience and not dreaming but that church promises were as good as gold, he went forward with a light heart, fully expecting that in two, or at most three years, he should be out of debt.

What followed? He received just twenty-six dollars in advance and no more! The consequence was that instead of getting out of debt in three years, it took ten!! For ten long years that debt lingered, worried and depressed his mind. Probably not a week passed but he remembered with sadness that he was in debt. None but those who have suffered in this way know what it is. And in the end, he had paid one hundred and twenty-one dollars more than would have been necessary had the society fulfilled its promise. For several of the last years his people owed him more than was necessary to extinguish the debt. And he chanced to know of cases wherein men, who had money at interest and were accumulating, members of the church even, kept back their subscriptions many months for their own benefit, while he was virtually paying interest upon the same. And these men, be it understood, were among his warmest friends. I have heard that man earnestly advise theological students not to go into the ministry in debt. If they had debts, to pay them by teaching, engineering, an agency, or any lawful and proper business, rather than by undertaking to keep a minister's tavern, and rely upon parish promises.

I also knew a man who was desirous of attending the meeting of the American Board last September, and had looked forward to it with hope for months—but after all he could not go, for want of twelve or fifteen dollars, while at the same time his people owed him two hundred dollars.

Many ministers, because their pay is withheld, are compelled to run up a debt at the stores. This works badly, and men as poor as they, cannot afford it. Men of small means should certainly buy with ready pay. Otherwise they will have to give considerable more for the same articles; and it is doubtless just. And not only so, but when the minister finds a large amount against him, and men who trade on trust are apt to have large accounts, he will need some decision to make a salary which comes in dribblets meet so large a debt. Small sums, paid at intervals, will be likely to slip away, and leave the great account with the merchant unbalanced.

Furthermore, if he takes a religious paper and a quarterly journal, he feels that he is too poor not to pay for them in advance, and yet his salary comes in so tardily that the privilege of prepaying is likely to be forfeited. And his library remains year after year without increase. Poor man! his only hope of keeping his head above water is to pay down for every thing; but for him to do it is to make bricks without straw, for to no one is payment so tardily made.

Now this slack habit in a parish tends to impoverish not only the minister, but itself. What man, who would be any accession to a society, would be likely to move in where he should see such reluctance in supporting the gospel? Would he wish to go where there was great complaint of parish taxes, the people all feeling very poor, and the minister nearly starved out? And in such a place he would doubtless see other marks of a want of thrift and promptness. The meeting-house would probably need painting, the singing would want recruiting, the congregation would be thin—many would be late, and perhaps not able to get to church until afternoon. In short such an afternoon people would have few attractions for men of right habits. They would be likely to lose many of their best members, while few if any would come in to supply their places.

The reverse of this might be true. Even were their number small and their means limited, they might be an active, prompt, thriving, happy little people, which would no longer repel, but strongly attract, good men. Try it, try it.—Vermont Chronicle.

A RARE WISDOM.—In the neighborhood of Louvain, Belgium, resides an elderly man, a shepherd, whose whole property consists of a small hut and two or three acres of land. A short time ago he was notified by the minister of the interior that a brother of his had died leaving him a fortune of about $300,000. The shepherd however, not a little astonished his friends and relations by refusing to accept the legacy for three reasons. 1. Firstly he desired no money from a brother who had led a wild life, beggared him and his parents, and shortened the life of the latter. 2. On the age of 67 he could not resolve to be metamorphosed from a poor devil into a rich man, he therefore preferred remaining as he was. 3. The necessary amount of business attending the receipt, &c., of the legacy would give him much trouble and anxiety; and he did not wish merely for the sake of his heirs who would laugh at him for his trouble, to burden the remainder of his life with unnecessary cares, or which reason he would be content with his own earnings.—Calendar.

THE LATE POPE AND GAS-LIGHT.

When the chairman of a company formed for lighting Rome with gas, waited on the Pope to obtain the required permission, Gregory indignantly asked, how he presumed to desire a thing so utterly subversive of religion. The astonished speculator humbly stated, that he could not see the most distant connection between religion and carburetted hydrogen. "Yes, but there is, sir," shouted the Pope; "my pious subjects are in the habit of vowing candles, to be burned before the shrines of saints. The glimmering candles would soon be rendered ridiculous by the contrast of the glaring gas-lights; and thus a custom so essential to everlasting salvation would fall into very general contempt, if not total disuse."—Bentley.

Let me direct all my studies chiefly to the great end of serving others in love.

CONFIRMATIONS.—Sunday next before Easter, A. M. In St. Peter's Church, Philadelphia, thirty-one. P. M. In Christ Church, fourteen. Wednesday before Easter.—In St. Stephen's Church, (an extra confirmation,) seven. Thursday before Easter.—In St. James' Church, Philadelphia, five. Good Friday, St. Paul's, fifteen. Easter Day, in Trinity, Southwark, thirty-one.

ORDINATION.—On Easter Sunday morning, at Trinity Church, Southwark, Mr. George L. Neide, late a Student of the General Theological Seminary, was admitted to the Holy Order of Deacons, by Bishop Potter. The candidate was presented by the Rev. Dr. Coleman, Rector of the Parish; Sermon, by the Bishop.

Mr. N. is another instance (like his Rev. Presenter) of the weakness of the claims of Methodist Episcopacy, when in contact with those of the Church. — J. A. MERRICK

ST. PAUL'S CHURCH, PHILADELPHIA.—This congregation have just procured a very fine Organ from the manufactory of Messrs. Simmons & McIntire, of Boston. The instrument is valued at $6000. It has been tried before competent judges, and they express themselves fully satisfied with it.

Dimensions of the case, 18 feet 4 inches front, 12 feet deep, and 23 feet high in the centre. Its outline is of the Grecian order, and harmonizes with the architecture of the church. The case is painted white, relieved by richly gilded pipes in front.

Its contents are as follows:—

GREAT ORGAN.—Compass of keys from GG including GG up to F in Alt.

CHOIR ORGAN.—Same compass as the Great Organ.

SWELL ORGAN, down to C, 2d space in the Bass, and continued down to GG by connexion with the Choir Organ.

PEDAL ORGAN.—Compass from C C C to C, embracing two octaves, and containing a double open diapason, and a double dulciana.

COUPLERS.—Pedal and great; pedal and great at octaves; pedal and choir; great and choir; great and swell at unisons; great and swell at octaves; choir and swell.

FOUR COMPOSITION PEDALS produce the following changes:—1st. The full great Organ, omitting its reed stops and Night Horn. 2d. The positive great organ. 3d. The Trumpet Eolina, 1st open Diapason and Principal. 4th. Acts on the swell stops, and brings them all on, except the Piccolo, Trumpet and Clarion.

The total number of Speaking Stops are 34, and when the Bassoon is added, will be 35; which stops are reinforced or modified by 15 additional registers and 4 composition pedals, making a grand total of 49 registers operating upon about 2000 pipes.

We trust that the congregation, which has displayed such liberality in procuring an instrument to assist their worship, may find in it an incentive and help to higher and holier praises of Him from whom all blessings flow.

THE PRIESTLY OFFICE.

The question now is, and it is a grave one, does this ministerial power still continue in the Church?

1st. That the terms of the commission seem to require an affirmative answer can hardly be denied; as by these terms "every creature" of "the whole world" to the "end of time," is placed under apostolic authority. The Apostles having been commissioned to "preach the Gospel to every creature;" to "baptise all nations," and to rest in the assurance that Christ, the Divine Head of the Church, would be with them "always, even unto the end of the world;" it is impossible to conceive how this could be, except by an unfailing transmission of the priestly power thus committed to them, to all future ages of the Church.

2d. Besides, the necessity of this priestly power, if we are to be guided by the Gospel and not our own fancies, is as great now as it was in the days of the Apostles. This necessity is founded in the spiritual condition of man, as revealed and provided for by Almighty God. And this condition has not changed. The necessity of baptism, authoritative teaching, absolution from post-baptismal sin, confirmation, and the Holy Eucharist, and other things, at first committed to "the ministry of reconciliation," seems to have increased rather than lessened since the death of St. John. It is as true now as ever, that "Except one be born of water, and of the spirit, he cannot enter into the Kingdom of God." As true now as ever, that "the priest's lips are to keep knowledge, and the people to receive the law at his mouth." As true now as ever, that man sinning mortally, or so as to hazard his spiritual life, after baptism, stands in need of absolution from that priesthood to whom Christ said, "Whosoever sins ye remit, they are remitted unto them." As true now as ever, that the reception of the Holy Ghost by "the laying on of hands," is necessary to the Christian's confirmation in "the principles of the doctrine of Christ." As true now as ever, that "except ye eat the flesh of the Son of Man, and drink His blood, ye have no life in you." And if these blessings could not be reached, in the days of the Apostles, except through the Priesthood, how can they now? Has a new commission been given, in place of the apostolic commission? If so, what and where is that commission? Or has God revealed to us any modification or change in the old commission, by virtue of which we may safely deny to the priesthood now, the ministerial powers entrusted to the Apostles? If so, what and where is that revelation? The truth is, God has made no such modification or change; and man makes it at a terrible risk.

We profess to "believe one Catholic and Apostolic Church." Not only its existence, but its truth, as the living, speaking, directing body of Christ; that body in which we have our spiritual being, our knowledge, our nourishment unto everlasting life. Now has that body ever been without the priestly function, exercised in the way we have pointed out, by the Apostles? Has she ever relinquished her claim to it? Has she ever lived a day, since becoming "the pillar and ground of the truth," since being invested with "the ministry of reconciliation," without asserting her possession, in the actual exercise of its high powers? Individuals and communities, impatient under her restraints, and reckless of their own salvation, have, it is true, resisted her claim and broken from her authority; but has she, at any time, been faithless to herself? doubted of her priestly powers, or failed to exert them for the salvation of men? powers received from her divine, and transmitted by unfailing succession?

I will not do you the dishonor of intimating, by a single word, the need of an answer to these questions. You know the history of the Church. You have before you the expressive and impressive ordinal of our own branch of it. Hear the preface: "These three orders of the ministry, bishops, priests, and deacons, have ever been in the Church of Christ, and were ever had in such reverend estimation, that no man might presume to execute any of them except he were first called, tried, examined, approved and admitted thereto by lawful authority." Hear the office itself, where it solemnly admonishes the candidate for the priesthood, "to have always in remembrance into how high a dignity, how weighty an office and charge he is called—that is to say, to be a messenger, watchman, and steward of the Lord—to teach and premonish, to feed and provide for the Lord's family; that they may be saved through Christ forever." Surely if such be the dignity and end of the priesthood now, it can have lost none of its apostolic character and force.

3d. But more than this, the gifts and graces first bestowed upon the ministry, show its peculiar and unchanging character,—give it an individuality and distinctness, and prominence, consistent only with a fixed and essential institution. When our blessed Lord was about to enter upon His ministerial office, the Holy Ghost descended upon Him in a bodily shape. When about to send forth his disciples to execute the same office, "He breathed on them and said, Receive ye the Holy Ghost." Now this extraordinary communication had doubtless a two-fold object, First, to set apart and qualify for the holy ministry—to elevate a peculiar grade—to fit for a peculiar work: and hence to give a stamp of divinity and authority not to be effaced; to infuse into the office a high and abiding life, and to invest it with a sacramental dignity and power. Secondly, to entrust to this office gifts for sinful men—to impart to Christ's stewards "the manifold grace of God." The gifts, which the Divine Head of the Church, at His ascension "received for men," were,

as St. Paul represents, to be dispensed to them by the "ministry of reconciliation." Hence, they who first exercised this ministry, claimed to be the channels of such gifts. St. Paul desires to go to Rome, that he "might impart to his converts some spiritual gift;" and speaks of them all as being "partakers of his grace," which really was nothing more or less than the grace of Christ entrusted to him for the penitent and faithful. And this ministry thus endowed, was given to edify the Church—not for a period limited to the age of the Apostles, but "till we all come in the unity of the faith and of the knowledge of the Son of God unto a perfect man."

Upon this principle is it, and upon this alone, (for there is no other that can justify us,) that our branch of the Catholic Church still uses, at the ordination of priests, the language which our blessed Lord used in commissioning the Disciples—"Receive ye the Holy Ghost, for the office and work of a priest in the Church of God; whose sins thou dost remit, they are remitted unto them; and whose sins thou dost retain, they are retained."

When we consider, then, that the commission first given by our Lord embraced the whole world, and reached to the end of time, and that no other commission to minister in holy things has ever been given to His Church—when we consider the end of this ministry towards the children of God—towards the Spouse and Body of Christ—when we reflect that "the one Catholic and Apostolic Church," in whom we profess our Faith, hath ever owned and exercised this ministry—and that for its "office and work" she still, in the most solemn way, asserts her authority from Christ, to impart, in His words, the gift of the Holy Ghost: we dare not doubt that the same priestly power, with which the incarnate Son came invested from the Father, and with which he so solemnly invested His Disciples, still continues for the recovery of sinners—for the perfecting of saints—for the edifying of His Body, the Church.

Our first duty, then, my brethren, is to consider seriously whose ministers we are. If by any earthly power we had been put into our office, then might we safely yield in the fulfilment of it, to earthly authority or influence—might inquire for the will, and be subservient to the tastes, and prejudices, and caprices, of sinful men. But, as God has commissioned and sent us to do His will—put us in trust with "the ministry of reconciliation," for the faithful fulfilment of which, He will make us give account at the judgment of the great day; you will perceive "that it is a very small thing," as St. Paul saith, "to be judged by man's judgment, if we do but keep a good conscience before God." In order to this, we must seek above all things to honor God before the world to whom we are sent—must show our conviction of the dignity and awful solemnity of our trust, by our humility, our meekness, our wisdom, our self-discipline, our deadness to the world, our strict and steady imitation of Him, who clothed us with His authority and breathed upon us His spirit, and left us His bright and spotless example, as the first bishop and shepherd of our souls. To gain this deep sense of the reality and weight of our divine mission, we have need to observe more retirement from the world and more unreserved devotion to God. To stand more aloof from those scenes and influences, which we are called upon to control or resist, and be in close communion with Him, whose authority we represent,—whose will we are sent to do, whose Spirit is our life, and strength and consolation. "The Holy Ghost given us for our office and work," must first make that work effectual upon ourselves; must not only set apart our persons to holy things, but take possession of our thoughts, affections, desires and powers, and appropriate them all in all, their strength, to the ministry of God.

We see then the reason why the Eternal Son, who first took this ministry, so often retired from the society of men, to some "desert place," where by fasting and prayer and divine contemplations, He might teach us, as partakers in His ministry, how to bring ourselves into higher communion with God the Father, throw off more effectually the power of the wicked world, and yield ourselves more unreservedly to His sway.

Our next duty, beloved, is to have ever imprinted on our minds, the end of our ministry towards the children of God—towards the spouse and body of Christ." That it is emphatically "the ministry of reconciliation." That "all things are of God, who hath reconciled us to Himself, by Jesus Christ, and hath committed to us the ministry of reconciliation." That we have received priestly authority from Christ through "Apostolic succession,"—not to lord it over God's people, but to become their servants for Jesus' sake—the divinely appointed instruments of their salvation; to lead them from sin, from condemnation, and death, and "bring them unto Christ, who is our life;" and to watch over them, "watch for their souls as they that must give account." We must make our people feel this—feel that our ministry is a blessing sent from Heaven to them. That we have no more control over it—no more liberty to change it, or suppress its powers, than they themselves have. That it is ordained by God to apply, through the power of the Holy Ghost, the efficacy of Christ's sacrifice for their salvation. Hence that the question of its validity is not a question of non-essentials—nor of mere taste and preference; but one of most vital interest to their souls; identified with their dearest blessings and hopes—interwoven into the very texture of "the truth as it is in Jesus." That instead of a cry for popular preaching, their prayer should be for authoritative preaching and valid sacraments—not for a pleasing speaker, nor an agreeable man; but for "a man of God;" one clothed with the authority and imbued with the spirit of Christ: who has power from Christ to lead them unto Christ—has received of the Holy Ghost to make them partakers of the Holy Ghost—been entrusted with the truth to guide them into all truth—made a steward of the manifold gifts of God, that they may be “furnished unto every good work;” enabled “to perfect holiness in the fear of God.”

But to ensure, beloved brethren, a due recognition of our priestly character from our people, we have only to make them feel its necessity—to turn their attention from our claims to their own wants. The strongest argument for our office, will be urged by a voice within themselves: a voice sent forth from the convictions of an instructed conscience, from a clear view of their baptismal state—of the near relation in which they were placed to God and all holy beings—of the fearful gifts imparted to them—the strict account to be demanded of them: sent forth from an earnest spirit, striving for conformity with God; desiring, above all things, the fellowship of Christ—the power of the Holy Ghost—the guardianship of angels—the perfection of saints, the glories of Heaven. Sent forth from a heart trembling under the condemnation of sin; pierced with a sense of having defiled the temple of the Holy Ghost, crucified the Son of God afresh, and put him to an open shame. Sent forth from an understanding oppressed with the blindness of sin—with the convictions of stupidity and doubt, and delusion, and disorder, brought upon the soul by the power of pride, and envy, and anger, and lust, and covetousness, and gluttony, and sloth, with all their dismal train of consequent corruptions. Sent forth from the depths of the contrite spirit—of the trembling, prostrate soul, in tones of supplicating earnestness—“Sirs, what must I do to be saved? What must I do to inherit eternal life?” “How shall I escape the curse of my broken vows? How propitiate the favor of Him, whose blood I have trampled under foot? How bring back to my wretched, helpless soul, the presence of that Spirit to whose blessed influence I have done such foul despite?”

When this voice, beloved, speaks within our people, then, and not till then, will they be found thanking God for the blessings of our ministry. For then, and not till then, will they discern the depth of their guilt, as unfaithful members of Christ's body—discern how helpless and hopeless is their condition, as neglectors of the grace of baptism and violators of baptismal vows, without the extraordinary mercy which God has provided for them through “the ministry of reconciliation”—perceive the dreadful hazard of that presumption which leads such neglectors and violators to trust for pardon to a vague and general repentance—a repentance not accepted by the representatives of Christ, who alone have charge of the discipline of his Church, or the power to remit and retain sins; that presumption which boldly rushes to the mercy-seat of the temple which the priest himself dare not approach without the priestly sacrifice.

Be it, then, our first care, dear brethren, to place before our people with a distinctness not to be evaded, and an earnestness not to be withstood, their real state “as members of Christ, and temples of the Holy Ghost!” To teach them the true spiritual life, the peculiar danger of sin to the baptised, and the only way of escape from it. Teach them, as the Prayer Book teaches them, the real presence of Christ in the Holy Eucharist—that therein they are made “partakers of His most blessed body and blood;” and how earnest must be the preparation to receive such divine and glorious benefits; and how devoted and self-sacrificing the love that is enkindled by a due sense of them! what prompt and glad renunciation of the world, and what burning zeal for heaven, that love begets! Be it our care to teach them this, in the spirit of our Master and the power of our office, and to teach it till they “mark, learn, and inwardly digest it;” and we shall not find them loth to be led back to the almost forgotten privileges of “the one Catholic and Apostolic Church”—shall no longer see them startled at things as new, which our forefathers cherished for being as old as the Christian faith. No longer see them guilty of irreverence to avoid the charge of superstition—see them shy of obedience, lest they trench upon the office of faith—suspicious of the daily prayers, lest they contract formality—afraid of the weekly communion, lest they lose a due sense of its dignity—shunning, watching, and fasting, and self-mortification, lest they be led to afflict the body for the sin of the soul. In short, we shall no longer see them decry the power of the priesthood for fear of detracting from the honor of Him who gave that power, and commanded its faithful use for His glory and man's salvation. For then there will be a humility shrinking from self—a sense of danger flying to every appointed refuge—an earnestness seizing upon every offered help—a “hungering and thirsting after righteousness,” demanding every divine provision—an obedience fearing the loss of eternal life—a heavenly-mindedness, dreading the influence of the world—a spirit of holiness yearning for the fellowship of God and His saints—a divine charity, “believing all things, hoping all things, enduring all things, and never failing.” Then distrust will give place to confidence—jealousy to hearty goodwill—thanks to reproaches—the “deaf ear” to an open heart—the shyness of servitude to the boldness of true sonship—a contentious reason to an obedient faith—an earth-bound sense to an earnest soaring spirit. Then there will be no fear of man to bring us into a snare—no temptation from without to hide our talent, to withhold our priestly powers; for then the teaching of the Holy Ghost will go before our own—will awaken a conviction of want in our people, that must open our eyes to our stewardship—impel them to a struggle with the enemy that must rebuke our cowardice and call us up to their aid—beget in them a demand to be led onward and upward in the narrow way to eternal life, that cannot fail to prompt us to our work, and inspire us with an awful sense of our responsibility as Priests in the Church of the living God. Bishop Doel.

From Church Papers.

MASSACHUSETTS.

CONFIRMATION.—The Bishop administered this apostolic rite on the Sunday preceding Easter, in the hall occupied by the congregation of Grace Church, Medford. Six persons were confirmed. The address of the Bishop, at the close of the ceremony, was exceedingly impressive.

SOUTH CAROLINA.

We take the following from “the Charleston Gospel Messenger.”

P. E. Society for the Advancement of Christianity in South Carolina.—The 29th Anniversary meeting was held on Tuesday, the day before the meeting of the annual Convention of Diocese, at St. Michael's Church. The Society then assembled at their Library room. The Rev. W. W. Spear, was appointed by the President to preach the sermon next year, and the Rev. J. Hunter his alternate.

CONVENTION OF THE DIOCESE.—The annual session was held February 14th and 15th. The ordinary business alone was transacted. The sermon was by the Rector of St. Paul's, Pendleton, Rev. A. H. Cornish. The members of the Standing Committee were re-elected, and the delegates to the General Convention, excepting one of the lay-delegates. The Hon. R. W. Barnwell was elected. The Convention declined to ask the Bishop to ordain Deacons, under the new Canon.

ORDINATION.—At St. Philip's church on the 2d Sunday in Lent, the stated spring season for this solemn service, James Habersham Elliott was admitted to the Holy Order of Deacons; presented by the Rev. J. B. Campbell—the sermon by the Bishop.

The Bishop's Address is contained in the Gospel Messenger. It is a very interesting one, and discusses several important practical topics to which we shall hereafter recur.

During the year 347 candidates have been confirmed; six deacons and one Presbyter have been ordained. The Bishop, in discharge of his Episcopal duties in South Carolina and Florida, has travelled 6055 miles.

Missionary Intelligence.

DOMESTIC.

DIOCESE OF THE SOUTH-WESTERN MISSIONARY BISHOP.—Bishop Freeman says: “I am very much in want of Missionaries, both in Arkansas and Texas. Four at least in the former and six in the latter. At Austin and San Antonio, Texas, I think five hundred dollars will be raised for a clergyman in each place. At El Dorado, Union County, Arkansas, the sum of four hundred dollars per annum has been subscribed for the same purpose, and in Batesville, two hundred dollars might still be relied on.”

THE CHICKASAW MISSION.

Advices have been received from the Missionary Bishop of the South-West, dated at Little Rock, Arkansas, where he has arrived, after an absence of more than four months, on a visitation through Texas, and other portions of his extensive charge.

From the beginning, the Bishop has manifested a deep interest in the establishment of the above Mission, and again referring to it, he says:

“I do not know what action the Committee may have had upon the subject of the proposed Chickasaw school. Perhaps they have already decided to accept the proposition, and have closed the contract. I wish it may be so.”

APPOINTMENTS.—Rev. H. McVickar, to Marianna, Fa., from November 12, 1848. Rev. Isaac Swart, to Jacksonville, Fa., from Dec. 1, 1848. The Rev. W. P. Saunders, to Monticello, Fa., from Dec. 20, 1848. The Rev. J. W. McCullough D.D., to Jackson, Tenn., from April 1st to October 1st, 1849.

Selections.

HOME:

A BALLAD FOR EVERYBODY.

I foraged all over this joy-dotted earth,
To pick its best nosegay of innocent mirth,
Tied up with the bands of its wisdom and worth,—
And lo! its chief treasure,
Its innermost pleasure,
Was always at home.

I went to the Palace, and there my fair Queen
On the arm of her husband did lovingly lean,
And all the dear babes in their beauty were seen,
In spite of the splendour,
So happy and tender,
For they were at home!

I turn'd to the cottage, and there my poor hind
Lay sick of a fever,—all meekly resign'd,
For O! the good wife was so cheerful and kind,
In spite of all matters,
An Angel in tatters,
And she was at home!

I ask'd a glad mother, just come from the post
With a letter she kiss'd from a far away coast,
What heart-thrilling news had rejoiced her the most,—
And gladness for mourning
Her boy was returning
To love her—at home!

I spoke to the soldiers, and sailors at sea,
Where best in the world would they all of them be?
And hark how they earnestly shouted to me,
With iron hearts throbbing,
And choking and sobbing,—
O land us at home!

I came to the desk where old Commerce grew grey;
And ask'd him what helped him this many a day
In his old smoky room with his ledger to stay?
And it all was the beauty,
The comfort and duty,
That cheer'd him at Home!

I ran to the court, where the sages of law
Were wrangling and jangling at quibble and flaw,—
O wondrous to me was the strife that I saw!
But all that fierce riot
Was calmed by the quiet
That blest them at Home!

I called on the school-boy, poor love-stricken lad,
Who yearned in his loneliness, silent and sad,
For the days when again he should laugh and be glad
With his father and mother,
And sister and brother,
All happy at Home!

I tapp'd at the door of the year-stricken Eld,
Where age, as I thought, had old memories quell'd—
But still all his garrulous fancies outwell'd
Strange old-fashion'd stories
Of gladness and glories
That once were at Home!

I whisper'd the prodigal, wanton and wild,
How chang'd from the heart that you had when a child,
So teachable, noble, and modest, and mild!—
Though Sin had undone him
Thank God that I won him
By looking at Home!

And then when he wept, and vow'd better life,
I hasten'd to snatch him from peril and strife,
By finding him wisely a tender young Wife,—
Whose love should allure him,
And gently secure him,
A convert at Home!

So he that had fled after pleasure so fast,
And still as he ran had its goal overpast,
Found happiness, honour, and blessing at last
In all the kind dealings,
Affections and feelings,
That ripen at Home!

FRAGMENTARY NOTES.

BY THE REV. FRANCIS JACOX, B.A.,

Curate of Wellingborough.

No. I.

SOUTHEY'S “HOLLY-TREE.”

A hard-toiling man was Robert Southey. A willing prisoner within his library, he read and wrote, with pains-taking thoughtfulness too, “from morn till dewy eve.” And, while his larger pieces, in prose and verse, make for him no mean niche in fame's stately temple, many a short lyric endears him to those who never accompanied Madoc in his prolonged journeyings, nor watched the fortunes of Roderick, the last of the Goths, nor unravelled the tangled web of Kehama's curse. Let us pause awhile at one of these lyrics of his—one very characteristic of his style and thought, in which sobered fancy interweaves its tissue with moral sentiment.

“O reader, hast thou ever stood to see
The holly-tree?
The eye, that contemplates it well, perceives
Its glossy leaves
Ordered by an intelligence so wise
As might confound the atheist's sophistries.”

That is to say, there is in the "fabrio" of the holly-tree a grand testimony for natural theology. It stands an eloquent exponent of Bridgewater treatises, without their formal letter-press, and sections, and portentous appendices. Its confirmation presupposes consummate skill in the hand that shaped and reared it, as well as the ideal of beauty, so refreshing to the muser on nature's glories. It is not shut up in private study or public museums, to be discussed only by the erudite, and pondered only by one in ten thousand; but it stands cheerily through the long winter of life's highway; and wayfarers of all ranks and of all ages may stop, if they have the will, beneath its boughs, and read, as Southey suggests, on "its glossy leaves" one of God's own homilies to our world. It is because the atheist wants the will to read aright, that he "Reads to doubt, or reads to scorn;"

not from a lack of instructive matter in this natural volume, stereotyped by no printer of earth, nor needing the revising and correcting of us sons of the soil. Observe the aspect given by Southey to his doctrine hereupon. "Below," says he,

"Below, a circling fence, its leaves are seen,
Wrinkled and keen:
No grazing cattle through their prickly round
Can reach to wound;
But, as they grow where nothing is to fear,
Smooth and unarm'd the pointless leaves appear."

What is this but an iteration of the fine old truth that "God tempers the wind to the shorn lamb?" The same Father in heaven, who provides for earth's suckling the tender care and nurture of loving parents, who provides for the seed-corn its outer covering, and for each order of creatures the means and appliances suitable to its wants, provides also for the leaves of the holly-tree, that are in peril of spoliation, the safeguard, "wrinkled and keen and prickly;" while the upper leaves, out of reach, and so out of such peril, are unmarked by the like panoply. Good is it to sit side by side with a poet who sees and notes these things—a natural theologian, that sends forth reverent glances on the marvels that encompass him, and sees something spiritual in "the meanest flower that blows," when he reflects what it is and whence it came. Good is it to list to the poet that thus continues:

"I love to view these things with curious eyes,
And moralize;
And in this wisdom of the holly-tree
Can emblems see,
Wherewith perchance to make a pleasant rhyme,
One which may profit in the after-time."

And, as he muses, he thinks the tree before him symbolizes what he would wish to be, as well as what he is: another aspect is presented of the twin orders of leaves, the lower so rough and sharply-armed, the higher more innocent and gentle:

"Thus, though abroad perchance I might appear
Harsh and austere,
To those who on my leisure would intrude
Reserved and rude,
Gentle at home amid my friends I'd be,
Like the high leaves upon the holly-tree."

The "might appear" need not, ought not, to involve the really being cynical and exclusive. The poet, a man of much study and pensive mind, was conscious that his bearing among strangers might have in it a dash of austerity; and especially to such strangers as, for the sake of mere lion-hunting, would come trooping to Keswick and prowling about his den. Time was valuable to him, who found a poem to work out, a history to explore, a critique to jot down, or an essay to indite, for every hour of his working-days. Those who are free from such lionizing can hardly conceive the annoyance to which men of earnest genius must be subjected by a series of these persevering intrusions. And what wonder if the royal beast was in outward show, or "might appear," a little surly at such pertinacious stirring-up, and was in fact, afraid of being amiable in semblance, lest it should encourage a prolonged stay, and fresh inroads of inquisitive but mostly light-minded visitants?

But hear him again:

"And should my youth, as youth is apt, I know,
Some harshness show,
All vain asperities I day by day
Would wear away,
Till the smooth temper of my age should be
Like the high leaves upon the holly-tree."

Noble aspiration! Robert Southey, thou didst not gaze vacantly at the subject of thy verse, but with the eye of him who "Sees sermons in stones, and good in every thing."

His desire was that what was forbidding, in his temper, tone, character, might day by day become less and less, giving place to a genial warmth and hallowed tenderness of spirit; that the prickly leaves, edged with their thorny weapons, might be succeeded by an effusion of softer foliage.

There is one sad thought suggested by this image in Southey's life-history. "Ah, he foresaw not," says Gilfillan, "that the high smooth leaves on its top were to be withered and blackened where they grew." His last days were spent in melancholy fashion; for the over-tasked brain had bent beneath the burden of past years, and there was not physical stimulus (enow) left to bid it rally. "What a mournful thing," he once said of Cowper, "that his mental vision was so often obscured!" And ere long his own was overclouded with darkness, thick darkness. Not indeed, as Cowper's, with darkness that might be felt; such as distracted the soul with paroxysms of despair; but with a sombre hue, that spread its mantle far and wide. As one of his biographers tells us, "to the last he retained his old affection for his books." The way into his library he easily found, and thither it was his wont to repair; and he would sit with a black-letter volume open on his lap, gazing on one page for hours, and at times moving his fingers, as if making written extracts. Out of his library he never could find his way without the aid of a guide. . . . After two years of mental incapacity,

"Death came o'er him gently,
As slumber o'er a child."

There was no flashing up of the taper before death, no lucid moment; but during his life he had made the great preparation, and hope illuminated the faces of all who gazed upon him when he died."

Poor Southey! Though the high leaves were thus scared, let us trust that the berry was bright upon the topmost bough.

But this by the way. Let us, in conclusion, observe another aspect in which the poet presents his tree symbolism:

"And as, when all the summer trees are seen
So bright and green,
The holly leaves a sober hue display,
Less bright than they;
But when the bare and wintry woods we see,
What then so cheerful as the holly-tree?"

"So serious should my youth appear among
The thoughtless throng;
So would I seem among the young and gay
More grave than they;
That in my age as cheerful I might be
As the green winter of the holly-tree."

What though the desire and aim here proposed were not fulfilled in Southey's own case, at least in the closing scene of all! That militates not against the soundness of the aim, the excellence of the desire. Other circumstances in his life prevented the fulfilment: excessive toil, the sweat of the brain, had marred the hope of these stanzas. Our part is to admire and imitate the example of his good resolve, a resolve formed when he was yet early in life (1798), and one of which he strove to fulfil the first condition, gravity in youth, whatever may be alleged of the other, cheerfulness in age. As the holly appears dull and dim when Midsummer glare casts sunny radiance on the other trees of the field, but is clad with brightsome green when they are leafless and black, when "icicles hang by the wall," and all around is dreary, so it is the poet's desire to be moderate and thoughtful and foreseeing in life's heyday, that in winter time he may not be sapless, but have enough and to spare. He would avoid young levity, that he may attain mature cheerfulness. He would have some oil in his vessel, as well as feeding his lamp at this present. He would rejoice in his youth, but with trembling: he would cultivate a gladsome spirit, but not at the expense of an abused conscience.

May we enter into the union of simple piety and profound wisdom that may be fairly asserted to underlie these sweet lines on the holly-tree. Our life's winter, reader, is coming on. Are we good husbandmen? Are we taking thought for the morrow, and for the upper boughs?—Church of England Magazine.

REGENERATION IN BAPTISM AN APOSTOLICAL DOCTRINE;

AND A SCRIPTURAL SAFEGUARD AGAINST THE CALVINISTIC ERRORS OF "ELECTION" AND "SPECIAL GRACE."

By John Bird Sumner, D.D., now Lord Archbishop of Canterbury.

With what feelings of confidence can a congregation have recourse to prayer, which has been accustomed to hear, that a decree has already, before the foundation of the world, gone out from God, by which the final destiny of every man is irrevocably doomed; and indeed, that such is the necessary consequence of the undeniable foreknowledge of the Deity? What expectation can they have that "the prayer of a righteous man" shall avail against a decree already issued? How can they hope, that their "prayers shall go up before God?" how coldly must "they make prayer for all men?"

What difficulties must the preacher of decrees be led into, in order to reconcile his doctrine with our Saviour's description of the day of judgment, or with the universal declaration of the Gospel, that this life is a state of trial; or, what is still more to my purpose, with St. Paul's positive assertion, that "God will render unto every man according to his deeds; for there is no respect of persons with God." That this world bears no resemblance to a probationary state, not only follows as an undeniable consequence from the system of decrees, but is professedly avowed by many advocates of that system.

Let no Minister think it a proof of success, or of faithfulness to the Gospel, that he retains one class of his congregation, and disgusts the other; but rather, if such should unhappily be the case, let him examine his conduct with scrupulous anxiety, lest some imprudence, even in the declaration of the truth, some want of conciliation in his performance of the commission intrusted to him, may have deprived him of that blessed reflection and highest consolation, "I take you to record this day, I am pure from the blood of all men." (Acts xx.)

The spirit of these remarks is applicable to other doctrines. Many preachers take to themselves the satisfaction expressed by St. Paul, that he "had not shunned to declare the whole counsel of God," whose manner of declaring it bears very little resemblance to that of the Apostle. But this subject seemed particularly to require them. There is no more common occasion of divisions in a congregation, than the indiscriminate severity with which those are sometimes arraigned, who do not answer the preacher's idea of the regenerate: nor any more frequent or specious error, than the notion that enough cannot be given to Christ or to grace, unless the corruption of human nature be expressed in the strongest terms.

Three rules ought to be observed, in order to treat this subject with practical advantage: first, that we should so preach the corruption of human nature, as to show our absolute dependence upon the atonement of Christ for salvation, and upon the Holy

* Inficari nemo poterit quin præcaverit Deus quem exitum esset habiturus homo antequam ipsum conderet; et ideo præcaverit quia decreto suo sic ordinaret. . . . Ut enim ad ejus sapientiam pertinet omnium quæ futura sunt esse præcium, sic ad potentiam omnia manu suâ regere et moderari.—Calv. Inst. i. 3.

† If mankind are called to salvation at all, they must be called either with or without respect to their future character. That character has no concern whatever with their call, is the universal doctrine of Calvin; therefore they must be called with respect to persons; which St. Paul expressly denies.

Spirit for sanctification: secondly, that we so preach it, as to vindicate the ways of God to man, by proving that he offers a remedy co-extensive with the evil: thirdly, that we so preach it, as to make the hearer understand, that sin, however congenial to the depraved mind, is alike inconsistent with the original innocence of the human race, and with their final destination; inasmuch as they have been "bought with a price," and have become the "sons of God, and joint heirs with Christ," and are expected to "be holy, even as He who hath called them is holy."

The example of St. Paul authorizes us to believe and argue, that God is no such respecter of persons, and that grace sufficient to salvation is denied to none, to whom the offer of salvation is made through faith in Christ Jesus, and who are united to Him in baptism. This is implied without a shadow of doubt, or the slightest intimation that the contrary could be imagined, in every passage of the Epistles which alludes to grace, or exhort the converts to holiness. He leads them to believe that grace is within the reach of all, without reserve or distinction: and that the Spirit "works" in the souls of all, enabling them "to work out their own salvation." His prayers are to the purport that they might grow in grace; might be strengthened, established, comforted by grace: that the good work which had been begun in them might be performed unto the end; but he nowhere insinuates the possibility of grace being refused to any, or not enjoyed by any who had been called to the knowledge of the truth, and had not wilfully renounced this privilege. Language cannot be stronger than the assurance to the Corinthians: "God is faithful, who will not suffer you to be tempted above that ye are able, but will with the temptation make a way to escape, that ye may be able to bear it." His tone to them, and to Timothy, when he is instructing him how to bring over others to the faith, contains a remarkable difference. To the Hebrews he says, "Let us come boldly to the throne of grace, that we may obtain mercy, and find grace to help in time of need;" but of those "that are without," he uses an expression of doubt unknown to him on other occasions; saying, that the "servant of God must in meekness instruct those that oppose themselves; if God peradventure will give them repentance to the acknowledging the truth."

Now, it cannot be alleged that St. Paul had no opportunity of introducing the doctrine of partial grace or particular election to the Churches which he addressed. Many of them had admitted gross errors into their practice; others, as the Galatians, had swerved widely from sound doctrine; many individuals were "unruly, and vain talkers and deceivers, who subverted whole houses, teaching things that they ought not for filthy lucre's sake" (Tit. i. 10, 11.) These corruptions, however, are nowhere attributed to the denial of grace, but always to the abuse or neglect of it. The Corinthians had very imperfectly purged themselves from the immoralities of their heathen state; but how does he reprove them? "Know ye not that your bodies are the members of Christ? know ye not that your body is the temple of the Holy Ghost, which is in you, which ye have of God?" (1 Cor. vi. 16, &c.) This is evidently saying, that the wickedness of the Corinthians was not owing to the denial of grace on the part of God, but to the abuse of it on their own.

Another practical evil of the doctrine of special grace, is the necessity which it implies of some test of God's favour, and of the reconciliation of Christians to him, beyond and subsequent to the covenant of baptism. St. Paul, it has been seen, insists upon the necessity of regeneration: he declares that "the natural man receiveth not the things of God, neither can know them;" he calls the heathen nations "children of wrath," and "sinners of the Gentiles;" he speaks of the "old man as being corrupt according to the deceitful lusts;" in short, he expresses under a variety of terms (Rom. ii. 6, &c.), the assertion of our Saviour, that "except a man be born again, of water and the Spirit, he cannot enter into the kingdom of God." (John iii. 3.)

With equal clearness he intimates, that the Christians he addresses were thus regenerate; as having "put off the old man with its deeds;" and having become the "temple of the Holy Ghost," and "the members of Christ;" as having the "spiritual circumcision," and being buried with Christ in baptism" (Rom. vi. 3; Col. ii. 12); as having "received the spirit of adoption" (Rom. viii. 15); and as "being washed, sanctified, and justified, in the name of the Lord Jesus, and by the Spirit of our God." To the Galatians, "bewitched," as he says they were, "that they should not obey the truth," he still writes, "Ye are all the children of God by faith in Christ Jesus. For, as many of you as have been baptized into Christ, have put on Christ" (Gal. iii. 26). These addresses and exhortations are founded on the principle that the disciples, by their dedication to God in baptism, had been brought into a state of reconciliation with Him, had been admitted to privileges which the Apostle calls on them to improve. On the authority of this example, and of the undeniable practice of the first ages of Christianity, our Church considers baptism as conveying regeneration, instructing us to pray, before baptism, that the infant "may be born again, and made an heir of everlasting salvation;" and to return thanks, after baptism, "that it hath pleased God to regenerate the infant with His Holy Spirit, and receive him for His own child by adoption."

But, on the contrary, if there is a distinction between special and common grace, and none are regenerate but those who receive special grace, and those only receive it who are elect; baptism is evidently no sign of regeneration, since so many after baptism live profane and unholiness, and perish in their sins. Therefore, the preacher of special grace must, consistently with his own principles, lead his hearers to look for some new conversion, and expect some sensible regeneration. This brings him to use language in the highest degree perplexing to an ordinary hearer. To take an example from the same writer [Hopkins], whose only fault is the inconsistency to which he is reduced by his attachment to the system of election:

"The best duties of unregenerate men are no better, in God's account and acceptance, than abomination. There is nothing that such men do, in the whole course of their lives, but at the last day it will be found in God's register-book, among the catalogue of their sins. This man hath prayed so often, and heard so often; made so many prayers, and heard so many sermons, and done many good works; but yet, all this while he was in an unconverted estate: these, therefore, are set down in God's day-book in black; and they are registered among those sins that he must give an account for: not for the substance of the actions themselves, but because they come from rotten principles, that defile the best actions which he can perform."

Suppose this language addressed now, as it was originally, to a congregation dedicated to Christ in Baptism. What would be the feeling of a plain understanding, or a timid conscience, unable to unravel the windings of these secret things, on learning that the sinfulness or innocence of actions does not depend upon their being permitted or forbidden in the revealed law, but on the doer being in a regenerate or unregenerate state at the time when he performs them? How is this fact of regeneracy, upon which no less than eternity depends, to be discovered? The Apostle enumerates the works of the flesh and the fruits of the Spirit; but his test is insufficient, for the two lists are here mixed and confounded. The hearers appeal to the Church, an authorized interpreter of Scripture. The Church acquaints them that they were themselves regenerated, and made the children of grace by the benefit of Baptism; while the preacher evidently treats them as if it were possible they might still be unregenerate.

Happily for our Church, the framers of its rituals took their doctrine from the general tenor and promises of Scripture, and by a providential care extending over a Church so framed, the succeeding believers in Calvin were never allowed to introduce their subtleties into her intelligible and rational formularies. Therefore we are instructed to declare, that those who are devoted to Christ, as infants, by Baptism, are regenerate, i. e., are "accepted of God in the Beloved," and dying "without actual sin, are undoubtedly saved." And therefore we hold that those who grow up, may, or may not, fall from this state of grace; and that those who have fallen may or may not recover, and be finally saved; and therefore that all are to be exhorted to "examine themselves, whether they be in the faith;" to repent and turn to their Saviour if they are not; to labour, if they are, still more after the "inward renewing of their souls day by day."

It is indeed a sufficient confutation of the doctrine of special grace, that it absolutely nullifies the sacrament of Baptism. It reduces it to an empty rite, an external mark of admission into the visible Church, attended with no real grace, and therefore conveying no real benefit, nor advancing a person one step towards salvation. But if Baptism is not accompanied with such an effusion of the Holy Spirit towards the inward renewing of the heart, that the person baptized, who of himself and of his own nature could "do no good thing," by this amendment or regeneration of his nature is enabled to bring forth fruit, "thirty, or sixty, or an hundred fold," and giving "all diligence to make his calling and election sure,"—if the effect, I say, of Baptism is less than this, what becomes of the distinction made by the Baptist, "I indeed baptize with water, but He who comes after me, shall baptize with the Holy Ghost?" What becomes of the example of Christ himself? After His baptism, the descent of the Holy Spirit in a visible form, was surely intended to confirm His followers in a belief that their baptism would confer upon them a similar gift; and besides the washing away of their sins, and the remission of the penalty entailed upon the posterity of Adam, would bestow upon them a power enabling them to fulfil the covenant laws of their religion.

No preacher therefore is authorized, either by our Church, or by St. Paul, to leave a doubt on the minds of his hearers, whether they are within the pale of God's favour; but, on the contrary, is bound to enjoin them to seek "boldly at the throne of grace," for power to confirm their faith, and work out their repentance, and live worthily of their high calling.—Apost. Preaching.

EASTER WEEK.

The services of the Church, in their admirable order, wisely follow a course suited to man's nature. God, in the allotment of His Providence, has ordained for man the alternations of joy and sorrow. These vicissitudes have a salutary influence upon the heart and mind. The waters of life, as with the material element, grow stagnant in the calm of a changeless state.

In harmony with the Divine arrangement to meet this necessity, the Church appoints her changing seasons to call forth the different emotions of the Christian heart. As God permits not our present life to be a season either of interrupted joy or sorrow, so the Church allows us not to make of time either a continual Festival or Fast. With a merciful distribution, the days of gladness far exceed those of sorrow.

Having passed through the brief Lenten Fast, Easter ushers in a bright array of Festivals. This has ever been regarded as the leader of the glorious train of happy celebrations. The memories, which it recalls, crown our earthly joys with hopes that cannot be affected by "the changes and chances of this mortal life." With the light of this glorious truth, which we celebrate not only in a yearly but in a weekly Festival, the deepest shadows which darken our mortal path are dispersed, and life and immortality shine forth from the darkness of the grave.

But we should remember, amid our rejoicing, that solemn season which precedes the Easter Festival. And if we have not duly improved this period of humiliation, we are not prepared now to "rejoice with joy unspeakable and full of glory." Unless the services of Lent produce deep and lasting impressions, whose salutary influence continues to exert its restraining power over our hearts, then those fearful words would have a sad application coming from our lips—"what profit is it that we have kept His ordinances, and that we have walked mournfully before the LORD of hosts?" Our Easter joy should spring from the consciousness of having duly improved the season which, like the reviving breath of Spring, cherishes the growth of our holier affections and nobler desires.

It is to be feared that some, who are led to refrain, during this season, from their usual indulgence in the vanities of life, return with new devotion to worldly things. Surely this is not obeying the wise direction of that counsel of St. Paul, adopted most appropriately as part of our Easter Anthem—"Christ our Passover is sacrificed for us; therefore let us keep the feast; not with the old leaven, neither with the leaven of malice and wickedness; but with the unleavened bread of sincerity and truth." It should be our most earnest effort so to live in the strength of that additional grace, which the more frequent use of the means offered in Lent has given, that we may declare the power of Christ's death and resurrection, manifest in our being "dead indeed unto sin, but alive unto God through Jesus Christ our Lord." The proper manifestation of this newness of life is thus declared—"If ye then be risen with Christ, seek those things which are above, where Christ sitteth on the right hand of God." We are to arise from the death and corruption of our present state, that we may share in the future glories of that resurrection which is the subject of our Easter celebration.

PROPINQUITY.

We remember seeing, in some of our papers, an account of a Virginia Postmaster who was much distressed by the charge of "propinquity." His post-office happened to be very near another and the Department resolved to discontinue it. Official communications are, sometimes, very brief. So in this case, the notice, after stating the facts of discontinuance, merely added "because of propinquity." The distressed post-master immediately responded that he cared little about the office, but he was grieved, beyond measure, at the cause assigned. He was an honest and respectable man and had never been guilty of such a thing as "propinquity" in his life!

It seems, however, that "propinquity," which in post-offices is only a misfortune, in Theological Seminaries becomes a fault. The Calendar speaks of "Romanizing" as an evil "infecting the neighbourhood of our General Theological Seminary," intending merely to make a geographical or topographical use of the Seminary. It might be understood, indeed, as a compliment to that institution. Longitude and latitude are generally reckoned from the principal city in a country, so it was giving the Seminary no little distinction, to make it the point by which to determine a Theological locality. But the Calendar's object is at once misinterpreted, and because "Romanizing" is "infecting the neighborhood," the Seminary is forthwith charged with "propinquity" and a cry is at once raised against it!

We refer to this matter again, because we wish to forestall any remarks which our last article may call forth. The points we wished to assert were these. In the first place, we thought it unjust to Bishop Brownell to make him responsible for an article published in a Journal of which he is not editor. In the second place, we considered it unjust to the Calendar, that other papers should so pervert its meaning as to direct the whole force of its article against the Seminary. In the third place, we deemed it unjust in the Calendar to bring in the Seminary at all, as we know that very few of the Students attend Churches in "the neighborhood." And we are quite sure that very little influence, if any, is exerted upon the Students, "through young men." In justice to the Banner, we are compelled to say that had we seen the letter, which appeared in the last Calendar, we would have let "the NEIGHBORHOOD of the Seminary" take care of itself. We were pained by that letter, because we knew it misrepresents both the temper and true position of its author, and exposes him to grave misconceptions. In opposing such views, as appear there to be defended, the Banner will be found, when the occasion presents itself, as firm and decided as the Calendar can wish. But then, we will never take an ambiguous course to reach a direct and honest purpose. We will never walk through the grounds of the Seminary, which are regarded as a sort of "Common" in the Church, to get into a Diocese and into a Parish where we have no right to intrude. In a word we will not unjustly expose the Seminary even to the charge of "propinquity."

APPROPRIATE GIFT.—We have seen a beautiful silver communion set for the Floating Chapel, presented by a lady of St. Stephen's church. It was made under the direction of the Rev. Dr. Ducachet, and is very rich and massive, as well as very chaste in design. The Set consists of a large Flagon, two Cups, a Paten, and two plates. Each piece bears, on one side the sacred initials I. H. S. and a cross, and on the other an inscription with the donor's name, &c. The Flagon bears also the appropriate text, "the abundance of the Sea shall be converted unto Thee." Such gifts are the appropriate offerings of Christian devotion, meet testimonies of our love to Him, who gave His body to be broken, and His blood to be poured out for our salvation.

The Editor of the TRUE CATHOLIC gives the following remarks upon the past year, to the readers of that able periodical:—

"We are called, agreeably to our annual custom, to address to our readers, for the sixth time, a few remarks upon the events of the past year. The world has been even more than ordinarily disturbed during that period. Thrones and dominions have been cast down, and others shaken; a spirit of change and of insubordination has been abroad, and Christians have been called upon to look upon contests, in which they could not very heartily sympathize with either party. Among these wonderful events, the most remarkable, both in itself and in the suddenness and unexpectedness of its coming, is the overthrow of the temporal power of the Pope. We have had occasion, in the course of our labors, to explain the view which we have taken of this event, and of its probable consequences to the spiritual power of the Pope, and the condition of that Church which acknowledges him as her head. Whether these views are sound or not, it is certain, that the Roman Revolution must have the important consequence of testing whether the spiritual power of the Pope can stand alone. If it can, it will not be a conclusive argument in its favor, but if it cannot, the question is settled; Romanism is not founded upon the rock, against which the gates of hell shall not prevail, but upon circumstances in the position of the outward world. It will follow that Romanism is not Catholic truth, that the Church of Rome is not the Catholic Church.

In England the connexion between Church and State daily grows weaker, and, in our opinion, draws to an end. Neither party are, however, in a hurry for the consummation. The clergy see before them a mass of work, which they are called to do, they see that it exceeds their strength, and that all the means that they can bring to bear, are insufficient for their objects. They know that a dissolution of connexion with the State would diminish their means; especially if the State should avail itself of the dissolution to take away the endowments which the State never gave, but the right to regulate which she has unwarrantably assumed. But even if this were not done, the Church rates afford an important aid in the expenditures of the Church, and, doubtless, large sums of money are given by individuals to the Church, who would find some other mode of disposing of them were there no established Church. Then, to pass from the condition of an establishment to that of an unestablished Church is to enter upon a new state of things, of which the English clergy have no experience, and for which they do not suppose themselves, by any means, well fitted. The State, on her part, avails herself of the fiction of the alliance to use the Church, her revenues, her authority, and every thing belonging to her for the purposes of the government. The present race of English Statesmen believe nothing of the alliance, they have adopted the theory of Arnold, that the Church and the State are the same thing, that the State is the true Church, and the Clergy only another sort of State functionaries, whom the law requires to be ordained by a bishop. To the bishop the law allows a discretion as to whom he will ordain, which the same law might take away, as it has attempted to do in the case of the consecration of bishops. They have no conception that the Church is a body independent of the State, any more than that the army is such a body. Of course the Church is, in their estimation, like the army, a body to be moulded at the will of the State, and there can be no such thing as an alliance. But the clergy fancy that there is, and moreover, they are unwilling to dissolve it; so the statesmen use the fiction as a means of binding the Churchmen, while they themselves perform no part of its stipulations, take the full benefit of them, and when they want more, make laws to give themselves what they want.

In our Church the year has not been an eventful one. It has, in fact, been more quiet and tranquil, than any which has passed over us for a long period; more so than we had ever hoped to see in our time. The differences of opinion among us are not however changed; but men have seen that strife and contention are not the most available modes of disseminating opinions. This change has, no doubt, been brought about by the agency of the HOLY SPIRIT, Who has mercifully inclined our hearts to peace and kindness towards each other. May He continue to shed His benign influences upon us, and may we yield our hearts to those influences in sincerity and truth. With this prayer, the best which we could possibly put up, for our readers and ourselves, we conclude this annual address.

THE TRUE CATHOLIC.—This admirable periodical preserves, with singular consistency, its character as one of the soundest and ablest of our Church Publications. The number for April contains a very excellent article on "Sectarianism." The account of "Church Affairs," is a very full and succinct digest of late transactions, accompanied with discriminating and judicious remarks. We wish this periodical most heartily all the success it deserves, and that is wishing it much good.

A FEW DAYS AT NASHOTAH.—This is a republication, in handsome pamphlet form, of letters which were copied in the Banner. The following is the preface to these interesting letters:

"The three following letters were written at Mackinaw, in August, 1847, shortly after my return from spending 'a few days at Nashotah.' Their object was to correct certain erroneous views of the Institution, which were current among Churchmen. They were sent to The Calendar, and from thence copied by the editors into other Church papers. I supposed that then their work was accomplished, and they would pass into oblivion with other newspaper articles. During the past year, however, inquiries have so often been made for them by those wishing information on this subject, that the friends of Nashotah have urgently requested their reprint in a pamphlet form for circulation, and I feel it a duty to acquiesce in their judgment on this point. I have also added my name, that any responsibility for the statements made, might rest upon me.

It was first intended to rewrite the articles, and interweave an account of the present state of the mission, but upon reading them over, I find it would be impossible to do so. A few notes, therefore, have been added, (enclosed in brackets,) while in an appendix the progress of the institution for the last eighteen months is given, and also the changes which have been made in its organization.

W. INGRAHAM KIP."

Albany, March, 1849.

We give the Appendix, which has been added, in another part of our paper. We hope it may help to stir up old friends, and raise up new, for this noble Missionary Institution.

NEW YORK ECCLESIOLOGIST. No. IV.—This number contains a great amount of useful and valuable information upon subjects connected with Church Architecture. The following is a list of the articles.

THE PHILOSOPHY OF RELIGION.—By J. D. Morell, A. M., Author of "the History of Modern Philosophy."

This is a handsome work, published by the Messrs. Appletons, in New York and Philadelphia. We shall notice it more fully hereafter.

From Late English Papers.

The English Church Papers are much occupied with discussions of the cases of Messrs. Shore and Gorham versus the Bishop of Exeter. The former has been arrested and imprisoned for preaching in a dissenting Chapel.

"On Monday morning a large meeting of the friends of 'religious liberty' was held at Exeter Hall, to adopt certain measures in consequence of the imprisonment of the Rev. James Shore, M. A., by the Bishop of Exeter. The Rev. Edward Craig, M. A., (a Clergyman of the Church of England,) Minister of St. James's Chapel, Pentonville, was in the Chair. Mr. Thomas Binney moved a resolution denunciatory of the Bishop's proceedings, expressive of sympathy with Mr. Shore, and pledging the Nonconformists of England to use their best exertions to obtain an alteration in the ecclesiastical law. The resolution having been seconded by Lieutenant Blackmore, was unanimously adopted. A letter was read from Sir Culling Eardley, enclosing 20*l.*, towards the fund for taking up Mr. Shore's case; and 10*l.* was sent by the Hon. Charlotte Thompson, sister of the Hon. and Rev. Baptist Noel. The Rev. E. Craig, Minister of St. James's Chapel, Pentonville, and Mr. R. Ainslie, of the Congregational Board of Education, were elected secretaries; and it was announced that a great aggregate meeting would be held in Exeter Hall.

The Scottish Court of Sessions has given a decision adverse to the Bishop of Aberdeen, for his action in the case of Sir William Dunbar, who, by the decree of a Diocesan Synod, was removed from the ministry for his schismatical conduct. The Bishop has appealed to the House of Lords. "The Morning Post" thus remarks upon this decision.

"The recent decision of the Court of Session—the highest legal tribunal in Scotland—in the case of Sir William Dunbar

v. the Primus of the Scottish Episcopal Church, and which, unless carried to a higher tribunal, must remain the law of that part of Great Britain, is of a nature to arouse very lively alarm, and demands the immediate adoption of some legislative measures of relief. Whatever may have been the error in judgment which the Bishop of Aberdeen may have committed in the mode of his expressing the removal of Sir William Dunbar, one of his Clergy, from the Scottish Episcopal Church, or whatever legal technicalities may not have been complied with, it is evident that the recent deliverance of the Judges of the Court of Session will have the effect of deciding that the Bishops of that communion can henceforth possess no legal spiritual jurisdiction in Scotland.

IRELAND is in a very disturbed state. Accounts from many sources, excite fears that a crisis in the social condition of this country is at hand. The opposing religious and political parties, are assuming every day a more hostile attitude. The following is a specimen of the manner in which those, who call themselves par excellence "the Friends of Ireland," would apply its resources!

On Sunday, a papal rate in aid was collected in Dublin, to relieve Pope Pius IX. from pecuniary embarrassment. The metropolis responded to the call with a liberality which might be called almost prodigal:—

"The calculation was," writes the Times correspondent, "that the grand total would far exceed in amount any of the 'tributes' levied during the late years of the life of Mr. O'Connell, when the popularity of that remarkable man was on the wane, and when people were becoming somewhat tired of the annual appeals to that most sensitive portion of man's apparel—the breeches pocket. A three years' respite, however, has effected wonders, and bank-notes and sovereigns flew about yesterday as though Dublin were a second California, and the mud of the Liffey as full of gold dust as the sands of the Sacramento. Enthusiastic citizens, who, when the 'Liberator' was in the plenitude of his power, flung their guinea, with a 'hurrah for Repeal,' on the plate of the collector, doubled their subscriptions in honour, it must be presumed, of the superior claims of the dethroned Pontiff; while the humble mechanic who at other times emptied his coppers into the same bottomless reservoir in the hope of 'getting back the union,' now freely sported his shilling in obedience to the commands of ecclesiastical authority."

ITALY.

The following official documents have issued, as cotemporaries, from the divided spiritual and temporal authorities of Rome.

ENCYCLICAL LETTER OF THE POPE.—TO OUR VENERABLE BRETHREN, THE PATRIARCHS, PRIMATES, ARCHBISHOPS, AND BISHOPS OF THE WHOLE CATHOLIC UNIVERSE.—The Pope Pius IX., to the Venerable Brethren. Apostolic Salutation and Benediction:—

From the first days when, elevated, without any merit on our part, but by a secret design of Divine Providence, to the chair of the supreme Prince of the Apostles, we took in hand the helm of the entire Church, we were touched with a sovereign consolation, Venerable Brethren, when we learned in what marvellous manner, under the pontificate of our predecessor, Gregory XVI., of venerable memory, an ardent desire had been awakened, throughout the whole Catholic universe, to see it at last decreed by a solemn judgment of the Holy See, that the thrice Holy Mother of God, who is also the tender Mother of us all, the Immaculate Virgin Mary, was conceived without the original stain. This very pious desire is clearly and manifestly attested and demonstrated, by the incessant demands addressed both to our predecessor and to ourselves; and in which the most illustrious Prelates, the most venerable Canonical Chapters, the religious congregations, especially the distinguished order of the Preaching Brothers, have solicited with desire that it should be permitted to add, and to pronounce aloud, in the Holy Liturgy, and especially in the preface to the Mass of the Conception of the blessed Virgin, this word—Immaculate. To these requests, our predecessor and ourselves have yielded with the utmost readiness. It has come to pass, further, Venerable Brethren, that a large number of you have not ceased to address, to our predecessor and ourselves, letters, in which, expressing redoubled wishes and lively solicitations, they have urged us to define as a doctrine of the Catholic Church, that the conception of the blessed Virgin had been immaculate, and absolutely exempt from any soil of original sin. There has not been wanting, also, in our time, men, eminent for genius, virtue, piety, and doctrine, who, in their learned and laborious writings, have cast a light so brilliant upon this subject, and upon this very pious opinion, that many persons are astonished that the Church and the Apostolic See have not yet decreed to the thrice Holy Virgin this honour, which the common piety of believers so ardently desire to see assigned to her by a solemn judgment, and by the authority of that same Church and of that same See. Certainly, these wishes have been singularly agreeable and full of consolation for us, who, from our most tender years, have had nothing more dear or more precious than to honour the blessed Virgin Mary with a particular piety, with a special veneration, and with the inmost devotion of our heart, and to do all which seemed to us capable of contributing to her greater glory and praise, and to the extension of her worship. Also, from the commencement of our Pontificate, we have directed, with much earnestness, our cares and our most serious thoughts, to an object of such high importance, and we have not ceased to raise, to the very good and very great God, humble and fervent prayers that he may deign to enlighten our mind with His celestial grace, and to make us know the determination which we ought to take on this subject. We confide especially in this hope, that the blessed Virgin who has been elevated by the greatness of her merit above all the choirs of angels, to the throne of God,* who has bruised, under the foot of her virtue, the head of the ancient serpent; and who, placed between Christ and the Church,* all full of grace and of mildness, has always snatched the Christian people from the greatest calamities, from the snares and the attacks of their enemies, and has saved them from ruin, [we hope that she] will deign equally to show us that pity and that immense tenderness which are the habitual effusion of her maternal heart, to deliver us, by her instant and all-powerful advocacy before God, from the sad and lamentable misfortunes, the cruel anguish, the pains and the necessities under which we are suffering, to turn away the plagues of the Divine wrath, which afflict us for our sins, to appease and disperse the frightful tempests of evil by which the Church is assailed on all sides, to the immense grief of our soul; and in fine, to change our mourning into joy. For you know perfectly, Venerable Brethren, that the foundation of our confidence is in the thrice Holy Virgin; since it is in her that God has placed the fullness of all good, so that if there is in us any hope, if there is any favour, if there is any salvation, we know that it is from her that we receive it, because this is the will of Him who has willed that we should have all things through Mary.

In consequence, we have chosen some ecclesiastics distinguished by their piety, and well versed in theological studies, and at the same time a certain number of our Venerable Brethren the Cardinals of the Holy Roman Church, illustrious by their virtue, their religion, their wisdom, their prudence, and by the knowledge of divine things; and we have given them the mission to examine with the greatest care, in all respects, this grave subject, according to their prudence and their doctrine, and afterwards to submit to us their advice with all the maturity possible. In this state of things, we have believed it our duty to follow the illustrious steps of our predecessors, and to imitate their example.

It is on this account, Venerable Brethren, that we address to you these letters, by which we excite earnestly your distinguished piety and your episcopal solicitude, and we exhort each of you, according to his judgment, to order and cause to be recited, in his Diocese, public prayers, that the merciful Father of lights may deign to enlighten us with the superior brightness of his holy spirit, and to inspire us with a breath from on high, and that, in an affair of so great importance, we may be able to take the resolution which shall the most contribute to the glory of his holy name, as well as to the praise of the Blessed Virgin, and the profit of the militant Church. We earnestly wish that you should let us know, as promptly as possible, with what devotion your Clergy and the faithful people are animated towards the conception of the Immaculate Virgin, and what is their desire to see the Apostolic See issue a decree on this matter. We desire especially to know, Venerable Brethren, what are, on this subject, the wishes and feelings of your eminent wisdom. And as we have already accorded to the Clergy of Rome the authority to recite a proper canonical office of the Conception of the thrice holy Virgin, composed and printed quite recently, in place of the office which is found in the ordinary breviary, we accord to you also, by the present letters, Venerable Brethren, the right to permit, if you judge it becoming to all the Clergy of your Diocese to recite, freely and lawfully, the same office of the Conception of the thrice holy Virgin, which the Clergy of Rome are actually using, without it being necessary for you to demand this permission from us or from our sacred congregation of rites.

We doubt, in no wise, Venerable Brethren, that your singular piety towards the thrice holy Virgin Mary, will make you yield with the greatest care and the liveliest earnestness to the desires which we express, and that you will hasten to transmit to us in time fitting the answers which we ask. In the meantime receive, as a pledge of all the celestial favours, and above all as a pledge of our good will towards you, the apostolical benediction, which we give from the bottom of our heart, to you Venerable Brethren, as also to all the Clergy, and all the faithful laity confided to your vigilance.

Given at Gaeta, the second day of February, in the year 1849, in the third year of our Pontificate.

ROMAN REPUBLIC.—The following manifesto has been published at Rome:—

"THE ROMAN REPUBLIC TO ALL NATIONS.

"THE CONSTITUENT ASSEMBLY.

"A new nation presents itself to you to solicit and to offer friendly feeling, respect, fraternity. The nation that formerly was the most illustrious on the face of the earth presents itself to you as a new one. But between the ancient grandeur and this resurrection the Papal power stood for upwards of a thousand years. People of Europe, we knew each other when the name of the people of Rome inspired terror; we have known each other when our name excited pity. You may abhor the memory of that age of dominion and violence, but you cannot condemn us to excite for ever the pity of the world. Which of you would wish to be pitied? The people of the Roman State have determined to reform their political constitution, and have created a Republic; and, before this great act of the imprescriptible sovereignty of the people, the past is destroyed and vanishes. The people have willed it. Who is above the people? God alone; but God created the people for liberty. The people have willed it, and they need not seek justification for the past; their reason is anterior to every human act. But, if we turn our eyes to the past, we may with tranquillity contemplate the ruins of the Papal power, much more so than the latter, when it contemplated the ruins of our ancient political greatness. The history of Italy was a tale of sorrow, and a large portion of it was ascribed to the papal power. And, notwithstanding, when the Pope came forward and placed the cross on the national banner, the world saw that the Italians were ready to forget the faults of the Holy See, and the revolution began in the name of a Pope. But that was the touchstone of what a Pope could or could not do. The predecessors of the last Sovereign had been too cautious to attempt the trial, and their power was measured only by the misery entailed upon the people. The last Sovereign was the first to risk the attempt, and wished to stop when he discovered that he had revealed a terrible truth—namely, the impotency of the Papal power to render the Italian nation free, independent, and glorious: he wished to withdraw from the work, but it was too late, for Papacy had judged itself. It is hence that the downfall of Popery has been so near its glory; the glory of the Papal power was the northern light that precedes darkness. We still hoped, but a system of reaction was the answer that came from the Papal power. Reaction fell; the Pope at first dissembled, saw the tranquillity of the people, and fled; and in his flight he bore with him the certainty of exciting civil war; he violated the political constitution, left us without a Government, repelled the messengers of the people, fomented discord, then threw himself into the arms of the most ferocious enemy of Italy, and excommunicated the people! These facts sufficiently show that the Papal sovereignty neither could, nor would, modify itself, and nothing was left but to bear it or destroy it. It was destroyed. If the liberality of Kings, or the toleration of nations, had placed the Papal power in the city of the Scipios and Cæsars, instead of in the heart of France, or on the banks of the Danube or the Thames, was that a reason for depriving the Italians of all the rights common to nations—the country and liberty? And if it be true that the possession of a temporal sovereignty be necessary to the spiritual power of the Pontificate, although it was not on such a condition that Jesus Christ promised immortality to His Church, was Rome then destined to become the patrimony of the Pope, and be so for ever? Rome, the patrimony of a Sovereignty, that to subsist was forced to oppress, and to be glorious was forced to fall? And, as a patrimony of Papacy, was Rome to be the permanent cause of the ruin of Italy? Rome, whose traditions, whose name, nay, whose ruins so loudly speak of liberty and patriotism?—Provoked and abandoned to ourselves, we have effected the revolution without spilling a drop of blood—we have re-edified almost without letting the sound of demolition be heard—we have completely uprooted the sovereignty of the Popes, after having patiently submitted to it for so many ages—not from any hatred of Papacy, but from love for our country. When a revolution has been effected with such morality of purpose and means it is at once proved that this people did not deserve to be under the sway of Papacy, but was worthy of being its own master, worthy of the Republic! It is worthy, therefore, of being admitted into the great family of nations, and of obtaining your friendship and esteem. The Roman Republic will bear the stamp of its origin. It will make a free people defend the religious independence of the Pontiff, to whom the religion of a Republican people will be worth more than a few roods of territory. The Roman Republic proposes to apply the laws on morality and universal charity to the line of conduct it intends to follow, and to the development of its political life.

* St. Greg. Pap. De Expositione, in lib. Regl.

* St. Bernard Serm. in Cap. xii. Apocalyps.

GENERAL INTELLIGENCE.

The condition of Europe seems to bode an approaching general war. We extract the following from the summary of the English Churchman:—

The Continent of Europe is very unsettled; and it is difficult to decide whether the Republican party or the Emperor of Russia is most to be blamed for this sad state of affairs.

France continues quiet internally. The elections commence on the 13th of May, and the Legislative Assembly meets on the 28th of that month. The Deputies are expected to be taken from the Anti-Republican Party. An expedition is fitting out at Toulon, and Marshal Bugeaud has departed to take the command of the army of the Alps. Italian affairs are critical, and the French mean to be prepared for all events.

The King of Holland died on the 17th inst., of inflammation of the lungs. He will be succeeded by his eldest son, William, Prince of Orange. It is reported that the new king will resign in favour of his eldest son, who is only nine years of age. We should not think that a Regency was a desirable thing in the present state of Europe.

In France, confidence continues to prevail, and trade to revive. The trials at Bourges do not excite so much interest as was expected. An expedition is fitting out at Toulon; its destination is Italy. M. Napoleon Bonaparte is going to Madrid to prevent the interference of the Spanish Government in that country.

From Denmark the accounts are warlike. The Germans talk of attacking the Danes, if peace is not proclaimed before the termination of the armistice. The Danes, being supported by Russia and Sweden, are quite ready for war.

From Austria the news is important. The Emperor has dissolved the Diet at Kremsier, and granted a Constitution octroyée to his subjects. It is remarkable for its liberality, but whether it can be a bond of union for so many nations, differing as they do in manners and language, remains to be seen. It is said that Prince Windischgratz is to be removed from the command of the Austrian army in Hungary. High-reaching Jellachich grows circumspect, and has done very little against the Magyars lately. He may suspect that the Austrians are making use of him and his Croats to put down the Magyars, and that then they will endeavour to abolish the liberties of Croatia. He is a man of energy; and, if he finds out that this is the case, we should not be surprised to see him join the Hungarians with all his forces.

It is reported that the Sardinian army has marched to Piacenza to attack the Austrians. The Romans and Tuscans are on the best terms with Charles Albert, and will no doubt assist him as much as they can. The idea of forming Italy into one great empire, including in it the project of expelling the Austrians, is a favourite notion pervading all classes of the people; and there is no doubt that Charles Albert desires to rule that brilliant empire, and will, therefore, put himself at the head of the National movement. The Sicilians have rejected the ultimatum of the King of Naples, with the view of adding their contingent to the general mass. The Austrians will readily conquer the Italians in pitched battles; but it is difficult to retain possession of a country when all classes of the people are against you. Will the Austrian Parliament grant the supplies necessary for such an undertaking? We think not; more especially as they wish to compete with Russia for the mouths of the Danube. We have no doubt, therefore, that eventually Austria will be obliged to abandon her Italian provinces.

The Russians are still pursuing their daring schemes. They are urging on the Danes against the Germans, and the Austrians against the Italians. Their next move will be to make mischief between England and France. If they succeed in this, there will be no longer an obstacle to a Turkish campaign. The Sultan is well aware of their projects, and is doing his utmost to increase the efficiency of his army and navy.

THE BLOOMING OF VIOLETS.

BY THE REV. JAMES GILBORNE LYONS, LL.D.

Ay! cast those gloomy thoughts aside,
The genial Spring is here;
She comes with all her violets
To bless another year:—
Lo, rising at her welcome voice,
They steal in gladness out,
And, wish'd for long, the light warm South
Is harping all about.

By garden walk and rustic fence,
Fair bush and rude gray stone,
They laugh among the leaves and grass,
In starry clusters strown:
Retiring from the gaze of men,
They lurk, a bashful race,
But every breeze, that wanders by,
Reveals their hiding-place.

While, heedless of their own sweet worth,
They quaff the shining dew,
Or catch, from God's eternal arch,
Its deep and stainless blue,
Go, mark thou well the scents and dyes,
To them so freely given,
And own that weak and lowly things
Are yet most loved of Heaven.

Then drop this weary load of care,
Be meekly glad as they,
Nor fear to live on Earth unseen,
To pass unseen away:
Learn thou with joy to stand or fall,
Where sacred duty leads,
And prize, above renown or gold,
Pure faith and holy deeds.

DEAR MR. EDITOR:—

I have been kindly favoured with a copy of a Sermon on "Practical Charity," a "Plea for Missions," preached to the congregation of Trinity Church, Pittsburgh, by the Rector, the Rev. George Upfold, D. D., on Quinquagesima Sunday, February 18, 1849.

This timely and excellent discourse appears to me to be so well adapted to its purpose, and so suitable for other congregations and individuals than those who heard it from the lips of the preacher, that I send to you the following extract from it for publication in your widely circulating journal, if you concur with me in the belief that it may be thereby made more extensively useful.

The stories which it tells of suffering in Missionary life and among the pioneers in preaching the Gospel to the distant and destitute parts of our own land, have their counterparts in many a living herald of the Cross at this moment. But I may not indulge in the remarks which the subject suggests or you will not have room for my extract which is much more to the point than anything I could say would be. I commend it to the reflection of your readers.

A LAYMAN.

EXTRACT.

"There are now in the employ of the Church, ministering in the Domestic Field, embracing the Western, North-western, South-western, and remote Southern States, something like one hundred missionaries; and last week, a missionary sailed for California—now, though so far off, a portion of the same field,—and others are preparing to follow, to introduce there amid the worldliness, and wickedness, and social disorganization, which is said to prevail in that newly acquired territory, the good 'leaven' of the gospel, and impart to the crowds of adventurers more precious treasure than the 'gold that perisheth.' There is already in the same department of missions, a flourishing mission in Wisconsin, among the Indians of the Oneida tribe; and applications have been made to extend the ministrations of the Church to the Chickasaws and other tribes, on the western border of Arkansas, which is deferred solely from the want of funds. The same cause has, I believe, prevented the extension of our services to the miners who have been accustomed to them, on the southern shore of Lake Superior, whence so much wealth is now derived by many of our citizens here, and in other parts of the country.

The field is vast, and every where is 'white unto the harvest.' But 'the laborers are few,' because the limited support, the mere pittance they expect, and without which they cannot labor, is wanting, is not forthcoming. They are willing to live and labor on very little, but they cannot live and labor on nothing. Men are not wanting, zealous, devoted, intelligent, and efficient men; but they need and must have, food and raiment, and shelter. And for these indispensable things, the stipend which those who are already in the field receive at the farthest when it is paid with regularity, which of late it has not been, from a sad deficiency of practical charity among those who are justly counted on to contribute, is barely sufficient. They are accustomed to hardships, and privations, and discomforts; they counted on these before they entered on their work; but they cannot well endure starvation, or what is next to it. Many, if not most of them, have families, and they, too, must eat and drink, and be clothed. And the salaries paid to each—when it is paid—with the most rigid economy, and much and rigorous self-denial, barely suffices for this under ordinary circumstances. What must it be, then, when disease intrudes and claims them for its victims—and lays the father, or the mother, or the children—and sometimes all at once—on a bed of sickness, perhaps for weeks or months together? This is not at all of unfrequent occurrence; nay, in some parts of our new settlements, it is of annual occurrence. I have witnessed such scenes myself; I have heard of others. One of the kind fell under my observation a few years ago, on the Upper Mississippi, which made an impression which will not be readily effaced, so deeply pained was I at the distress and anguish of my sick and suffering brother, as he lay in a close, contracted apartment, amid discomforts and privations, which to me seemed almost unendurable. I witnessed another case on the Lower Ohio. The sufferer, barely convalescent from a protracted illness, in his anxiety about his work and his flock, was preparing to go to church and officiate, when, in one of my occasional wanderings, I providentially arrived, knowing nothing of his indisposition, and relieved him from a duty, in which, had he attempted it, in his then feebleness, he must inevitably have failed. From some appearances I conjectured that his family was not well provided with the necessities of life, and on inquiring I found my conjecture was right. He made no complaint in words. He asked no relief. But in the course of conversation, the truth came out, that his funds were exhausted and he had barely money enough to provide food for a day or two more. I counselled him to trust in Providence, who often, in an unexpected way, supplied our wants. On my return to the steamboat, I mentioned the case to some of my fellow-travellers—some of you, my brethren, were among them—who generously contributed, and enabled me, through a clerical friend, to prove to my poor afflicted brother, that Providence was as good, as unexpectedly good, as I had suggested for his comfort and encouragement, on taking my leave of him. Other cases, I have said, I have heard of. Yes, brethren, frequently I hear of them, and that too, at times, in the way of personal applications for assistance. And I cannot hear of them in any way without pain; without having my tenderest pity excited; without wishing myself the man of wealth I am not, and never expect to be. I cannot but feel for my suffering brethren, whose necessities, whose privations, I know, and to whose fidelity and efficiency in their 'work of faith and labor of love,' I am free to testify. And this must be my excuse for any undue urgency, with which I may seem to press their claims on your attention, and appeal to you for aid.

The work, my brethren, is the work of God. It must be done, for it is His command. It must be done by the agency of the living teacher, in personal ministrations, for that is His appointment. The laborers are in the field, zealously engaged in their work, but they need, and they are 'worthy of their hire.' Others are ready, and prepared to enter on the work; but they cannot work without wages. Where are these to come from? From you, and such as you, who possess in all their fullness and abundance the spiritual privileges, which they possess, or are altogether deprived of. From you, and such as you, who, through the bounty of a beneficent Providence, have the ability to aid in the glorious enterprise, and whom the Christian law of love obliges, and I trust will induce, to give liberally, as God hath blessed you, of your competence or your abundance. The cause is the cause of God. The necessities you are asked to meet and satisfy, are real and urgent. They appeal to sensibilities, which I should be loath for a moment to suppose you did not possess. Having the ability to respond to this appeal, will you refuse? Will you, with affected sympathy, and in soft and silvery accents, pity the distress in words, and yet, in a spirit of selfishness, worldliness, avariciousness, or cold neglect, harshly repel it in deed? Will you tantalize these suppliants with professions of interest and commiseration, contenting yourselves with saying—"Depart in peace, be ye warmed and filled; notwithstanding ye give them not those things which are needful to the body?" Will you lavish your money—your possession, but God's gift, remember!—will you lavish this, on your persons, your dress, your houses, your equipage, your pleasures, your amusements, on mere superfluities and luxuries, on things which perish in the using, and withhold it, or impart it reluctantly, sparingly, parsimoniously, in promoting the glory of God, the cause of religion and the Church, and the spiritual good of your destitute, suffering brethren?

But why do I ask these questions! You know your duty in the premises, and you are too deeply imbued with the spirit of charity and kindness, I trust, to refuse or evade its full discharge. Believing this to be your disposition, and knowing your ability, I leave the matter to your decision, anticipating—may I not?—a favorable response, an answer which will gladden many a sorrowing, fainting, depressed heart, and stimulate to renewed zeal and perseverance many a discouraged, anxious laborer in the vineyard of the Lord.

Yes, I leave the matter to your decision, in the hope and trust that you will so decide as to acquit your consciences in the sight of God, and do credit to yourselves as a Christian congregation; that you will weigh well your ability, and your correspondent responsibility; that if in the estimate of this ability, severally, any of you should err, the error will be on the side of charity and mercy: and that should you, in your present contribution, somewhat exceed your means, and your strict duty, the mistake will neither impoverish nor embarrass you, will neither drain your cup of blessings, nor materially abridge your temporal comforts. May God, with whom are the hearts and affections of men, dispose you to devise and render to his cause, liberal things: 'pour into your hearts that most excellent gift of charity, the very bond of peace and of all virtues,' and induce its abundant practical exercise; and for your bounty bestowed to-day, return to each bosom that blessing 'which maketh rich and addeth no sorrow.' AMEN."

By inserting the following extract from an admirably written work, you may alleviate much misery, by awakening the sick and the healthy to a sense of their reciprocal duties. S.

"There are moments in life, when the various comforts which the researches of science and the arts of luxury have accumulated around us in this comfortable age, may be considered in the light of real and substantial blessings.

Many a sinking, patient sufferer, has found cause to bless the inventions which minister to sensations too exquisitely excited, and to what may be termed the accumulated horrors of the sick-bed and the sick-room, as they existed scarcely half a century ago; but, in spite of this, the unnatural demand upon strength had been made too long for even the perfect relief Angela now enjoyed to ensure immediate recovery, and it was weeks before the tender care and generous hospitality of Miss Grant could restore the strength which over exertion had exhausted.

Complaints of this description, arising from exhaustion of power, are so wearying—require so much time, so much endurance and fortitude upon the part of the sufferers—so much tenderness and indulgence upon that of their nurses, that no disorder more heavily taxes the patience and affection of friends. But both did their part in this instance. Angela spared not any of those virtuous efforts with herself which, in such cases are indispensable to a cure, and Joan none of those innumerable assistances and alleviations which tend so greatly to abridge the period of suffering. Still these nervous disorders are tiresome, wearying things; and woe to those careless and indifferent ones, who, by their negligence, their hard-heartedness, or their unjustifiable exactions of strength, cause them insensibly to fasten upon those dependent upon them.

Easily arrested in their first symptoms, nothing can be more tedious and discouraging than such disorders, when once they have become fixed; and the worst of it is, while the utter helplessness of those thus afflicted makes them miserably dependent upon the tenderness and consideration of every creature around them, there is no class of diseases which so little commands the sympathy of mankind.

Every one agrees that the suffering is dreadful, far exceeding that of severe bodily pain, and yet in almost every case that occurs, there is less care, less attention, less sedulous endeavour to relieve the sufferer, than in any other with which I am acquainted.

That there is no immediate danger to life may be one cause of this indifference. The imagination is enlisted in the cause of danger—of death—while the still more serious apprehension of a continued existence of misery is, in comparison, disregarded.

Partly, perhaps, this indifference arises from the persuasion that the patient ought, and can do much for himself; and this is most certainly the fact; but then it is, on the other hand, equally a fact, that he can do absolutely nothing unless he be assisted by others. There is not a more miserable case of dependence existing than that of the nervous patient.

Painfully affected by slight inconveniences, which to the healthy man are not even perceptible, his sensations excited to that preternatural acuteness which renders those senses, intended only to convey wholesome impressions, the source of perpetual pain: he finds the common stir of life, the mere noise and bustle of ordinary existence, an insupportable source of suffering, and not only of suffering, but of positive injury, by increasing the irritation of the nerve whence all the mischief arises. He is miserably dependent upon the consideration of every body, and at all times: for to him, the ticking of the clock, the church-bell, the footsteps on the stairs, even the birds in the trees, may prove a source of misery, and the very grasshopper a burden. To be a martyr to all these capricious sensations, and to have to plead for mercy to those to whom those very pleadings appear the excess of extravagance, of caprice, of self-will—what a fate! And, worst of all, to know that all the comforts, and luxuries, and indulgences of life, which every body is wanting for themselves, and wishing for, if they could get them, such as travelling without fatigue,—cheerful scenes,—entertaining books—delicate food—delicate lodging—quiet—abstinence from all exertion—amusement,—every thing which a person is ashamed to ask for, afford the only chance of recovery—to know all this, to feel how hateful the patient becomes through that apparent selfishness, bred of the very necessities of his illness—how still more hateful he must become by exacting and demanding those indulgences, if withheld; and yet, that the only chance of his restoration to the common life and sympathy of mankind must arise from such assistance being granted!

The poor heart, wounded by little careless acts of unkindness, probably never intended, but acting with exaggerated force upon sensations so tremulously alive, struggling against all these mental sorrows, while the frame is shaking and trembling, and sinking. And sleep, which offers even to the victim on the rack of pain its sweet restoring intervals of heavenly repose, forsakes the poor exhausted one!

What an accumulation of sufferings! They are faintly and imperfectly described here; but Angela would have had to endure them all in their extremest severity—for nothing equals their severity in cases where these maladies proceed from exhaustion, had she not had the infinite happiness of falling into the hands of such an one as Joan Grant.

That true friend, that wise counsellor, that firm and tender minister to want and suffering!

Neither was there, as I have said, upon her own part, any want of that self-government, those determined exertions, without which, the ministry of the kindest and wisest will be found ineffectual.

Together they triumphed over this terrible attack, and the rescue of this young creature from a long state of hapless incapacity was added to Joan Grant's deeds of mercy for this year.

"Bear ye one another's burdens, and so fulfil the law of Christ."

No one can desire to make others Christians, who is not so himself; and a true Christian cannot but desire it.

Miscellaneous.

From Dr. Kip's Letters on Nashotah.

APPENDIX.

March, 1849.

Eighteen months have passed since the foregoing letters were written, and the Nashotah Mission has therefore been subjected to a still further test of time. Its course, however, has been onward, each month has demonstrated more conclusively the stability of the principles on which it is founded, and enabled it to exert a wider influence for the Church, through all the North West. It will be well, therefore, to mark its progress, and state the points in which changes have taken place.

The principal of these is, the Incorporation of the Mission by Act of the Legislature of Wisconsin. This is a charter fully satisfactory in every particular to the friends of the House. It is endowed with University powers, and every right is secured to it which is necessary for the entire preservation of those distinctive Church principles, to advance which it was established. The Trustees, who cannot exceed seven in number or be less than five, have been appointed, and the whole property of the House has been transferred to their keeping. The Mission itself, in all its departments, is governed by a Faculty, composed of the Bishop and Clerical Members of the House.

The Charter recognizes the following departments as connected with the Mission, viz.: 1. The Divinity School. 2. The College. 3. The Academical Department. 4. The Parish School.

Of these, the Divinity School, which was earliest established, is always to be first and controlling in its influence. To it is committed the entire internal arrangement of the whole community at Nashotah. To its students the Faculty are to look, as those most deeply interested both in spiritual and temporal affairs of the whole Mission. It is not to be, as in most institutions, first the College, and second the Divinity Department, but the latter is to stand first. The principle on which every thing is founded is, that the whole institution is to have no existence apart from the Brotherhood of the Theological Department. When that perishes, it is felt that all the Church can prize at Nashotah, must likewise perish. With the students of this alone, there is manual labor, and a constant home. The members of the other three departments are excused from labor, and are pay scholars. With these, when vacation comes, Nashotah ceases to be a home; but with the first department, its members remain and pursue their labor the more closely, because studies are for a time suspended. It is to be separate too, not only as a department, but in its location. To it will always be attached the Chapel of the House and the Library, and thus all arrangements will tend to show that this is regarded as the most important feature of the Mission. The present number of students is about thirty.

The College will not probably be opened for several years, but the Academical and Primary Schools are already in operation. The latter was begun upon the Mission premises, December 1, 1847. In the first year it averaged forty scholars, and we believe the present number is about sixty. Of these, sixteen are from the lake towns. They board in families living on the Mission premises, and are entirely under the supervision and control of the Faculty. This is looked upon as the nucleus of the Academical Department. The students are under the charge of four of the Lay-brothers, who each spend three or four hours a day in the school, while the professor of languages gives it also his personal oversight. The Rev. President visits it also once a day, remaining an hour for the purpose of teaching the catechism. There are several classes in the school in different grades of religious instruction, the teaching of which is confined entirely to the clerical members of the Institution. So great has been the progress of the scholars in secular learning, that many through the surrounding country who differ from us in faith, send their children, and even submit to the religious teaching.

During the past year the Faculty has been strengthened by the addition of another clerical Professor, who will probably devote his life to the interest of the Mission. Of him, it is only necessary to say, that his thorough scholarship enables him to take the oversight of the department of languages, including the Hebrew; his aid is also rendered in several branches of the theological studies, and particularly in that spiritual training of the students which is to give life and vitality to every thing they acquire.

The course of preparation for the candidateship is intended to be made thoroughly adequate to the mental necessities of one entering upon the study of theology in its various departments; namely, as furnishing the requisite amount of mental discipline, a radical knowledge of the Latin and Greek languages, the primary mathematics, belles-lettres, history, mental and ethical philosophy. The course in this department although limited when compared with the paper course of ordinary colleges, will be adhered to strictly, will be enlarged from time to time, and embraces the most thorough tuition as far as it goes. Every thing has a direct reference to the missionary life.

In the Latin language the studies are these: in addition to a thorough acquaintance with the Grammar, (which is furnished the student in manuscript by the professor in this department, and is illustrated and explained at the black board,) and with the more primary books there are: 1. Cornelius Nepos, entire, rendered into English, and imitations from him in English, rendered into Latin on alternate days. 2. Three books of Cæsar, and the History of Cataline, by Sallust, or in lieu of the latter, the four Catalinarian Orations of Cicero, with frequent translations of English into Latin. 3. In Latin prosody, the Latin Rules of Alvarez committed accurately to memory, and applied in reading three books of Virgil's Eneid. 4. Livy, the first four books, (about two-thirds of the edition commonly used,) analyzed with reference to the construction of Latin sentences, and the use of tenses, and translated at the same time with severe accuracy, and a due attention to the foundation of an English style, which it is believed may be better promoted in this way than any other. The Satires of Horace, entire, with some of the odes, in which particular attention is paid to the metres and scanning. Alvarez's Prosody is continued through this year. Added to this, there are occasional exercises in the writing of original compositions in the Latin language, and once in every month the class spend several hours in the presence of the Professor, when they are furnished with a piece of difficult Latin from one of the old authors, which they are required to translate into English in writing, without any other assistance than a Lexicon, in the way the examination tests are conducted in the English Universities.

In the Greek language the course is equally thorough. The student is required to recite a synopsis of the Grammar, embracing all the usual forms, from beginning to end, at one recitation, before he is allowed to begin translation at all. Then follow, Jacob's Greek Reader, two-thirds, the Cyropedia and Anabasis of Xenophon, six books of the Iliad, and a play of one of the tragic poets. The Greek course, however, is not yet considered as full.

The mathematics are pursued through Euclid, and in English studies, attention is paid to English Grammar and Rhetoric, the Analysis of Pope's Essay on Man, composition of original essays, elocution and extemporaneous speaking. In the natural sciences, natural philosophy and chemistry, with the use of such apparatus as they may be able to procure. In history, Taylor's Manual, with lectures, and in mental and moral science, the excellent Treatises of Abercrombie.

This comprises the preparatory course at present, and considering that every thing here laid down is exacted, it may be regarded as already not much inferior to that of ordinary colleges. The scheme of study thus described, is in actual operation at present, and not merely what is proposed to be done in future.

(To be concluded in our next.)

SATAN'S YOKE.—Sin is a sore burden. Call upon God to help thee, that thou mayest be able to cast it from thee before it lays thee prostrate, and thou art become unable to rise from under it. But 'twere far better thou shouldst make what haste thou canst, and get thee up with thy load to Calvary: for there thou hast but to cast thyself upon thy knees, and it will fall off itself.

SIN.—If we do not call upon God to help us in rooting out our sins, they will root us out of his paradise forever.

USE OF THE TONGUE.—It is quite as easy to recall a word thou hast spoken as to get back a stone thou hast cast among the billows. The word spoken has changed ownership. Be, therefore, "swift to hear and slow to speak."

A CONTRAST.—When innocence stumbles, the wicked rejoice; but the upright humble themselves and pray, and every good angel weeps.

Affliction appears to be the guide to reflection, the teacher of humility, the parent of repentance, the nurse of faith, the strengthener of patience, and the promoter of charity: while of those upon whom affliction is thus sanctified to the purifying of the soul and its improvement in Christian graces; of those who study to convert it, with the blessing of their merciful Father, to their spiritual and eternal welfare, that they "may become partakers of his holiness;" of those who welcome it as the means whereby they may learn "the statutes" of the Lord; of such persons it may be truly affirmed, as the royal psalmist acknowledged of himself, that "it is good for them to be afflicted."—Bishop Mant.

When others are unreasonably cross to us, we little think, 1st, that the Devil works upon and is setting himself against us by their tempers, and that now is the time for conflict and manifold opposition; nor, 2nd, what pity is due to those who are thus influenced by him. Let others be what they will, I must love them at my peril. Why then should I lay the greatest obstacle in the way of it by aggravating their faults, or being forward to suspect any ill of them?

If any man takes a tenth or a fifth part from his stock, to give to the poor, the remainder will be a weightier seed for producing an increase, than if the whole had been untouched. But then this is a delicate affair. To give, chiefly with the expectation of the increase, is traffic, and not charity.

Obituary.

Died, in Edenton, on the 28th day of March,

LIEUT. THOMAS M. WHÉDBEE, late of the Ordnance Department, U. S. A.

Mr. Whédbee was born in this county, and was educated in this place until the time of his going to the Military Academy at West Point, N. Y. He was, as a boy, full of promise, and as such, through the influence of gentlemen of the place, he received the appointment of Cadet; and the high standing which he sustained at West Point fully justified the expectations of his friends. He graduated, with credit to himself, and honor to his native state, receiving an appointment in the Ordnance Department.

All who knew this young man esteemed him for his amiability of character, and high sense of honor; while those who had any degree of intimacy with him saw that in his spiritual state which demanded far greater esteem: and this must bring the greatest consolation to his immediate family, who in him have lost their hope and their pride. He died in the communion of the Catholic Church, in the confidence of a certain faith, in the comfort of a reasonable, religious, and holy hope, in favour with God, and in perfect charity with all the world.

"Let me die the death of the righteous, and let my last end be like his."

LAYING OF A CORNER-STONE.

The corner-stone of what is to be a beautiful and churchly little temple was laid by Bishop Whittingham near the College of St. James, Md., on Easter Monday. It is to be Gothic, with open roof, detached chancel and vestry, and stone porch, and will seat one hundred and seventy-five people. There were present, the Bishop in his robes and the following Clergy of the diocese in their surplices:—the Rev. Jno. B. Kerfoot, President of the College, the Rev. Messrs. Trevett, Adams, Wheat, Lyman and Clarkson. Though the day was dark and rainy there were four or five hundred people present. The procession, consisting of the Building Committee, the Clergy and the Bishop, proceeded from a neighboring farm house to the building.

The appropriate and beautiful service set forth by the Bishop of Maryland, was used on the occasion. The Prayers were read by the Bishop, the Psalter by the Rev. Russell Trevett, the Lesson by the Rev. Theodore B. Lyman, Rector of the Parish, and the list of deposits by the Rev. Robert H. Clarkson, Minister of the congregation.

It was a pleasant holiday for the College. Every one, Students, Professors and Bishop, walked over to the Chapel, nearly two miles distant. Of course they were very proud of it, as it is entirely a College enterprise; an offering of the College for the spiritual good of the neighborhood. All the means necessary for its completion have been raised among the farmers around. Some of them have subscribed very liberally. The name of the Chapel is St. Marks. It is expected that the services will be performed and the pulpit filled by Clergy from the College.

The Church is under contract to be finished before the 15th day of July. The site and stone for building were given by Dr. Maddox, one of the members of the congregation. The address of the Bishop on the laying of the corner-stone was delivered in his usual earnest and fervid manner, and it was fully equal to his great reputation.

WESTERN NEW YORK.

BISHOP DELANCEY'S VISITATION.—On Good Friday, April 6th, Bishop DeLancey held a Confirmation in Trinity Church, Geneva. Prayers were read by the Rev. Dr. Hale and Professor Low, of Geneva College. The sermon was preached by the Rector, the Rev. Mr. Bissell, who also read the Confirmation preface. The Bishop confirmed thirteen persons, to whom he delivered an address.

On April 7th, Easter Even, the Bishop visited St. Paul's Church, Waterloo, to hold a second confirmation in that parish. On this occasion prayers and the confirmation preface were read by the Rector, the Rev. D. H. Macurdy, and the Bishop preached, and confirmed seven persons, making the whole number for the parish confirmed this year to be twenty-eight.

On Easter Sunday, April 8th, the Bishop visited St. Peter's Church, Auburn, where in the morning he preached and administered the Holy Communion, and in the afternoon he preached, and confirmed eleven persons. Prayers were read at both services, by the Rev. Mr. Foote, of Moravia, and the Rev. Mr. Ayrault, the Rector of the Church, who also read the confirmation preface: and both assisted at the Holy Communion in the morning.

ORDINATION.—On the Third Sunday in Lent, at a special ordination holden in Mount Calvary Church, Baltimore, the Rev. John A. Thompson, Deacon, was admitted to the holy order of Priests, by the Bishop of the diocese. After Morning Prayers by the Rev. D. H. Buel, the holy rite of Confirmation was administered to eight persons, to whom the Bishop made an appropriate address. The sermon was preached by the Bishop. The candidate was presented by the Rev. Jacob B. Morss, who with the Rev. A. A. Miller and the Rev. D. H. Buel, united in the imposition of hands. The same clergymen aided the Bishop in the administration of the Holy Communion. —Church Times.

SOCIETY FOR PROPAGATING CHRISTIAN KNOWLEDGE.—The 3d Jubilee or 150th anniversary of this venerable society was celebrated yesterday in St. Paul's Cathedral. This jubilee was held in commemoration of the foundation of the institution by five persons, including the Rev. Dr. Bray, on the 8th March, 1699, since which period it has continued in the active course of labor then begun, assisting schools, aiding the colonies with means of building churches and distributing large quantities of Bibles, Prayer Books, and religious and useful works at home and abroad, 94,000,000 of these having been issued since the year 1733. The Archbishop of Canterbury preached the jubilee sermon, taking his text from Jer. c. 32, v. 24. His Grace's admirable sermon was very distinctly heard, considering the size of the building. The Duke of Cambridge was present; the Archbishop of York and the Bishops of London, St. David's, St. Asaph's, Hereford and Madras also attended. The assemblage of clergy and lay members of the Society, as well as of the public generally, was so large that a considerable number of persons was unable to obtain places in the choir—a proof of the general interest felt in the society and its object. The anthems (Kent) "Blessed be thou, O Lord God"—(Boyce) "Oh! Where shall wisdom be found?" etc., and Handel's magnificent "Hallelujah chorus" were admirably executed. It is due to Mr. Goss, the organist of St. Paul's, and his effective choir, to add, that their services were readily afforded on this interesting occasion. Part consisted of members of the Westminster and Windsor choirs. The collection amounted to 312l. 18s. 6d.—London Times.

ENGLAND.—Subdivision of Parishes.—Lord Ashley, in his recent speech, stated the population of some of the parishes, as follows:—Marylebone, 138,164; Liverpool, 223,003; Stockport, 84,252; Sheffield, 111,099; Bradford, 200,237; Manchester, 353,390; St. Pancras, 140,000. In 14 Churches and Chapels in the last named parish, there was only accommodation for 17,000. The vicar, (Mr. Dale,) was using all his efforts for its subdivision, though much thwarted, and had created already five new districts, and yet a large portion remained undivided. In it there were ten or fifteen thousand children, who are receiving no education whatever. The Clergy of Staffordshire, in a memorial to the Archbishop of Canterbury, of York, and other counties, were warmly in favor of the separation of districts into distinct parishes, as strengthening the hands of the incumbents, conducive to the general interests of the Church, and binding the affections of the laity more firmly to her communion.

JOURNEYS TO THE HOLY LAND.

In the view of accomplishing an object I long had in view from an early period of life, namely, in making a journey to Palestine, the glory of all lands, I encountered many indelible privations and dangers, horrors of plague, and often had occasion to pass along many seas, and was in great jeopardy. It might occupy a volume to describe all the various particulars which occurred; but I shall confine myself at present only to one frightful tempest, which will never be effaced from my mind, and the goodness of that great Being, who ruleth the winds and waves, can speak, and it is done. On this occasion the sky was remarkably serene, and its azure so pure and beautiful, that the stars shone with a brilliancy of which it is impossible to convey an adequate idea to the natives of our humid atmosphere. The striking appearance of the heavens, stretched out as a certain, and that grand army of fixed stars, I shall ever reflect on as one of the most splendid displays of the magnificence of the Creator. Beholding those glorious orbs, as they sparkled in the clear crystal of their spheres, and all the host made by the breath of his mouth, how strongly was I reminded of the sublime language, that, if "stars are not pure in God's sight, how much less man, that is a worm!" Cooped up in a narrow cabin, darkness was on the face of the deep, when the wind, in all probability the "euroclydon" in the inspired volume, freshened into a gale, and anxiety began to prevail lest our provision should be exhausted before completing the voyage. Great were our apprehensions also from seeing water-spouts at a distance—a most wonderful phenomenon, like large pillars, and as it were boiling up with great height. In such a situation, where, it may be asked, is the man who can shun contemplation? Is he not on the wide ocean, tossed to and fro? A plank only is between him and an eternal world, knowing not what a moment may produce: and is not the love of life blended with the fear of death? The captain, a Roman-catholic, assured us he never put to sea without having holy water and images on board, reminding me of the words of the wise man, that "those who prepare to pass through the raging waves call on a piece of wood, made with hands, more rotten than the vessel which carries them." It may be observed that the vessel in which the great champion of the faith, Paul, had embarked, also contained idols. The gale that occurred increased to a mighty tempest. I was, along with others, long shut up in our submarine abode; and one, I shall never forget, was the very personification of despair, and very image of death, calling out, "Is there danger?" when every thing at the moment was smashed, rolling to and fro about the cabin. Every sail of our giddy citadel was furled, the helm lashed, and she was allowed to encounter the pitiless gale under bare poles; the roaring billows rivaling the very heavens themselves in point of altitude. The thunder was terrific, rolling through the vaults of heaven, shaking the feeble masts to the very keel; and the bark frequently appeared enveloped in flames by lightning. Utter confusion took place: despair appeared in the face, and terror in every heart; and all our frightened eyes witnessed the mighty wide-extended deep in all its horrors during this voyage. Afterwards, the gathering darkness; a tempest-driven sky; the creaking of the masts, threatening every instant to fall; the mountain-wave darkly rolling and curling its monstrous head, and loud howling of the bitter blast; clouds and ocean blending; the bark was strained to such an extent as if its ribs were severing; the stammering also of the mariners on deck, reeling to and fro, like drunken men at their wit's end; the howling of the wind, and whistling through the shrouds. A leaking was discovered, and chain-pumps were in full operation: these, added to the tossing to and fro and labouring of the vessel, led to an apprehension every moment she would go down, and be thus buried in the deep. Such are a few things of what occurred on this awful night; when we committed ourselves to that Almighty Power who is not only the confidence of all the ends of the earth, but of those who are afar off on the sea, and mightier than the mighty waves. Let it be added to all this, the stars, those splendid lamps of heaven, as seen between the hurrying clouds, appeared as if driven from their courses; and the surrounding billows, on the unruly element of nature, sparkled with liquid fire, presenting a spectacle of watery hills; and the frail bark groaned in her timbers, as she plunged into the hollow of the waves. All this was a time of feverish excitement, when we were in "jeopardy every hour;" and at last it was concluded we should be hurried into an eternal world, since all circumstances appeared to proclaim the total impossibility of human power to save. Truly has it been said that men who go to sea in ships are shown the wonders of the Lord. In a word, after long suffering for nights and days, he who rides on the wings of the wind, and directs the fury of storms, said, "Peace, be still;" when this tempest ceased, and we reached in safety terra firma, under a tide of joy, grateful to that God who had unfolded his wonders to us on the mighty deep, and in so especial a manner extended his mercy, and thus saving our precious lives. —Dr. Rae Wilson, on Travelling to the Holy Land.

The love of God and man, which is the sum of goodness, and without which nothing is so, is but a sneaking virtue in the eyes of the humanly virtuous and worldly prudent, if not totally disregarded in their account of virtue.

How glorious and happy to say truly in case of injury, "the author of it only hurts me, by hurting himself."

A DAISY,

FROM MY ENGLISH GOD-SON.

Why should this little withered flower,
So scentless, pale, and dry,
Be dearer than the garden's pride,
That captivates the eye?

It has a beauty for the mind,
A fragrance for the heart,
Which Time can no more dissipate,
Than Nature could impart.

A precious little English boy,
My own baptismal child,
An English daisy, sent to me,
Across the waters wild.

And English homes and English hearts,
Through memory's magic power,
And all the blessed English Church,
Live in that little flower.

Riverside, St. Matthew's Day, 1849.

Bishop G. W. Doane

by W. Henshaw

The following extracts are taken from an able article on Dr. Stone's life of Dr. Milnor, in the Church Review for April:—

"In the department of Biography, the literature of our Church in this country has been somewhat copious and rich. The well known Memoirs of Bishops White, Hobart, Ravenscroft, Moore, and Griswold, and those of Bedell, Bayard, and others of the Clergy, while they contain interesting exhibitions of individual characteristics, and afford valuable materials for the ecclesiastical historian, were produced under circumstances which held out no temptation to the writers to conceal or suppress any of those doctrines of faith or principles of polity which they held in common as members and ministers of the same communion. The books referred to present variety in connexion with unity. Their aspects are widely different, arising from the difference of temperament, of feeling, of habits and associations in their respective subjects; and each receive a peculiar tinge or coloring from the like peculiarities in their respective authors. But, after all, it is only such a difference as is found in the features and expression of the human countenance in different individuals, in the varieties of species under the same genus, or in members of the same family. In those biographies we find gradations of Church principles and varieties of religious opinion on doctrinal matters of lesser importance, without any irreconcilable contrariety in what may be justly styled the fundamentals of religion. They thus furnish a beautiful illustration of that catholic and comprehensive feature of the Church, which admits of great diversity of opinion as to circumstantialia, in harmony with entire unity of faith as to essentials.

"A long and intimate acquaintance with the late Dr. Milnor had produced in us a high estimate of his noble properties as a man, in whom the most valuable intellectual powers were sweetly blended with the gentler virtues; as a Christian of transparent sincerity, trustful faith, fervent zeal, and exemplary devotion; as a Pastor, who with wise prudence fully consecrated himself to his Master's service, and, with untiring diligence, labored for the salvation of souls, and the edification of the body of Christ; as a Churchman, strong and intelligent in his attachment to the doctrines, worship, and discipline of the Church at whose altars he served; while with a heart overflowing with charity, he wished 'grace to all those who love our Lord Jesus Christ in sincerity.'

"We could have wished the biography of such a man to be written by one who entirely harmonized with him in his doctrinal views and his religious experience; and that it should have been written under circumstances which left no ground for distrust or doubtfulness whether it gave a representation of his character and principles in their fullness and integrity.

"We say not that these desirable requisites were wanting in the preparation of the volume before us. But it must be evident to every reflecting mind, that an author, in preparing the life of an Episcopal Clergyman, to be submitted to the examination and published under the auspices of a Society* which excludes all that is distinctive in the different forms of evangelical profession, and can feel no greater sympathy with Episcopalianism than with Presbyterianism, Methodism, or Congregationalism, —it is evident, we say, that an author so situated, however anxious to be truthful, must be, however unconsciously, laboring under strong temptation to avoid every topic which may be offensive to his patrons, and also to present his subject in such a light as will render it most agreeable to their prepossessions and prejudices.

"We have no doubt of Dr. Stone's sincere purpose to give an honest and impartial representation of the life and character of that eminent servant of God, whose Memoir he has written. But in reading it, we cannot divest ourselves of the idea that some of its parts have received a coloring from the peculiar views and relations of its author, while other parts have received their precise modification from the embarrassing and trammeling auspices under which it was to be issued.

"The book, on the whole, is creditable to the talent and scholarship of the author. The only drawback to this praise, will be found in a few paragraphs, in which the purity of the composition is injured by an affectation of stateliness, a mistaking of verbiage for strength, a forcing of metaphors, and an inflation of style, which would be much more excusable in one who could shelter himself under the plea of juvenility, than in a gray-haired, venerable Doctor of Divinity. The volume will have a wide circulation,—like every thing which comes from the Tract Society's press. Multitudes of other names will read it with eagerness. And although we could have wished it to have been different in some respects, yet we will hope that it may remove from the minds of many of its readers, their prejudices against a Church which has shown itself capable of forming a Christian so lovely, and a minister so faithful, as the sainted one whose life it records."

"Strange as it may appear, it was in the midst of the political debates and strifes of Congress, and when surrounded by all the fascinations of pleasure, of the pomp of fashion, and the pride of life, so constantly presented in the gay circles of Washington, that the attention of Dr. Milnor was first solemnly fixed upon the great concerns of the soul and eternity; and that was the scene chosen by God's Grace, for effecting in him that great moral revolution which led to an entire change of his destiny and influence in subsequent life. Dr. Stone has favored us with a very minute and graphic sketch of the conversion of his friend. And although no one can read it without deep interest in the developments of gracious operation upon a well-balanced mind, nor without a full conviction of the reality and magnitude of the change, yet one could wish that some things in the narrative had been different, and that the author's theological views had not led him to dwell so exclusively upon what is spiritual and subjective, as to neglect entirely all that is formal and objective in our Holy Religion.

"The transition from the naked, jejune, formless, creedless spiritualities of Quakerism, to the dogmatic Faith, the fixed Worship, the imposing Ceremonies, the solemn Sacraments, the divinely commissioned Ministry, and the stable government of the Protestant Episcopal Church, was a change too great to have taken place in the mind and habits of an intelligent man in mature life, without serious deliberation, and patient inquiry, issuing in a thorough conviction that it was not only expedient, but right. That this great change in his religious connexions should have taken place, (however gradually) in the subject of the memoir before us, without a most careful examination of the points of difference between the two communities, and a resulting ability to state irrefragable reasons in vindication of the conclusion to which he came, is not to be credited for a moment; especially when we reflect that his legal training had accustomed him to the rigid scrutiny of evidence, and to the habit of demanding good reasons in support of every principle he adopted. It is not to be doubted that the same conscientious scrupulousness which he manifested in examining the evidences of Christianity, of the doctrine of future punishment, and other elementary parts of the common faith, also governed him in investigating the grounds upon which the doctrines, discipline, and worship of the Church claimed reverent reception and submission. His life shows the conclusion to which he came; and it would be instructive and gratifying to be informed of the nature of the arguments and the process of reasoning by which the result was attained. But this information, which would be so valuable to the Christian community at large, and which Churchmen had a right to expect in any faithful biography, is sought for in vain in the volume under review. Why is this? Was it a fear of giving offence to those under whose auspices the book was to be published, which led to so sad an omission? Or, were there no documents in existence, no credible testimonies accessible, to throw light upon this interesting portion of the life of a public man, who studied no concealment of his principles and who always lived in the view of the world? We are unwilling to believe that the respected author of this Memoir, would, to please any patrons, connive at a suppressio veri. Yet, it is difficult to persuade ourselves that a series of documents from which so many particulars have been drawn, illustrative of an inward religious change of opinion and feeling, should furnish no materials to vindicate the process of that change in its formal and outward relations—so much more palpable in their character, and more readily apprehended by the generality of mankind. Dr. Milnor, for many years, kept a Diary or Journal; his correspondence was extensive and unreserved, especially after his mind became deeply interested in the subject of religion. The memoir is enriched by copious extracts from both these sources, expressive of his views upon various points of Christian experience and practice. Is it to be supposed that he never, either in his private memoranda, or in letters to his confidential friends, gave some account of his great change of ecclesiastical connexions and habits? Could he have passed through so great a change—one which might otherwise have subjected him to suspicion of levity, or even of mercenary motives—without some statement of reasons which would vindicate his course at the bar of his own conscience and in the estimation of his friends?"

"Dr. Milnor could never, at any period of his life, bring himself to view with favor the peculiar dogmas of Calvinism. This fact seems to have been a cause of annoyance and discomfort to his biographer. Thus we are told of his arguments against Calvinism in interviews with his Presbyterian friend, Bradford; of his abandonment of his temporary attendance upon the Presbyterian Church in Washington square, on account of the frequent exhibition of that system by Dr. Wilson; of his 'fighting with the dogmas of Calvinism'; of 'a concealed effort to justify to himself his cherished dislike of Calvinism'; his 'strenuous warfare against evangelical truth, and Calvinism in particular.' Again, after inserting a letter to Mrs. Milnor, in which her husband dwells upon the great truths of the Gospel, urging her to give her heart to God, and to unite with him in approaching the altar as a devout communicant of the Church, we are told, 'In its introduction, the theology of this letter is still stoutly anti-Calvinistic. Indeed, the writer never became an extreme Calvinist in his creed, though he did cease to wage his strenuous warfare against the system of Calvin; and the style of his subsequent preaching was so highly evangelical, that many considered him, though no controvertist, yet a moderate Calvinist in his views.'

"Now, why these frequent references to the anti-Calvinistic views of Dr. Milnor, sometimes in apologetic strains, as if they would detract from his claims to Evangelicalism; at others, as if to intimate that they were a hindrance to his clear perception of the Gospel scheme of salvation, and to his advancement in experimental godliness; and all of them calculated to leave the impression upon the reader's mind, that it was a thing not to be commended in his character or theology: for if the system of Calvin be not the whole truth, yet moderate Calvinism may rightly be considered as the perfection of truth! Why, we again ask, are these flings, or apologies, whichever they are? Are they to be ascribed to the doctrinal views and affinities of the author, or must they be considered in the light of incense thrown out to please the Publishers of the volume, a majority of whom are disciples of the Genevan School!

"It is true the affectionate and peaceful Milnor had no taste for polemical controversy. He did not plume himself upon running tilts against errorists of any class; nor would he withhold his confidence or his love from any pious Clergyman, who faithfully preached Christ, because he put a Calvinistic or Arminian interpretation upon the Articles. Still, it is not to be denied that 'he never became a Calvinist,' extreme or moderate; and it is equally undeniable, that this circumstance had no unfavorable influence either upon his Christian experience, or his ministerial usefulness. The author of the Memoir admits, that the abandonment of Presbyterian services for those of the Church, 'may have been favorable to his religious hopes, inasmuch as his evidently intense dislike of Calvinistic doctrines was no longer irritated and kept open, like a frequently fretted sore.*' His friends know that his anti-Calvinism was no drawback to his hope and joy as a mature Christian; and all who ever attended his ministrations can bear witness that it formed no obstacle to his preaching, in all its fullness and preciousness, the blessed Gospel of the grace of God.

"Another blemish or defect in Dr. Stone's account of the earlier Christian life of the subject of his Memoir, cannot be passed over in silence, without infidelity to our trust as Christian Reviewers. We refer to the entire absence of all information as to the time when Dr. Milnor 'was made a member of Christ' in Holy Baptism, as to the fact of his ever having been confirmed, or whether he ever enjoyed the benefits of Holy Communion as a Layman. These are items of intelligence which would be expected as matters of deep interest in the life of one Churchman written by another; how marvellous that they should have been omitted in the life of a Minister of the Church, written by a brother Clergyman!

"The author has informed us that Dr. Milnor was 'elected a Vestryman of the parish to which he belonged,' in 1810; that he was one of the Lay Delegates from the Diocese of Pennsylvania to the General Convention of our Church, in 1811; that in 1813, he was admitted as a candidate for Orders, and was ordained Deacon, by Bishop White, in St. James' Church, on Sunday morning, August 14th, 1814. During the greater part of those four years, his mind was deeply exercised upon the momentous concern of his personal salvation; the extracts from his diary and letters, furnish us with an ample record of his reflections and feelings in reference to the 'one thing needful,' which had evidently become, not only the leading, absorbing theme of his contemplation, but the grand, paramount object of his zealous and diligent pursuit. We are favored with a minute, interesting, and instructive narrative of the progress of his conversion, so far as it was an inward work, seen only by the eye of God, and effected by the new-creating energy of His grace. But no mention is made of the Church, its ministrations and ordinances, as having any instrumental agency in the change, or as giving visible manifestation or tangible existence to it, by her divinely appointed signs and seals. So far as the reader is dependent upon information furnished by the biographer, he has no means of ascertaining when this distinguished convert took his stand as a member of the Church, by making the vows of the covenant in Holy Baptism, or renewing them in the rite of Confirmation, or at the Table of the Lord, or whether he ever publicly 'confessed the faith of Christ crucified,' by the reception of either or all of these positive rites. Indeed, it might be inferred, in the absence of any assurance to the contrary, that, up to the very time of his ordination, he continued, substantially, a Quaker, with the exception of attending an Episcopal place of worship.

"Why has Dr. Stone omitted all mention of such important facts in the life of his Christian brother, all allusion to those fixed way-marks in our pilgrimage to heaven! He believes in the propriety and importance of the sacraments, for he frequently administers them. Did he omit speaking of them in connexion with the early Christian experience of the subject of his Memoir, from a fear that he might be suspected of attaching too much value to them? Or, was it from an apprehension that some of his readers would not pronounce the same compliment upon this part of his work, which he pronounced con amore, upon the teaching of Mr. (now Bishop) Kemper! 'Here certainly, was nothing of baptismal regeneration, nor of the notion of justification by the sacraments.'

"We have, of course, no doubt that Dr. Milnor was baptized, confirmed, and admitted to lay communion, long before he was ordained, or even received as a candidate for Orders. Nor do we make any question that, under the pastoral care of such men as good Bishop White, and the youthful but zealous Kemper, he was duly instructed in the nature and design of those ordinances, and carefully prepared for the intelligent and devout reception of them. Certain extracts from his diary and correspondence afford gratifying evidence that he looked upon the positive institutions of our religion, not as matters of mere form and ceremony, but as valuable means of grace; that he attached a high value to the Church of God, and reverently esteemed her services and sacraments as divinely appointed channels of grace and instruments of salvation."

"Immediately after his ordination as Deacon, in 1814, the converted Congressman was appointed one of the Assistant Ministers of the then 'United Churches,' in Philadelphia, Bishop White being Rector of the parish, and the Rev. Dr. Abercrombie, and the Rev. Jackson Kemper, being Assistant Ministers. His native city, where he had grown up to manhood, and where he had been so well known for many years in legal, political, and fashionable life, was a trying field for the commencement of his labors as an ambassador of Christ. But, with the advantages of mature experience, much knowledge of the world, a well furnished mind, and long practice as a public speaker, he sustained himself well; and soon won a reputation in the Pulpit, different in kind, but equal in degree, to that which he had previously enjoyed at the Bar, and in the halls of Legislation. His brief ministry in Philadelphia, was marked with the same fearless exhibition of the great doctrines of the Gospel, the same earnest enforcement of the duties of practical godliness, the same burning love for souls and laborious effort for their salvation, by which it was ever characterized in after-life and in other spheres. It was attended with an important influence in elevating the standard of piety in the parish with which he was specially connected, and in strengthening the cause of truth and godliness in the community at large.

"But Providence designed this man—so strangely and remarkably raised up and qualified, at an important crisis of the Church's history—for an independent cure, and a more extensive field. Accordingly, in the summer of 1816, in less than one year after his admission to the Order of Presbyters, and within two years after his ordination as Deacon, he was transferred to the city of New York; and on the 30th of September, in the same year, he was instituted as Rector of St. George's Church, (vacated by the recent resignation of the Rev. John Kewley, M. D.,) by his old friend and schoolmate, Bishop Hobart.

"From this time, during the thirty years which elapsed before his decease, the Christian and Ministerial life of Dr. Milnor was 'a spectacle to the world,' and surely, in its leading features, and in its noble results, it was a lovely and interesting one. We doubt not that angels, as well as good men, might contemplate it with admiration and delight. Although, owing to peculiar influences and circumstances of the times, seldom called to any of those posts of honor or trust in the gift of the Diocese, to which his age, talents, character and station might have seemed to entitle him; yet, as an humble but venerated Presbyter, he faithfully applied himself to the appropriate duties of his Diocesan relationships. Uniformly respecting Episcopal authority, cheerfully rendering canonical obedience, and earnestly desiring the harmony and prosperity of the body to which he belonged,—but ever ready to vindicate the rights of conscience, and enjoy the freedom which the Church allows, he silently and unofficially exerted an influence which was widely and permanently felt in the affairs of the Diocese."

"But alas! new parties have been thrown up in the boiling cauldron of these troublous times, of other visage, and different temper than those to which the Church had been accustomed in earlier periods of her history. They are emphatically modern; creatures of the fearful day we live in. The one, is of reverent, rather than of reverend aspect; professing to be guided by the lore of dark antiquity, yet composed, for the most part, of unfledged youths, who show their love for ancient Fathers by laughing at the wisdom of their own; and exhibit their regard for Holy Church by questioning the mission, and undervaluing the discipline of that branch of it to which they belong; a class of theological petit-maitres, familiar with costumes and attitudes; more skilled in ecclesiology than in divinity, attaching more importance to a genuflection than to a prayer or a gospel sermon, and spending more thoughts upon the position of a Font, or a credence table, or upon the mode of administering a sacrament, than upon the spiritual import and value of the sacraments themselves. This party may be under the guidance of some wiser and older heads; it may have incorporated in it some more solid and grave materials than the above hasty sketch would indicate; yet the sketch, extravagant though it may be, is sufficiently specific, not to fail of its application.

"In company with this Romeward sprout, there has sprung into being another scion on the opposite side of the tree, and inclining to a contrary direction. A clique of pseudo-evangelicals has presented itself, but has no valid title to the parentage it claims. The old sires never gave birth to such misformed, degenerate sons. They are startled at sounds and practices, which were familiar to our fathers as household words and usages. They know of no evangelicism but what consists in negations—denials of Baptismal grace, the real presence, and the Apostolical succession. They recognize no Body of Christ but that which is invisible, intangible, unreal; no Catholicism but that which comprehends all sects bearing the name of Christian; and admit of no piety but that which exists independently of all aids from Christ through the interposition of any Priesthood or Sacraments.

"While one party expects to benefit the Church by caricaturing her principles and forms, the other looks for the same result by a disguise or suppression of them. To both, the Church may say:

*Non tali auxilio, nec defensoribus istis

"The times need sound heads and warm hearts; men firm in purpose, and vigorous in action; who with lively faith, and cheerful hope, and quenchless love,—unmoved by flattery, and unawed by fear,—will go forth in the power of the Holy Ghost to labor for the salvation of souls, for the edification of the Church, and for the glory of God. The existing evils are to be cured, and the ark of the Lord borne forward, only by His blessing upon the prayers and labors of sound evangelical Churchmen. The Hookers, the Beveridges, the Halls, the Hornes of the Mother Church of England,—and the Whites, the Hobarts, the Griswolds, the Ravenscrofts, the Moores, of our own, must live again in the principles, the prayers, the holy lives, the untiring diligence of their successors in office, and their descendants in the Ministry of every grade. We must have men, who, contented with 'the doctrine of Christ, as this Church hath received the same,' will preach the pure Gospel in its fulness, simplicity, and power—as it is exhibited in our Creeds, Articles, Liturgy, and Homilies. Men who will carefully sustain the Church's Ministry, institutions, and discipline, as divinely appointed means for the preservation of truth and the advancement of holiness upon earth. Men who will reverence the sacraments they administer, not as substitutes for vital piety, but as means of producing and sustaining it in the soul. Men, who, while they consider the religion of the heart to be a priceless gem, believe its value to be increased by the preciousness of the materials in which it is set, and the strength of the casket in which it is preserved. Such are the men (and thank God, they are neither few in number nor feeble in power at the present time) who will enjoy the confidence and meet the wishes of the great majority of all orders in our Communion. Let them be multiplied; let our Theological Seminaries yearly increase their number; then, by God's blessing, all is sure. The body of our Church will be unaffected by the clamors of factions within, and the assaults of enemies from without. Let our sincere prayer be: 'THE LORD GOD BE WITH US, AS HE WAS WITH OUR FATHERS; and then, like Luther in his times of trouble, we may 'sing the forty-sixth Psalm.' 'GOD IS IN THE MIDST OF OUR ZION: THEREFORE SHE SHALL NOT BE MOVED: THE LORD OF HOSTS IS WITH US; THE GOD OF JACOB IS OUR REFUGE.'"

PHENOMENA OF DEATH.

FROM THE ESSAYS OF SIR HENRY HALFORD, M. D., G. C. B.

Whatever be the causes of dissolution, whether sudden violence, or lingering malady, the immediate modes by which death is brought about appear to be but two. In the one, the nervous system is primarily attacked, and there is a sinking, sometimes an instantaneous extinction, of the powers of life; in the other, dissolution is effected by the circulation of the black venous blood in the arteries of the body instead of the red arterial blood. The former is termed death by syncope, or fainting, —the latter, death by asphyxia. In the last mentioned manner of death, when it is the result of disease, the struggle is long protracted, and accompanied by all the visible marks of agony which the imagination associates with the closing scene of life, —the pinched and pallid features, the cold, clammy skin, the up-turned eye, and the heaving, laborious, rattling respiration. Death does not strike all the organs of the body at the same time; some may be said to survive others; and the lungs are among the last to give up the performance of their function and die. As death approaches, they become gradually more and more oppressed; the air-cells are loaded with an increased quantity of the fluid, which naturally lubricates their surfaces; the atmosphere can now no longer come into contact with the minute blood-vessels spread over the air-cells, without first permeating this viscid fluid,—hence the rattle; nor is the contact sufficiently perfect to change the black venous into the red arterial blood; an unprepared fluid consequently issues from the lungs into the heart, and is thence transmitted to every other organ of the body. The brain receives it, its energies appear to be lulled thereby into sleep—generally tranquil sleep—filled with dreams which impel the dying lip to murmur out the names of friends and the occupations and recollections of past life; the peasant "babbles o' green fields," and Napoleon expires amid visions of battle, uttering with his last breath "tete d'armee."

The contrast between the state of the body and that of the mind is often very striking: the struggles of the former are no measure of the emotion of the latter. Indeed, the laborious and convulsive heavings of the chest are wholly automatic, independent of the will,—a part of the mechanism of the body, contrived for its safety, which continues to act when the mind is unconscious of the sufferings of the frame, or is occupied by soothing illusions. No one has described this better than Abernethy.

"Delirium often takes place in consequence of an accident of no very momentous kind,—it may occur without fever, or it may be accompanied with that irritative sympathetic action which is often the 'last stage of all, that closes the sad eventful history' of a compound fracture. Delirium seems to be a very curious affection; in this state a man is quite unconscious of his disease; he will give rational answers to any questions you put to him, when you rouse him, but he relapses into a state of wandering, and his actions correspond with his dreaming. I remember a man with compound fracture in this hospital, whose leg was in a horrible state of sloughing. I have roused him, and said, 'Thomas, what is the matter with you? how do you do?' He would reply, 'Pretty hearty, thank ye; nothing is the matter with me: how do you do?' He then would go on dreaming of one thing or another; I have listened at his bedside, and I am sure his dreams were often of a pleasant kind. He met old acquaintances in his dreams,—people whom he remembered long syne, his former companions, his kindred and relations, and he expressed his delight at seeing them. He would exclaim every now and then,—'That's a good one; well, I never heard a better joke,' and so on. It is a curious circumstance that all consciousness of suffering is thus cut off, as it were, from the body, and it cannot but be regarded as a very benevolent effect of nature's operations that extremity of suffering should thus bring with it its antidote."

Occasionally the last dreams of existence are of a more painful nature;—guilt is delirious with dread,—remorse peoples the fancy with terrific visions—but even these are chequered with scenes of a tranquil, not to say trivial character. The death-bed of Cardinal Beaufort, terribly true, is rare; the mixed feelings and shadowings of past life, exhibited in that of Falstaff, are much more frequent.

The second mode of dissolution is marked by the absence of all corporeal struggle. The mind is left free and unclouded, to the very verge of the grave, save by the influence which the particular malady itself exercises on the current of ideas and feelings. The sufferings of the patient are incidental to the progress of the disease; but the "end of all" is placid, painless, and generally sudden. Death, in these cases, attacks the sentient principle, through the nervous system, as it were, directly. It surprises the sufferer sometimes when sighing for the consummation of life, but believing the term yet distant; sometimes in the midst of plans and schemes which are destined never to be realized. In consumption, and, in general, in diseases which are slow in their progress, this sudden termination of life is as common as that more protracted form, already noticed. It is best exemplified by a death produced by lightning, in which the visible alterations in the frame afford a striking contrast to the ordinary ravages of what is termed disease. The machinery of the body appears nearly perfect, and unscathed, and yet in none of the multitudinous forms of death is the living principle so summarily annihilated. Certain poisons appear to act in a similar manner; and, occasionally, the more important operations of surgery are followed by the like result; for which the genius of John Hunter could find no better explanation than the figurative hypothesis, that the vis medicatrix, conscious that the injury is irreparable, gives up the contest in despair.

Severe injuries inflicted on the great centres of the nervous system, the brain, spine, and stomach, are followed by instantaneous death; of which, pithing or wounding the uppermost part of the spinal-marrow of the bull, in the arena, and the coup de grace, or blow on the stomach of the criminal, whose limbs have been previously broken on the wheel, are well-known examples. Emotions of the mind, especially such as, by their depressing character, exhaust the energies of life, often terminate in this mode of death. The slightest causes, a mere fainting fit, trivial in every other state of the frame, in this may be fatal. It is the euthanasia of a healthy old age, and the termination assigned by nature to a life in which the passions have been controlled, and the energies regulated by the authority of reason and a sense of duty.

Whether we look at the one mode of dissolution or the other, the sting of death is certainly not contained in the physical act of dying. Sir Henry Halford, after forty years' experience, says—

"Of the great number to whom it has been my painful professional duty to have administered in the last hours of their lives, I have sometimes felt surprised that so few have appeared reluctant to go to 'the undiscovered country from whose bourne no traveller returns.' Many, we may easily suppose, have manifested this willingness to die, from an impatience of suffering, or from that passive indifference which is sometimes the result of debility and extreme bodily exhaustion. But I have seen those who have arrived at a fearless contemplation of the future from faith in the doctrine which our religion teaches. Such men were not only calm and supported, but even cheerful in the hour of death; and I never quitted such a sick chamber without a wish that 'my last end might be like theirs.'"

"Some, indeed have clung to life anxiously—painfully; but they were not influenced so much by a love of life for its own sake, as by the distressing prospect of leaving children, dependent upon them, to the mercy of the world, deprived of their parental care, in the pathetic language of Andromache—

Νυν δ' αὖ πολλὰ παθήσει, φίλου ἀπο Πατρὸς ἄμαρτον.

These, indeed, have sometimes wrung my heart.

"And here you will forgive me, perhaps, if I presume to state what appears to me to be the conduct proper to be observed by a physician in withholding, or making his patient acquainted with, his opinion of the probable issue of a malady manifesting mortal symptoms. I own I think it my first duty to protract his life by all practicable means, and to interpose myself between him and every thing which may possibly aggravate his danger. And unless I shall have found him averse from doing what was necessary in aid of my remedies, from a want of a proper sense of his perilous situation, I forbear to step out of the bounds of my province in order to offer any advice which is not necessary to promote his cure. At the same time, I think it indispensable to let his friends know the danger of his case the instant I discover it. An arrangement of his worldly affairs, in which the comfort or unhappiness of those who are to come after him is involved, may be necessary; and a suggestion of his danger, by which the accomplishment of this object is to be attained, naturally induces a contemplation of his more important spiritual concerns, a careful review of his past life, and such sincere sorrow and contrition for what he has done amiss, as justifies our humble hope of his pardon and acceptance hereafter. If friends can do their good offices at a proper time, and under the suggestions of the physician, it is far better that they should undertake them than the medical adviser. They do so without destroying his hopes, for the patient will still believe that he has an appeal to his physician beyond their fears; whereas, if the physician lay open his danger to him, however delicately he may do this, he runs a risk of appearing to pronounce a sentence of condemnation to death, against which there is no appeal—no hope; and, on that account, what is most awful to think of, perhaps the sick man's repentance may be less available.

"But friends may be absent, and nobody near the patient in his extremity, of sufficient influence or pretension to inform him of his dangerous condition. And surely, it is lamentable to think that any human being should leave the world unprepared to meet his Creator and Judge, 'with all his crimes broad blown!' Rather than so, I have departed from my strict professional duty, done that which I would have done by myself, and apprized my patient of the great change he was about to undergo."

"Lord Bacon encourages physicians to make it a part of their art to smooth the bed of death, and to render the departure from life easy, placid, and gentle. This doctrine, so accordant with the best principles of our nature, commended not only by the wisdom of this consummate philosopher, but also by the experience of one of the most judicious and conscientious physicians of modern times (the late Dr. Heberden) was practised with such happy success in the case of our late lamented sovereign, that at the close of his painful disease 'non tam mori videretur (as was said of a Roman emperor) quam dulci et alto sopore exipit.'—p. 89.

"Occasionally, the last scene of life is marked by such strength, such unwaunted vivacity of thought and solemnity of feeling, as led Arætaeus to attribute prophetic power to individuals dying of peculiar maladies—especially of brain fever; the effect of which, when the violence subsides, is, he says, to clear the patient's mind, and render his sensations exquisitely keen. 'He is the first to discover that he is about to die, and announces this to the attendants; he seems to hold converse with the spirits of those departed before him, as if they stood in his presence.'"

Love all mankind so well as to love God only better. Anger, spite, ill-nature, &c., are sure to vex one, viz: the subject. The surest way to keep others in temper, is to keep ourselves so. Love all, help all, condescend to all; but depend upon none.

Serve all with hearty good-will; but know mankind better than to expect much love or gratitude from them. Say all the good you can of all, but if you would have evil spoken of any, turn that office over to the Devil.

FORMS.

A few years ago a writer, who holds a prominent rank, as a leader of one division of Presbyterianism, addressed "a letter to the Evangelical Party in the Episcopal Church." The object of this letter was to show this so-called Party, that the system of the Church was one of Formalism, and that the "high church" theory was so indissolubly connected with the forms which all must use, that the only way of getting rid of the obnoxious doctrines, was to quit at once, the Church whose forms embodied these views.

This opponent of Formalism ventured to take the position, set forth in the following rash assertion—"THAT IT HAS NEVER BEEN POSSIBLE PERMANENTLY TO CONNECT THE RELIGION OF FORMS WITH EVANGELICAL RELIGION." It required but little logic to show the fallacy of such an assertion. There is no body of Christians on earth whose religion, if they have any, is not in some way connected with Forms. Even the respectable Society of Friends, though they have no forms in worship, connect their religious profession, in a measure, with forms in their garments.

The weakness of the appeal, which rested on the above foundation, was shown by the result. We have never heard of a single instance of a seceder who was thus induced to abandon the Church. All who know any thing of her, know well that her's is not "a religion of forms," but a religion wherein the true spirit dwells in the appointed Forms, even as the soul resides in the body which God has created for its habitation.

This long forgotten subject has been recalled by two late publications which seem to us forcible arguments, more forcible because undesigned, in proof of the necessity and importance of Forms for the preservation of a right worship and a true faith. The first of these publications is from the pen of the Rev. Dr. Miller, of Princeton, considered one of the ablest of the champions of Presbyterianism. The Princeton Doctor's testimony is negative, but it is none the less forcible on that account. In a work, which he has recently published, entitled "Frequent Faults in Public Prayer," he has given a most conclusive, though involuntary, argument in favor of prescribed forms of worship. With a force and power, almost cruel from the hands of a friend, this venerable gentleman, wise in these matters from long experience, has given overwhelming testimony concerning the evils which grow out of the vain attempt to banish forms from public worship. In the Banner of April 7th, we gave an extract wherein the Doctor shows from facts, that in praying without forms, there was danger of turning prayer to the Almighty God into a vehicle of fulsome flattery to man! For some additional extracts we are indebted to the Episcopal Recorder, which, in an excellent article, and with most judicious remarks, gives the following catalogue, from Dr. Miller's work, of the evils incident to this kind of worship.

IX. "All expressions of the amatory class ought to be sedulously avoided in the public devotions of the house of God. Those who lead in prayer are sometimes unhappily betrayed into language of this kind. We sometimes, though not very frequently, hear those who are fervent and importunate in prayer, use such expressions as—'dear Jesus'—'sweet Jesus'—'lovely Saviour,' and various other terms of a similar class. All such language, though flowing from earnestness, and dictated by the best of motives, is unhappy, and produces on the minds of the judicious painful impressions.

X. "The practice of indulging in wit, humor, or sarcasm in public prayer, is highly objectionable, and ought never to be allowed. A small specimen of what is intended here will be sufficient.

"It being once intimated to a popular clergyman, who was strongly opposed to the administration of President Jefferson, that his omitting to pray for the President in his public devotions, had been remarked with regret, he came out on the following Sabbath, in his prayer, with a reference to the subject, in something like the following brief and pointed style:—'Lord, look with thy favor upon our public rulers. Bless the President of the United States. Give him wisdom to discharge his important duties aright; for thou knowest he exceedingly needs it.' Another popular preacher, eminently a man of wit, warmly opposed to the administration of the then President, on a day of public humiliation, fasting, and prayer, to which the United States had been called by the President's proclamation, expressed himself in public prayer as follows:—'Almighty

God, who sittest as Governor among the nations, and who rulest over all! we have been called by our chief magistrate to humble ourselves before thee, and to ask for thy gracious interposition in our behalf; but thou knowest he has not called us to this duty, until by his unwise administration he has brought us into a condition which renders aid from above peculiarly desirable and necessary; for vain is the help of man.' One more example shall suffice. An excellent clergyman, of powerful mind and strong feelings, having been deeply impressed by a recent instance of parsimony on the part of a church toward her pastor, in consequence of which his health and comfort had been seriously impaired, prayed, at a church meeting, in the following strain:—'Almighty King of Zion, guard and sustain thine own cause. Protect and strengthen thy ministering servants. Have mercy upon such of thy professing people as have no compassion on laborers in the gospel field, and who seem to be desirous of making the experiment whether they can most speedily destroy their lives by overworking or by starving them.'

"It is earnestly to be hoped that such examples will not be considered as proper for imitation. If they be not profane in their spirit, they are certainly much more adapted to promote profane than devout feelings.

XIII. "Too great familiarity of language in addressing the High and Holy One, is also revolting to pious minds, and ought to be sacredly avoided. There are those who, on the principle of indulging in filial confidence, and a strong faith, address God as they would speak to an equal—claiming the fulfilment of his promises—insisting on the bestowment of what they wish—and, in short, employing without scruple the language of earthly and carnal urgency. This is not in accordance with that deep humility, that profound reverence, and solemn awe, with which suppliants, conscious of unworthiness, ought ever to approach the infinite Majesty of heaven and earth.

XIV. "Further; there is such a thing as expressing unseasonably, and also as carrying to an extreme the professions of humility.

"It is not common, indeed, nor is it easy to take a lower place before the mercy-seat than our demerit as sinners justifies. And yet I think language on this subject has sometimes been employed, which a sound judgment and a correct taste ought to have forbidden. To exemplify my meaning. A warm-hearted and eminently pious minister of our Church, on the occasion of a meeting of one of our Synods, when the Lord's Supper was dispensed, and when it was customary in that ordinance to employ a number of successive tables; the first table being filled entirely with ministers; in the course of the prayer, setting apart the elements, he expressed himself thus:—'O Lord, thou knowest we are most unworthy. Thou knowest there was never gathered round a sacramental table a more polluted, unworthy set of sinners than those now seated before thee.' The good man undoubtedly meant to recognise the idea that to whomsoever much was given, of them should much be required; and that the sins of ministers, in opposition to their light, and their vows and obligations, were to be regarded as inferring more guilt than those of other men. But when he ventured to say in prayer, that no band of communicants was ever more corrupt and vile than those which surrounded that table, the probability is that he went beyond the truth, and, with a good meaning, was chargeable with indulging in pious, certainly in unseasonable extravagance.

XVI. "The want of appropriateness is another fault chargeable on public prayer.

"I once knew a member of one of our Presbyteries, who, when called upon to make the ordaining prayer, at the solemnity of setting apart a minister to the sacred office, went back to the beginning of time; traced the progress of civil and ecclesiastical society; alluded to the various plans of electing and ordaining the officers of the Church all along down through the patriarchal and ceremonial dispensations; and, at length, after tiring out every worshipper with the tediousness of his deduction, he came to the New Testament dispensation, and made about one-quarter part of his inordinately long prayer really adapted to the occasion on which he was called to officiate. During a large part of the time occupied by this prayer, he had his hands, as well as the hands of his fellow-presbyters, pressing on the head of the candidate, to the great discomfort of all.

XVII. "Another fault in public prayer which I have often observed and regretted, is the apparent want of reverence with which it is frequently concluded. It is not easy intelligibly to describe this, in many cases. The thing referred to, is an air and manner, and especially a tone of voice, indicating not only a purpose, and a desire to close, but some degree of haste to be done, manifested by pronouncing the last sentence or two with more rapidity, in a less solemn tone, with less fervor and apparent earnestness than the preceding.

Surely after this, the advocates of Forms in worship may appeal to the Rev. Dr. Miller as a strong champion against those whose prayers are not only "without form" but "void" also, like the disordered elements before the Creating Spirit brooded over the waters.

In addition to this negative testimony, we find a positive argument, in support of the necessity of Forms for the preservation of a true faith, set forth in an able article by the Rev. Dr. Nevin, in the last number of the "Mercersburgh Review." This is contained in a treatise on "The Apostles' Creed," forming the leading article in the second number of this Periodical. The subject of his discourse is thus introduced by the able writer.

"To understand properly the religious significance and value of this most ancient Christian symbol, we must take into consideration, first, its outward history; secondly, its constitution, or inward form; and thirdly, its material structure, or organism. All this may be regarded as forming a proper introduction to the study of its actual contents, the glorious world of truth which it throws open to our contemplation."

In the article before us, he only takes up the first point, the "outward history." Although he does not think that the present form of this creed was of Apostolic origin, he says:

"The old church tradition, as it has passed down to us from the earliest times, is still entitled to our earnest respect; and we may easily see in fact, how with all its changes and variations, the symbol before us may be said to have taken its rise in the very age of the Apostles, and in a certain sense, under their very hands, and to have represented from the beginning, the one unvarying faith of the universal christian world."

* * * * *

"But Irenaeus, and the Church in his time, were perfectly familiar notwithstanding, with the idea of a christian regula fidei or creed, of universal force, and in actual use among all the churches. Still more, this rule was regarded as strictly and truly the Apostles' Creed. It was no product of private opinion, and it stood not at all in articles of convention and agreement adopted by the general christian body. It was accepted everywhere as a system handed down from the Apostles; not merely as supposed to be in the spirit of their teaching, but as carrying forward in the faith of the Church, the very substance and contents of the divine revelation itself, which they were sent to proclaim."

Dr. Nevin asserts the necessary connection between a right form and a true faith, in the following words:

"Faith comes to its proper completion only in the way of utterance; the inward word to be truly real must pass over into the form of an outward word; which becomes thus, at the same time, the bond of union and fellowship with others who have been made to partake of the same grace."

The conclusion of this article so truly sets forth the argument in favor of Forms, and gives so just a history of the sounder feeling and practice, once prevalent among the various denominations, that we must give it, entire, to our readers.

"In this character, it forms the basis of all sound christian profession, in the Protestant Church no less than in the Roman Catholic. In the great religious revolution of the sixteenth century, its credit and authority remained inviolate and unimpaired. The object of the Reformation was, to sweep aside the rubbish which threatened to smother the life of the ancient faith, not by any means to bring this faith itself out of the way. Both divisions of the Protestant Church accordingly, the Lutheran and the Reformed, united in acknowledging the binding authority of the ancient oecumenical symbols, and especially the root of all symbols as found in the Apostles' Creed. They did not pretend to abjure all connection with the past, but professed to build on a foundation already laid, and to carry forward a work already long since begun. In the Lutheran Church, the three primary Creeds, (Apostolical, Nicene and Athanasian,) are made to precede the Augsburg Confession, in the Form of Concord; to show, says Walch, "that Lutherans embrace not a new doctrine, but such as is old and apostolical, and profess thus the truly catholic faith." How fully it lay at the foundation of all christianity with Luther himself, we all know. It was part of his piety, a necessary means of grace with him, he tells us himself, to repeat the Creed with the Lord's Prayer, throughout his life, in the spirit of a little child. His sense of the authority that belongs to the ancient catholic faith altogether, was very earnest and deep. "It is dangerous and terrible," he writes in his memorable letter to Albert of Prussia, "to hear or believe anything, against the united testimony, faith and doctrine of the universal holy christian Church, as held now and from the beginning, for 1500 years, throughout the world." The Creed, of course, occupies a conspicuous place in his catechism. In this, however, we see only an image of the universal Protestant feeling in that age. Every such formula of religious instruction was expected, as a matter of course, to take in the Creed, along with the Lord's Prayer and the Ten Commandments.

The Reformed Church here was of one mind with the Lutheran. Thus in Calvin's Catechism, the first section treats of Faith; which is said to have the sum of its contents in the "formula of confession held in common by all christians; commonly called the Apostles' Creed, and always received from the beginning among the pious; as being either derived from the mouth of the Apostles, or faithfully collected from their writings." After this it is recited and expounded in full. So in the admirable symbol of the Palatinate, the Heidelberg Catechism, "it is the articles of our catholic undoubted christian faith," as comprehended in the same Creed, which are made to underlie the doctrine of salvation from beginning to end. It formed part of the regular church service, in the Reformed liturgies, accompanied their baptisms, and entered into their celebration of the holy eucharist. The Gallican Confession, art. 5, approves the three Creeds, Apostolic, Nicene and Athanasian, as agreeing with the written word of God. "We do willingly receive the three Creeds," it is said in the Belgic Confession, art. 9, "namely, that of the Apostles, of Nice, and of Athanasius; likewise that which is conformable thereunto, is agreed upon by the ancient fathers." In the Helvetic Confession, art. 11, the symbols of the first four general councils, together with that of Athanasius, are cordially approved and professed. The three Creeds are endorsed in the Articles of the Church of England, as worthy of all reception. In the Declaration of Thorn, we are said to be all baptized into the Apostles' Creed, as a compendium of the christian faith: and the Nicene and Constantinopolitan Creeds are taken still farther as a sure interpretation of the same heavenly doctrine, forming thus the common ground on which all who profess Christ, must of necessity come together, and the one firm foundation against which the gates of hell shall never prevail. It is part of the true Protestant faith, undoubtedly, as held by the Reformed Church, no less than the Lutheran, to abide by the ancient christian Creed. Whatever else it may include, it starts from this and rests in it throughout, as its sure and necessary foundation.

It must be acknowledged, however, that the honor thus put upon the Creed in the original Protestant Confessions, has undergone, practically at least, no slight eclipse, in a wide portion of the modern Protestant world. So far as Rationalism has had power in Europe, the authority of the ancient church faith, of course, fell into discredit; and it is felt now by those who seek the revival of pure christianity, that all turns on the power of the Church to intone with full emphasis again, in her public formularies and services, every single article of the symbolum apostolicum, most especially those of the incarnation, the descent into hades, and the resurrection of the body. But the low esteem for the Creed, of which we now speak, has not been confined to Rationalism, technically so styled. We see it widely displayed in other sections also of the Protestant world, which we are accustomed to distinguish as orthodox and evangelical. The other great disease of the Protestant system, the spirit of Sect, shows a striking affinity here, no less than at other points, with the Rationalistic tendency of which it is the natural counterpart. Sects, in proportion as they are sects, that is in the same measure that they lack all sympathy with the idea of the Church, and substitute sectarianism for catholicity, will be found all the world over to have no taste for the Creed. They may possibly extend to it some cold token of respect, as a venerable relic of early christianity; but it has not their heart, falls not in with their habit of christianity, and is admitted to no place of course in their worship, public or private.

More than this, Puritanism, which we do not wish to confound, certainly with Rationalism and the Sect System, although it carries in itself undoubtedly a more direct tendency towards both than can be said to lie in original Protestantism, being in truth, an advance on this, whether for weal or for woe, and such an advance as places it in closer natural proximity to the evils now mentioned; Puritanism, we say, taking the term in the broad sense, to designate a special form of the religious life, which is just as well defined in history as early Protestantism itself, may be said to carry with it this universal character, that it makes no account practically of the Apostles' Creed. The remark is not made here of course in the way of censure or reproach, and ought not to be taken as disrespectful in any way to the system in question. We are dealing simply with the history of the subject; and the fact now stated, is one which no well informed person will pretend to call in question. It matters not that the authority of the Creed may be recognized, in some general way, in this or that old confession still retained in the Church; so far as the Puritan spirit in its modern form is found to prevail in any ecclesiastical body, all actual use of the Creed, and all hearty interest in it, are to the same extent wanting. It is not used, for example, in the religious education of families.—Children, generally, are not made to lay it up in their minds, as the sum and substance of the christian faith. It comes not into view in catechetical instruction; if indeed this itself be still upheld, under any form, in regular use. It is not repeated of course in public worship; the minister who should take upon him any such innovation as that, would be suspected of some secret hankering after Rome. It is not made in any way a rule of christian profession or public teaching. It is quite common, for instance, in Congregationalist churches, to make use of "covenants," or forms of profession and engagement, when members are received into full communion, each congregation varying the form to suit its own taste; but it would be hard to find one among all, that would be content to make use of the Apostles' Creed in this way, or even to be guided by it at all in the construction of its own formulary.* The feeling is, plainly enough, that this old symbol has had its day, and is now antiquated if not absolutely obsolete; that it bears upon it the marks of a rude and imperfect christianity, not without some touch of tendency towards superstition; that the evangelical faith of the present day may be more clearly and satisfactorily expressed, in other schemes and summaries altogether, any one of which, as taken from the Bible and common christian experience, is to be held just as much entitled to honor as that which is thus falsely ascribed to the Apostles. It is felt to be on the whole a loose and careless production; without much plan or method, and governed by no principle in the choice of its articles; introducing some points of no necessary importance, and leaving out several others that should be counted indispensable. One thing is beyond all controversy certain, that if Puritanism were called upon to form a fundamental, universal christian creed, it would fall on something very different from this ancient symbol, both in conception and style. All this, as before said, is noticed here neither in the way of blame nor of praise, but simply as a matter of history which is open to common observation. In this view, however, it is entitled to earnest attention. The fact, in its own nature, is curious. Nor can it easily be allowed to be of only small significance. Such variation from the mind and posture of the ancient Church, in regard to the Creed, implies necessarily a serious variation from the life of primitive christianity in general. The difference between Puritanism and original Protestantism here, argues necessarily a very considerable remove in the whole inward habit and being of the first from the proper spiritual constitution of the second. Such a fact has a right to challenge notice. Whether it be looked upon as right or wrong, an occasion for gratulation or a reason for censure and complaint, it is entitled at all events to earnest consideration, and should if possible be fairly understood and explained.

* A striking exemplification of this independence is furnished in the manufacture of a new confession of faith, a few years since, for the use of the Protestant Armenian Church, lately started, under the auspices of our New England missionaries, in the city of Constantinople. In other ages, the casting of a creed for a whole church has been counted an enterprise of no common size and weight; but here, it was the work of one or two hands only, brought happily to a full conclusion in the course of a few hours! To expedite the business, and guard against all outward bias, the precaution was adopted, we are told, of shutting out from all consultation whatever had been adopted by any part of the Church as of symbolical authority previously, (the primitive foundation Creed of the Oriental Church, of course, along with the rest,) so as to draw the whole by purely original deduction direct from the Bible, as traditionally understood in New England. Not a syllable accordingly does this new confession contain, in recognition of the ancient symbol of universal Christendom. The greatest marvel of all, perhaps, is, that this bold way of going to work in so momentous a case, should be quietly accepted so generally, (by the whole American Board for instance,) as nothing out of the way, a mere matter of course. So, it will be remembered, the late World Convention at London, in undertaking to construct an oecumenical platform for the union of evangelical sects, found it necessary to ignore the Apostles' Creed in full, and brought in a new set of articles altogether of its own invention, as better suited for the purpose.

The force of what is now said will become still more evident when we take into view the interior constitution of the Creed, its rise and structure in the living sphere of faith, to which it primarily and natively belongs."

Our readers will remember that Dr. Miller and Dr. Nevin, represent opposing schools of Presbyterian Theology. They are found, however, uniting in bearing testimony, the one negatively and the other positively, to the necessity of Forms in preserving the solemnity and decorum of worship, and in keeping alive, a true faith upon earth.

THE MOTTO.—We have received the sixth number of this periodical, published at Jubilee College. The delay in the publication of this number is accounted for by the Rt. Rev. Editor most satisfactorily, as follows. We give also the Bishop's account of an unexpected, but timely, donation.

"Some apology ought to be made for the delay in publishing this number of the Motto.

1. It has been chiefly occasioned by the long continuance of a very cold winter; such as has not been till now experienced by the oldest settlers in Illinois. Our printer who is one of the students in the College, and pays his expenses by his faithful labor, we thought, had better continue his studies in his warm chamber than freezing his fingers, when the thermometer out of doors was twelve degrees below Zero.

2. Another reason was the wish to have the next number contain the announcement of the consecration of the Kickapoo church; the finishing of which had been retarded by the very early setting in of the winter.

3. The third reason was the writer wished to give the joyful tidings of the completion of so many devout prayers in the ordination of several candidates for holy orders; thus encouraging our friends to help us still further in the great work of duly preparing laborers whom God might send forth in the vast field now whitening unto harvest in the west. This event having now taken place, we refer the reader, with no little gratitude to God, to the page which contains the facts.

4. The last, though not the least, reason for delay was the desire that if we printed anything it should be the excellent letter of the Rev. Dr. Totten, exhibiting not only the statistics of the pecuniary matters of the College, (as some of its reviewers would have it,) but other things of great importance to be known by the friends of western missions, and especially those which relate to the training of a learned ministry in the good old way of study and close application on the very ground where they would be called to labor. At first it was imagined that this excellent letter might go forth under cover of the Motto and be as one of its numbers. But the space it would require was too great to admit of the publication of other matters which it was desirable should be inserted. So that it was finally resolved to let it stand alone and thus commend itself to the undivided attention of many who might not be well pleased to read so humble a work as 'the Motto.' Thus much by way of apology for delay.

Bishop Chase having received but little from the proposed sale of lands as suggested by Dr. Totten, and having advanced his all of ready money in maintaining the College, feels deeply grieved for the want of the support which he had reason to hope for in having to maintain so many beneficiaries; the deficiency in that fund being now $1782 89. Had this sum been duly paid many a pang would have been spared him; especially in his being obliged to borrow money. Twelve per cent having been demanded of him for funds to supply this deficiency in one instance and six per cent in all other accounts, it is impossible duly to appreciate his feelings of sorrow that he finds himself thus situated; yet he hath reason to praise God for the frequent interference in his behalf when most perplexed. Several instances in this country he is forbidden to name from motives of delicacy. One from a distant land he thinks himself allowed to mention that God alone may receive the praise.

The story, with its accompaniments from which it derives its interest, is as follows:—

On the 16th Feb., the mail having been brought into the office, the first letter opened contained an account current from a merchant in St. Louis showing a balance against the Bishop, rising of $200. Having no money on hand, and having exhausted the patience of his friends by loans, the pain experienced was almost insupportable. But as in a thousand instances his want of faith in the divine goodness was reproved by the contents of ANOTHER LETTER in the same mail bearing the marks of a foreign post-office. It contained a post note of the Bank of England for £60 sterling. What gave peculiar interest to this donation thus providentially afforded is contained in the most friendly and affectionate expressions of the letter itself."

THE AMERICAN QUARTERLY REGISTER AND MAGAZINE.

We have received the March number of this most able and interesting Quarterly. The sickness of the Editor has prevented its earlier appearance. But this cause has, in no measure detracted from the character of the work. It is peculiarly rich in statistical information, of great value to every citizen of this country. There are several, excellent, and original articles. From one of which we make the following extract. It is from an article on "the Press in the United States."

"The reason why our papers, as a general rule, are inferior to the European, is easily found. Individual enterprise is the seed from which all things spring in this country. Our governments have little power beyond protecting the fruits of such enterprise, and by this protection to encourage it. They do not themselves contribute the means, nor lend their aid to develop the enterprise. To 'start a paper,' capital is necessary to some extent, or credit, to defray the expenses of printing, paper, etc., until the income from subscriptions and advertising supplies the means. The uncertainty of obtaining these sources of income amid the competition of established journals, with so many channels open for the investment of capital, promising speedy and ample profit, makes capitalists reluctant to invest in newspapers just commencing, whose fate is always precarious. Hence nearly all our journals are started by owners, who act as publishers and editors. They obtain credit, or possess sufficient capital to commence, and if they succeed, owe it entirely to their own energy and perseverance.

The surprise is, that so many papers succeed under such untoward circumstances. But we come now to the influence they exercise, and this is by far the most important branch of the subject.

The occupations of our men throughout the land, with the exception of the few professional ones, forbid much study, or much deep learning. There is probably no country in the world where education, up to a certain point, is so generally diffused as in the United States; but beyond that, the diffusion ceases. There is probably no country where, for the number possessing the general elements of education, so few books and so many newspapers are read as in our own. Many, very many, especially among the labouring classes, read newspapers only. Their newspaper is their text book; the opinions therein promulgated are devoured without question, and made their own; prejudices there recorded are accepted and assumed; and the doctrines, news, deductions and assertions regarded as sober truth. This is a fact, beyond all doubt. What a responsibility rests then upon those who conduct the press? And do those who conduct the press feel this responsibility? Do they acknowledge and conform to it? What might not be effected by such a weapon, such an instrument, such a power in proper hands, and under proper control? Instead of yielding to political partisanship and contention, instead of succumbing to prejudices and popular dissensions, the press should stand forth a public monitor. The great questions of national interests should be discussed with reason, impartially, and, if possible, without bias. If the side advocated by an editor will not stand the test of investigation and scrutiny, it cannot be the truth, and should be abandoned for the sake of the country, the welfare of the nation! If any policy be found injurious, it should attack it, regardless of party, regardless of all save the well-being of the state, or union. It should stand forth the advocate of public as well as private virtue; condemn that which is base, be it among the high in station, or the lowly of lot; it should hold the rod of exposure and of condemnation over all abuse in office, all misfeasance and neglect of duty, public and private; it should promulgate a high standard of public and private morals, and by upholding the honest, the virtuous, the good, elevate the general mind, and educate the many to comprehend, and thoroughly understand the invaluable boon of civil, political and religious liberty! This is the only country where the influence of the press is felt throughout the ramifications of society. Here alone can the press effect so great an end; and wield so unlimited, beneficial and healthy a sway. The obligation imposed is too often disregarded; but there is a way to accomplish this desirable object, and only one way; by giving a ready support, a willing aid to such journals and newspapers, as have this laudable end in view, and by discountenancing those which tend only to produce a demoralizing effect upon the community.

The press deserves, and should receive more attention than it meets. Does any one reflect upon the protection it gives society? the morale it exercises in our army? the shield it forms against crime and immorality? Every instance of crime is published in our papers, with the names and descriptions of the criminals; every instance of cowardice, neglect of duty, or disobedience of orders of any gross character in our army, is made known through the press, and the delinquent's, the disgraced one's name attached to the notice; any striking instance of immorality is likewise circulated through this medium far and near. How many a crime may not have been stayed in its conception by the remembrance of this publicity? How many a weak mind may not have been saved from temptation, by the fear of exposure? And how many a man in our late war may not have been incited to daring deeds, and to contend fearlessly against overwhelming odds, by the knowledge that his bravery and his courage would be proclaimed throughout his native country? And many a good deed, many a generous action has been accomplished and performed, from a sense, that the press would do justice to the motive that incited it. Let every one look to it, reflect upon it, ponder over it, until the importance of this vast engine to American liberty shall be recognised; its power known, and be made to apply itself in exalting, educating and cultivating the millions who look to it for truth, information, and amusement. Let no one say, 'these things regulate themselves!' You have made your engine of prodigious power, and unless superintended and controlled by skilful hands, it will rattle down the temple in which you have intended it to work.

Nor is our periodical literature of less importance? The remarks above are intended to apply to the press generally, and are as applicable to this branch as to the newspapers. Young minds, both male and female, often receive their early impressions from these works. Early impressions often leave lasting effects, and the mind tainted in youth, seldom recovers its purity. Our women, and the position they hold, the influence they exercise among us, are the first and best proofs of our civilization. Let no one forget the necessity of early impressing high moral sentiments upon the maiden's mind, for she is to be a wife and a mother, than which no position is more responsible.

Let the wise men of the nation exert themselves in developing the necessity of a high standard in our press, and they can find no work more essential to the public welfare, no labour more patriotic, nor one that would be likely to reap a richer reward. The press is the bulwark of our liberties!"

BURIAL ON EASTER EVEN.

BY MRS. JOSEPH C. NEAL.

Suggested by the wish of a friend.

Gently the willows o'er us sway,
Waved by the breath of Spring,
The bland South wind that with its kiss
Such comfort seems to bring.
Afar the Western twilight dies
In soft yet brilliant hues;
Who would not in a scene like this
All sad forebodings lose.

All mournful thoughts of death, that cling
About some hearts through life,
Checking the throbbing pulse of hope,
And rousing constant strife
Between our wishes, and God's will,
That justly hath decreed—
'Tis only by Earth's sharpest pang
We, from its cares are freed.

The Church's aisles still echo back
The requiem chanted low,
In memory of the lonely cross,
Our Master's fiercest woe:
This ere we read, one faithful friend
Within the tomb has lain,
His lifeless body, pale and still,
"The Lamb of God" is slain.

We sorrow, yet with trust and faith
The victory hath been won;
There rises on the Christian world
The cloudless Easter-Sun.
The seal, the band of armed men
That clank their watchful sound,
Give place to white-robed visitants
That guard the hallowed ground.

A holy peace descends to rest
Alike on Earth and sky,
The birds their melodies have hushed,
The blossoms folded lie,
Waiting the morrow's earliest light
To open with its rays,
While birds, and brooks, and whispering leaves
Join in one hymn of praise.

And dwelling on the Master's death
I find this wish arise,
While watching now the solemn light
Fade from the twilight skies:
May I be laid at rest from Earth,
As closes Easter-Even,
And "through the grave and gate of death,"
Pass with our Lord to Heaven!

An answer to all the excuses and pretences which men make for not coming to the Holy Communion; with Prayers and Meditations suitable to that ordinance. By Archbishop Synge. With a preface, and a Sermon on the perpetual obligation of the institution of the Lord's Supper. By the Rev. M. A. DeWolfe Howe, Rector of St. Luke's Church, Philadelphia.

MR. EDITOR:—

Allow us to commend to the readers of the Banner, and to all who may see this article, the judicious, temperate and practical little book, the title whereof we have transcribed above. Its republication is most opportune, and wherever it circulates it must, with God's blessing, produce permanent good; informing the understandings and comforting the hearts of such as are, or seek to be, partakers of the body and blood of Christ. Forty years ago, Archbishop Synge's treatise had passed through 38 editions in London, a fair evidence of its extraordinary worth; and the present edition is particularly valuable, from the addition of an able and scholarlike defence of the perpetual obligation of the institution of the Lord's Supper, by the American Editor. The simplicity of its style adapts it to the humblest capacity, whilst its sound catholic instruction on subjects connected with the Holy Eucharist will commend it to all. From among many admirable passages we transcribe the following, from pages 47-9.

"I shall need to speak but a word or two to the fourth impediment, which some men pretend, namely, That having formerly received the Holy Communion, they find themselves never the better for it, and therefore think it to no purpose to come again."

To which I answer, That if a man reaps no benefit from the reception of the Holy Communion, the fault is altogether his own, because either he does not duly prepare himself for it, or else does not receive it so often as he should.

"Some bodies are so distempered, and stomachs vitiated, that they turn the best food into corrupt and evil nourishment: and if a man of the most healthy constitution should eat but one meal in a week, it would never keep him in health and strength; but let the stomach be cleansed, and the body brought into good order, and then let the man eat his constant and daily meals, and he shall find both his health and strength increase upon him. And the case is just the same with this spiritual food, which is exhibited to us in the Holy Sacrament. Whilst the soul is polluted and distempered with sins unrepented of, it will certainly rather do us hurt than good to receive it; and when men partake of it but once in a year or two, or it may be, not so often, whatever strength or refreshment their souls begin to find thereby, is lost and forgot before it comes again to be renewed by the same ordinance. But let a man thoroughly cleanse and purge his soul from sin, by a sincere repentance, and with an honest heart, and mind well prepared, let him come, as often as he can, to God's Holy Table, and, by the frequent and constant use of this Holy Sacrament, he need not doubt but he shall find himself continually to grow more and more in grace, becoming still better, and better enabled to resist all temptations, and daily find more and more quiet and comfort in his mind and conscience."

We cannot resist the pleasure of quoting one or two passages from the sensible discourse of the Reverend, the Rector of St. Luke's Church, which forms the appendix to Archbishop Synge's tract.

Speaking to the point of the popular fallacy that spirituality and form are antagonistic, the American Editor remarks, (p. 100):

"The idea of worship is inseparable from that of a visible obeisance of the body. No scholar will venture to assert that Jesus could have used the words which the evangelist imputed to him in this Scripture ('God is a spirit, and they who worship him, must worship in spirit and in truth,') without meaning that there should be outward expressions of a devout and lowly mind. But if the christian economy be entirely spiritual, then must worship itself be repugnant, &c."

"They who speak most of the purely spiritual character of the christian dispensation, refute their own arguments by assembling for religious worship, and addressing God with the voice of prayer."

On page 114, Rev. Mr. Howe makes the following excellent verbal criticism on the phrase "as often as" in the passage: "As often as ye eat this bread, and drink this cup, ye do show the Lord's death till he come." The phrase "as often as" signifies more than "whenever." It imports frequent repetition, and may be fairly construed in its connexion, thus: "As ye do often eat this bread, and drink this blood, so often do ye show the Lord's death."

It is pleasing to be able to connect with the above extract the declaration of Archbishop Synge, as to how often this Holy Sacrament was received by the faithful in the best ages of the Church. On page 75, he says, "It is beyond dispute that the primitive christians did every Lord's day (if not oftener) receive the Holy Communion."

We again commend the Rev. Mr. Howe's book to Churchmen, and especially to those who have the opportunity of weekly (or more frequent) communion, who will thank the Rector of St. Luke's, Philadelphia, for putting into their hands so instructive and comforting a manual.

For Our Young Readers.

THE CHAPLAIN'S STORY.*

A Clergyman, who was chaplain of a little squadron stationed in the Mediterranean for five years, related the following interesting anecdote, which occurred during that time:

"The commodore was a frank and generous man, who treated me with marked attention, and I used to preach in all the ships but one. This was a small frigate, and its captain was an irreligious and profane man. He used to say he wanted no methodist parson for a pilot, and he embraced every opportunity of annoying me. Being a person of violent temper, he took offence, and insulted the commodore, who meant to send him home. When I heard of his intention, I waited on the commodore, and said I was come to ask a particular favour of him.

"That shall be granted. I am always happy to oblige you. What is it?"

"That you will overlook the conduct of captain S——," said I.

"Nay, nay: you can't be serious. Is he not your greatest enemy? and I believe the only man in the fleet who does not wish to see you on board his ship."

"That's the very reason why I ask the favour, commodore: I must practise as well as preach."

"Well, well, 'tis an odd whim; but, if on reflection I can grant your request without prejudice to his majesty's service, I will do it."

"The next day I renewed my petition.

"Well," said he, "if captain S—— will make a public apology, I will overlook his conduct."

"I instantly got into a boat, and rowed to the frigate. The captain met me with a frown on his countenance: but, when I told him my business, I saw a tear in his eye, and, taking me by the hand he said: 'Mr. —, I really don't understand your religion, but I do understand your conduct, and I thank you.'

"The affair blew over, and he pressed me to preach in his ship. The first time I went there the whole crew were dressed in their best clothes, and the captain at my right hand. I could hardly utter a word, my mind was so much moved, and so were the whole crew. There seemed a more than ordinary solemnity among us.

* From "The Church of England Sunday Scholar's Magazine."

"That very night the ship disappeared, and not a soul survived to tell the tale. None ever knew how it happened, but we supposed, as there had been a gale of wind, she had foundered and went down in deep water."

How cheering the thought, that the men thus suddenly summoned into eternity had listened to the blessed message of the gospel, and that too under circumstances which, through the blessing of God, were so peculiarly adapted to prepare their minds to welcome and receive it!

See, dear young reader, how "example" is more regarded than "precept!" Persons can understand our conduct, if they cannot appreciate our principles, and they form their opinion of us more from what we do than from what we say. We should therefore rather strive to live well than to talk well. "Even a child is known by his doings." The religion of Christ teaches us to let our light shine before men; and it is highly important that those who profess to love the Saviour should be careful to "adorn" in all things his doctrine.

Miscellaneous.

THE IROQUOIS BEFORE THE COMMITTEE ON INDIAN AFFAIRS.

The Albany correspondent of the Courier and Enquirer thus writes from the capitol:

"I was witness a few evenings since to a peculiar, and an interesting scene. The Committee on Indian Affairs, both of the Senate and the Assembly, held a joint meeting in the ante-room of the Senate Chamber, to hear the contending parties on the great Indian question of the day. I have before stated the cause of the present anomalous condition of the Indians on the Cattaraugus and Alleghany Reservation. Here, then, in this year, 1849, the question was debated with great earnestness, whether the old form of government which had come down from the proud days of the Iroquois, should yield to the revolutionary doctrine of an election by the nation at large of a cabinet of counsellors. The old chief party were represented by Nathaniel T. Strong, an educated and adroit Indian, who presented his arguments in a quiet manner, and with an address that savoured more of the civilized manner of doing things, than of the simplicity of the woods. The revolutionary party had an eloquent and able advocate in Dr. Wilson, a Cayuga, who avowed with boldness, that there had been a revolution on the reservation, that the people were determined to shake off the dominion of the chiefs which had become intolerable. He urged that their new form of government was the only way in which the nation could become assimilated to the whites, and merged in their laws, their manners, their civilization. The young men, he said, were for their new government, while the old chiefs did not like to give up the power which they had so long wielded, and to which they had become accustomed.

He spoke, however, kindly of Blacksnake, the patriarchal chief, of whom I have before written in your columns, and while he opposed his retention of authority, he acknowledged his grave and venerable character.

The counsel, for such they were, answered each other's arguments with a precision which would have been well received in any court. One of them alluded to the ignorance of some of those who had been engaged in the movements which had taken place, and said they were believers in the legend of 'the handsome lake,' a sort of paradisaical fiction. This was not denied by the other, but he claimed that his party wanted to have the people educated, that they might throw off the old superstitions and customs. In alluding to an election which had taken place, one curious fact was mentioned. It was said that the chiefs had induced the warriors, many of them, to put forward a child as the head of their families, because the warriors did not like to have their names mentioned, and thus, as these children could not vote under their laws organizing their nation the chiefs were thus enabled to rule out a large number of suffrages that would have been cast against them, a device worthy of Tamany Hall in its palmy days.

The whole debate was a curious one. Here was the waning of the light of old Indian power. The disputants were Indians, able, adroit, informed, and one pleaded for the old chiefs, the other for the young men, but it was evident that the movement in either case was the premonition of an advance, an important one towards civilization. The bright gas-lights of the Senate have seldom, if ever, shone over a debate between the relics of sovereignty such as this. The people who assembled here by two men, had in the lifetime of some now living, held more of New York than did the white man. But their numbers were faint and feeble against the might that was concentrated in that one word civilization, and hence the men of the woods were driven back. Even on this, their last beautiful home, on the banks of the Alleghany, their forty forest miles of land that in its richness might revive their enemies of the soil that was once all theirs; even in that place of happy exile, the division among brethren is seen, and the aid of the white man is solicited to assuage their commotions.

Over the meeting Senator Johnson presided, and took notes of the arguments. The auditory were few. I saw there, a listener to the singular debate, the poet Street, to whom this strange controversy of the Cayuga and the Seneca over the dying embers of the ancient council fires, must have brought quaint imaginings, the memory of which, I doubt not, I shall yet trace in beautiful revivification in some of his delightful narratives of the red man and his destinies.

I have preserved in your columns the incidents of this scene, as something worthy of record; curious indeed was it to step from the arena of conflict between the eloquent warriors of the Iroquois, to hearing about 'straight railroads' and plank road acts."

The best way of being thankful to God for what he gives me is a liberal distribution of it. Love every man for Christ's sake, and fear none in His cause.

APPENDIX.—Rev. Dr. Kip

Having sustained a satisfactory examination in these studies, the student is prepared to become a candidate for Holy Orders, and to enter upon the study of the various branches of theology.

The course of theological study embraces four years, and is mainly that laid down by the House of Bishops.

In the first year, the student reads Pridaux, Horne's Introduction, and the whole of the Greek Testament critically with Bloomfield's Annotations. Hebrew is begun this year, the grammar mastered with Stuart's Chrestomathy. The Hebrew course, as recently prescribed by the Faculty, embraces three years. The first is devoted to historical prose, with Exegesis; the second to the Messianic Psalms, with Christology; the third to selections from the four great prophets, with lectures on Hebrew poetry and sacred hermeneutics.

The second and third years are principally given to dogmatic theology. The usual topics, both didactic and controversial, are discussed by lecture, and in the use of the standard text books. Special attention is paid to the Calvinistic and Romish controversies, and the student is prepared as far as possible, not only to unfold the doctrines of Christianity from the pulpit, but to meet and repel the various heresies which flourish no where in wilder and ranker luxuriance than in the West. Especially in moral theology, and what may be called "subjective divinity," is pains taken to ground the student in Catholic doctrine. The doctrines of the fall, of original sin, of the grace of the Holy Spirit, of the need of an atonement, and of salvation only by Christ's merits, and the further doctrines of conscience and the will, the affections, or those that in general concern man's nature, are largely dwelt upon in the teaching of this year.

The fourth year is devoted to Church history. In the composition and delivery of sermons, there are weekly exercises of all the students throughout the whole course.

The devotional services of the House remain as they were two years ago, with some little addition. Every Sunday evening there is a spiritual conference on some subject in practical divinity, which is made altogether a devotional exercise, to promote in some measure that growth in grace, and the wisdom that cometh from above, without which, the brethren of Nashotah feel that their labor were vain and their hopes vain, and which it is the primary object of their lives to acquire. A subject (for example, "humility" or "self-denial") is assigned to the students at one conference, to be made a subject of meditation during the week, and they are to be prepared, when called upon, to declare the result of their reflections. The Professor then sums up, and concludes with prayers. The Rev. President and the professor of languages alternate every Sunday in the Chapel pulpit, and also preach extemporaneously after prayers every Wednesday and Friday evenings during Advent and Lent. Their sermons pursue a regular system of the practical catholic life, discussing those subjects which are most appropriate to the season of the year.

We have thus placed before our readers as complete a view as possible of the Nashotah Mission. There seems to be no limit to the usefulness of the Institution, if its friends at the East would furnish means for its expansion. It might occupy the whole diocese for the Church, not only moulding the minds of the rising generation by its primary and academical departments, but yearly sending out men from the theological school who are trained to hardness and adapted to the labors of the West. But at present this influence is narrowed by the impossibility of supplying accommodations for the students who apply. In a letter from the Rev. President, (dated June 20th, 1848,) he says: "We are crowded with students, and have now converted into rooms for the Lay-brothers, all our buildings that will admit of such transformation. I have refused three or more students this spring, and must refuse all that apply for the present. This is bad, I confess, but we have no means whereby to accommodate more, and no means to build. We have now thirty divinity students, and several more are expected whom I had engaged to take. What shall be done? Bishop Kemper wishes for clergy, and those suitable for the West. In a letter of May 20th, written at Burlington, Iowa, he says: 'You inform me you see not how you can take another student at Nashotah, for want of room. This is deplorable, when I see immense districts settling throughout the North West—Congregational preachers and Romish priests crowding into them—and no one appearing even to tell of the Church. If we are right, we ought to accomplish much more than we do. I ought to have at least a dozen clergyman every year to locate. There is a place not more than twelve miles from Galena, where without moving a step, only turning around, six Romish Chapels can be counted.'" And in a letter to the writer of this pamphlet, (dated Feb. 6, 1849,) the Bishop says: "Buildings are now exceedingly needed. The determination of the Trustees and of the Faculty, and particularly of our indomitably persevering President, to keep out of debt, may greatly delay the growth of Nashotah, but must afford satisfaction to every friend of our glorious cause, that there will be no waste of funds and no breaking up of the Institution. Oh! if the Church at the East would only give us means, Zion in Wisconsin would soon be flourishing, glorious, and powerful."

Let the fact then be known to the Church, that young men looking forward to Holy Orders, are prevented from entering on their studies, because they can not be accommodated at Nashotah. But ought these things so to be? Shall the golden opportunity for the West pass by, and the field be occupied by others, and laborers be asked for in vain, while they themselves are standing ready, saying: "Here am I, send me?"

We would propose then an effort in which all can take an interest. Dr. Muhlenberg has procured the plan, (referred to in one of the former letters,) which admits of additions to any extent. In accordance with it, one permanent building could be erected, consistent in itself, but part only of a whole, for the sum of one thousand dollars. This will answer for the theological department, while at any time a similar one can be erected for the academical students. Are there not then one hundred individuals who will contribute ten dollars each, so that this plan can be carried out during the coming spring? Supply merely the means for building, (and building can be done at a cheap rate, since brick is manufactured on the spot,) and in a few years Nashotah will have a hundred young men training for the ministry, instead of thirty. Will not every clergyman who reads this statement procure one or more such subscribers among his parish ones? Are there not ten rich men who can themselves each give a hundred dollars, and who will not regret the offering "in the hour of death and in the day of judgment?"

We commend it then to the Church. There are those who in suffering and toil are laying deep the foundations of our faith in the mighty West; shall we uphold them? or shall we let them struggle on, and a whole generation pass away in ignorance, while we will do nothing that the desolate may stretch out their hands to God, and "Christ's sheep that are dispersed abroad, and His children who are in the midst of this naughty world, may be saved through Him forever?"

THE DUKE AT THE CHAPEL ROYAL.

I agreed with a friend to go to early service (at eight o'clock, A. M.) to the Chapel Royal, at St. James's Palace, on a Sunday morning in February. The fact that the Duke of Wellington habitually attended there was the inducement which attracted us. It was a bleak morning. There had been a heavy fall of snow. Our way to the chapel lay through St. James's Park. We did not meet a single person. The stillness of London on the earlier hours of Sundays has often struck me. The state of the weather made this stillness seem greater than usual on this morning, and raised a suspicion in our minds that, in so far as our visit to the chapel involved the hope of seeing the duke, it would be attended with disappointment.

Arrived there, however, and with the usual preliminaries admitted within, we found a singularly interesting congregation. The Chapel Royal is remarkable for a large attendance of the aristocracy, and we saw before us a congregation of rank, fashion, fame, power, worth and wisdom, such as is rarely witnessed. In a word, the congregation consisted of one single person—the Duke alone! Bleak as was the morning, there he was, laden with more of earth's honors, dignities, and renown, than any living man, intently occupied with the work of worshipping his God, and all alone with the clergyman. Thoughts came flowing in upon us from all quarters, Waterloo, Victoria, Salamanca; clashing thousands, the wounded, the dying, the silent camp, the imminent deadly breach; glorious victories, admiring millions, applauding senates, grateful princes, gorgeous courts—all, in fact, that is viewed as great and glorious in this lower world, with the one exception, as so related to the great personage before us, that they in our minds connected themselves with, and were, by his presence on this occasion, forced before our imagination, and, as it were, seen, felt, realized. Here was the giant spirit which had been raised to sit on the whirlwind and rule the storm, which had, instrumentally, for years decided the fate of nations, and people, and kindred, and tongues, and received more of the incense of human gratitude, thanksgiving, and praise, than, perhaps, ever before were awarded to mortal. Nor did there fail to mingle with the retrospect thrones overturned, dynasties swept away, hopes which towered to heaven flung into perdition, curses both loud and deep.

The hero, the deliverer, the avenger, the warrior of unmatched wisdom in the hour of difficulty, firmness in the hour of hesitation, and forbearance in the hour of triumph, stood before us, his head hoar with age, his body feeble, and his voice faint, the solitary worshipper of that God who had so often shielded his head in the day of battle, and through his arm delivered the British empire and its countless subjects from invasion and overthrow. The sight struck us as particularly fine.

On our entrance, the Psalms for the day were being read. The duke took alternate verses with the clergyman. He spoke with an utterance that was thick and indistinct, and occasionally stammered a little ere he could get out a word, but still his voice filled the chapel.

Although my friend and I habitually answered the responses, here we felt that it would be more edifying that we should be silent worshippers. It struck us both that the Psalm was particularly appropriate. After our entrance it ran and was read thus:—

The Duke: I will go forth in the strength of the Lord God, and will make mention of thy righteousness only.

The Clergyman: Thou, O God, hast taught me from my youth up until now: therefore will I tell of thy wondrous works.

The Duke: Forsake me not, O God, in mine old age, when I am grey-headed, until I have showed thy strength unto this generation, and thy power to all them that are yet for to come.

Clergyman: Thy righteousness, O God, is very high: and great things are they that thou hast done: O God who is like unto Thee?

The Duke: O, what great troubles and adversities hast thou showed me! And yet didst thou turn and refresh me: yea, and broughtest me from the deep of the earth again.

Clergyman: Thou hast brought me to great honor and comforted me on every side.

The Duke: Blessed be the Lord God, even the God of Israel: which only doeth wondrous things.

Clergyman: And blessed be the name of His Majesty forever; and all the earth shall be filled with His Majesty. Amen.

The Duke: Glory be to the Father, and to the Son, and to the Holy Ghost.

Clergyman: As it was in the beginning, is now, and ever shall be, world without end. Amen.

It was impossible not to feel with peculiar force the importance of that part of the ritual of our Church through which the congregation is led to take alternate verses with the clergyman in reading the Psalms for the day. In what remarkable contrast with the hardening circumstances of daily life, its sordid cares, its heartless vanities, its corrupting sentiments, do the thoughts of the inspired and royal psalmist present themselves!

The duke was as painstaking in the performance of his duty as ever parish clerk was, and much more so than many of the fraternity whom I have happened upon.

The rubric was punctiliously observed. At the creed he turned to the communion table, repeated the words distinctly and aloud, and all through impressed the spectator with the idea that he was intently engaged in the fulfilment of an important duty of his own. The emphasis in the Litany was strong and marked. "We beseech thee to hear us, good Lord." And at the commandments, "Incline our hearts to keep this law," was thus repeated on each occasion.

The lessons for the morning were, Genesis ix., and Mark xiv. The sermon was remarkable, on Exodus, chap. xxiii. 2. It briefly but strongly showed the dangers connected with too great subservency to the popular voice, and, of course, without any intention on the part of the writer and preacher, dealt some strokes which the duke must have felt.—Dublin Church Sentinel.

EMIGRATION TO THE UNITED STATES IN 1848.—During the twelve months ending September, 1848, according to returns made to the Secretary of State, 229,483 emigrants arrived in this country; 136,128 males, and 92,883 females. Over 160,990 arrived in New York, 24,000 in Boston, and 20,000 during six months only reported, in New Orleans. Including the number which reached the United States through the British Provinces and by other means, not enumerated above, it is estimated that the total emigration exceeded 300,000. Subsequently, that is, to the 31st December, 1848, the Emigrant Commissioners of the city of New York, report that during the year 1848, at that single port, 195,509 emigrants arrived, in 1,041 vessels; among them, there were 3,079 sick, and 1,002 deaths; 98,961 arrived from Ireland; 23,061 from England, and 51,973 from Germany; 16,820 received aid from the Commissioners. While the number receiving aid since 1st January, 1849, is in proportion much greater.

EMIGRATION TO CALIFORNIA. In less than two months preceding the 20th of January, 99 vessels left the ports of the United States for California, with 5,619 passengers, including officers and crews. Of these, 52 went from New York and 19 from Boston. Over 80 of them went round Cape Horn. The emigration continues, and is increasing. On the 1st of February, 60 vessels were advertised in the New York papers for California. The distance from New York to San Francisco via Cape Horn, is 17,000 miles, and requires usually 150 days to accomplish it. From New York to Chagres is 2,000 miles; across the Isthmus to Panama, 50 miles, and then by water to San Francisco, 3,400; in all, 8,500 miles, which is travelled in 40 or 50 days.—Spirit of Missions.

POPULATION OF THE UNITED STATES.—The following statistics are obtained from the Report for 1848, recently submitted to Congress by the Commissioner of the Patent Office:—The present population of the United States is estimated at 21,686,000. The number allotted to each State is as follows:—Maine, 615,000; New Hampshire, 308,000; Massachusetts, 875,000; Rhode Island, 135,000; Connecticut, 340,000; Vermont, 310,000; New York, 2,880,000; New Jersey, 425,000; Pennsylvania, 2,220,000; Delaware, 85,000; Maryland, 510,000; Virginia, 1,295,000; North Carolina, 780,000; South Carolina, 620,000; Georgia, 825,000; Alabama, 716,000; Mississippi, 670,000; Louisiana, 490,000; Tennessee, 980,000; Kentucky, 890,000; Ohio, 1,980,000; Indiana, 1,000,000; Illinois, 800,000; Missouri, 589,000; Arkansas, 200,000; Michigan, 420,000; Florida, 80,000; Wisconsin, 250,000; Iowa, 150,000; Texas, 150,000; District of Columbia, 48,000; Oregon, 50,000. The total population in 1840 was 17,063,353; increase since that time (according to the above estimates) 4,622,647.

PRECEPTS TO PREACHERS.—You know how you would feel and speak in a parlour concerning a friend who was in imminent danger of his life, and with what energetic pathos of diction, and countenance, you would enforce the observance of that which you really thought would be for his preservation. You would not think of playing the orator—of studying your emphasis, cadence, and gesture. You would be yourself; and the interesting nature of your subject impressing your heart, would furnish you with the most natural tone of voice, the most proper language, the most engaging features, and the most suitable and graceful gestures. What you would thus be in the parlour, be in the pulpit, and you will not fail to please, to affect, and to profit.—Garrick.

THE HON. AND REV. MR. NOEL FALLEN!—The Banner of the Cross contains the ominous announcement that the Hon. and Rev. Baptist W. Noel "has fallen in every sense of the word; and he has fallen alone!"

What a fall! A fall that has raised him in the estimation of the Christian people of Great Britain—and of the Christian world! A fall that is cheered as a note of triumph by ten thousands who have long been calling for the removal of the corrupting embraces of State patronage from the Christian Church! A fall that cheers the hearts and hopes of all, who are praying for the spiritual renovation of a fallen and formal Church.—Christian Observer.

AFFECTIONATE MANNERS IN MINISTERS.—How much ministers and religious teachers gain by a tender and affectionate style! I hope, dear brother, you will never withhold the pungent doctrines of the gospel; but I do hope you will cultivate that affectionate solemnity which accomplishes much more than harshness. A minister preaches by his looks, his attitudes, and his tones, out of the pulpit and in it, as well as by what he says. O! I do long to see love the prominent, all-pervading characteristic of every Christian.—Mrs. Sarah L. Smith.

A gentleman, while looking over the recent extensive conflagration in Lincoln's Inn, expressed his surprise in three names of British authors—"Dickens, Howitt, Burns."—Guardian.

NEW YORK.

It will, no doubt, be gratifying to our readers to learn that the Rev. Mr. Mines arrived safely at Chagres, in the Crescent City, after a prosperous passage of less than nine days, and had gladdened the hearts of many of his friends by his early and unexpected arrival among them. At the last accounts he was at Panama, awaiting the arrival of the California, when he would proceed to San Francisco.

N. Y. ECCLESIOLOGICAL SOCIETY.

A meeting of the Society was holden in the school room of St. Paul's chapel, on Easter Monday evening. The Rev. Dr. Forbes, President, took the chair.

The minutes of the last meeting were read by the Recording Secretary, and approved.

Mr. S. Cox, Jr., one of the Secretaries, then read the Report of the Committee, the most interesting features of which were the elections of new members made during the last three months; the information that the Committee had made arrangements for the manufacture of Atlas Linen, of which a very chaste and beautiful specimen lay on the table for the inspection of the members; and finally the list of the publications of the Oxford Architectural Society, which had been by it presented to the youthful sister Society in New York. These beautiful works were examined with great interest by the gentlemen present.

The Rev. Mr. Mahan then read the regular paper, on the subject of "Sepulchral Monuments." The desire to be remembered after death was, he said, the origin of all Sepulchral Monuments, and men naturally desire to be remembered for what they have been, or for what they have done, while on earth. But it was peculiar to Christianity, that Christians should long to be remembered, not for what they have been, but for what they are; not as things of the past merely, but as still living. Departed spirits still retained the memory of those they had left behind; and if the rich man in torment thought of his five brethren yet on earth, much more may we believe that the thoughts of the blessed in Abraham's bosom frequently recur to their brethren of the household of faith who are yet in the flesh. They would thence naturally desire to be remembered by them, and that too by the bond which still unites the living with the dead. Epitaphs should not be wholly panegyric, which is a heathen style, and strikingly in contrast with that adopted by the early Christians, as still exemplified by the inscriptions remaining in the Catacombs at Rome. We moderns, he said, rather affected the pagan style of epitaph, regarding our departed friends as dead, while those early Christians looked upon them as living. Their epitaphs and monuments were, therefore, as it were the sacramental symbols of the great doctrine of the Communion of Saints. He then quoted that famous Epitaph of Johnson's:

"Sydney's sister, Pembroke's mother,
Death, ere thou hast slain another
Wise and good and great as she,
Time shall throw his dart at thee."

This, he said, was an excellent specimen of the panegyric kind. But it was the embalming of only the mortal body; for of the immortal, still living part, there is not a syllable expressed. How beautiful in comparison were the epitaphs of the saints of old!

"Victorina dormit in pace et in Christo," and "Dormitio Elpidis," and "Dormit," and "Dormit in pace," were specimens of Christian epitaphs, differing totally in tone and feeling from the other: they savored of reality, not of sham; of Christian hope, not of heathen sentimentality. The heathen style showed only the triumph of death, not the victory over death. It was the offspring of individual vanity, and as such it was characterized by the littleness of the passion it was intended to gratify. Christian epitaphs breathed a spirit of serene quietness. Lazarus sleeps; and the disciples believe that if he sleep he shall do well.

No attempt is made to disguise the reality of death, but all sadness is taken away by fixing the mind constantly on immortality. The emblems and symbols of death adopted generally by us in the 19th century were mostly lugubrious, harping eternally on one string, and that one mouldy and unstrung by the damps of the tomb.

Niobe in tears, willows, broken shafts, inverted torches, urns, buds untimely snapped from the stalk, hour-glasses, scythes, cross-bones and skulls,—these are the favorites. But among the early Christians were found the dove, the olive branch, the ship in full sail just arriving at the port, or the anchor of faith, or Jonah reclining under the grateful shadow of his booth. The mind is elevated by the contemplation of emblems like these. It is satisfied amid this serene and softened atmosphere, which renders the gloom of the catacombs more attractive and more cheering than all the sunshine and glare of our landscape cemeteries. The most simple and common symbols were the cross, the sacred monogram, &c., but the cross was always entitled to rank first. Many, he knew, would object altogether to the expression of truth by symbols. But if symbols were to be admitted at all, he would say "aut crux, aut nihil." It was strange that though Golgotha was the place where the cross was first set up, our Golgotha was almost the only places where the cross could not be found. In the middle ages, when monuments began to be made more sumptuous with enriched canopies and brilliant coloring, still the epitaph was but a simple "Jesu mercede" even for the proudest prelates. The figure of the mailed warrior, reclining with his face upwards and his hand clasped as if in prayer, led the thoughts immediately to that better country where all pride of birth and rank vanishes. The monuments of wealthier persons soon began to take the shape of founding hospitals or churches, or building church porches, or erecting pictured windows in the church, and in all these various ways men were worthily remembered as Christians should be. Some might say of the alabaster boxes of ointment: "Why is this waste?" But those whose love is not perfected by arithmetic will delight to do these things, and in that city whose streets are gold, and whose walls and gates are precious stones, they will find their reward. It was not possible, he said, to lay down precise rules for that which must be regulated by taste, sentiment, feeling, and Christian faith. The pyramids of Egypt, the gigantic barrows found in various countries, were the attempts of the first successors of the antediluvians to obtain a physical immortality. They were built when men still remembered that one generation might last for a thousand years; and they were in truth, huge fortifications against the ravages of the destroyer. The Greeks and Romans attempted little but to disguise the seriousness and the horrors of death, and cover the ghastliness of the corpse with flowers. As for us, all our desires seemed also to be to render the tomb less repugnant to our feelings. But for this end all the resources of landscape gardening would be employed in vain. Christian truth was more consoling than the fancies of paganism. If men wished to be commemorated merely as men, they might safely be left to their own stupidity. But if as Christians, then must their monuments be memorials not of the dead but of the living, not devoted to past vanities, but to those sober realities which should never be out of our minds.

Selections.

"OUT OF THE ABUNDANCE OF THE HEART THE MOUTH SPEAKETH."

See yon flower, in the morn,
Laden with its diamond dew,
How it vieth with the dawn,
In its tints of rosy hue:
Sure, the scent it doth impart,
Is its morning song of love;
From the fulness of its heart,
Thus it praiseth Him above.

See yon bird, upon the wing,
Singing, as he flies along;
Hark, the mountain echoes fling
Back the burden of his song:
No symphony of art,
Is his morning song of praise;
From the fulness of his heart,
Doth he warble forth his lays.

See yon "bright and morning star,"
Just now rising into sight,
How it shineth from afar,
With its floods of golden light:
Every beam that star doth start,
Is a sentence of its prayer;
From the fulness of its heart,
Speaks its mouth, in words so fair.

See that maiden kneeling there,
With the voice and look of youth,
Unto heaven she lifts her prayer,
To the God of love and truth:
Surely He will take a part
Of her bitter woe and grief;
From the fulness of her heart,
Seeks she, now, the true relief.

As the flower doth scent the air,
As the bird doth sing his lays,
As the star doth shine its prayer,
As the maiden kneels and prays;
So, when all is sad and dark,
If, from God, relief you seek,
From the fulness of your heart,
On your knees, your mouth must speak.

UPWARD—ONWARD.

BY C. O. H.

This your watchword, glorious one,
While contending with your lot;
Rest not till the race be done,
And the glorious goal be won,
Upward—onward—falter not.

Onward through the mists of error,
Fearless moving, clear the way;
Acting right ye'll know no terror,
Though the storm comes near and nearer.
Upward—onward—watch and pray.

Sit not down in brooding sorrow,
Joy unseen may yet be near;
Let your heart no trouble borrow,
Bright the day that dawns to-morrow,
Upward—onward—never fear.

Action—action; time is speeding,
And your years are short and few;
Work ye must the foremost leading,
Rain and storm but little heeding,
Upward—onward—firm and true.

From the past a lesson learning,
Onward move, by duty led;
With a truthful eye discerning
Right from wrong, nor backward turning,
Upward—onward—straight ahead.

Let no thought of gain or power
Swerve you from the path of right;
Virtue is a diamond dower;
Growing brighter every hour;
Upward—onward—day and night.

Though life's tempest round you gather,
Tremble not, but press the sod,
With firmer step, the storm you'll weather,
Pulling heart and head together,
Upward—onward—trust in God.

LETTERS TO EDITORS.

Our industrious and good humored brother who so ably edits 'The Missionary,' in Pittsburgh, in a recent 'Word to Correspondents' informs us that he has received during the past year nearly five hundred letters, and requests to be kindly excused from answering all he receives. He says: 'Many of these letters are wholly out of our line. Some want books and others want boxes. One wants a wife, another wants a servant girl. Fourteen men want carpenter work, and seventeen young men want situations in stores. A ministerial brother in Ohio, two years ago sold a horse to a person here—sent us his bill for the balance, and charged us as follows: 'Sue him forthwith and send me the money.' We paid no attention to his epistle until a second came, to which we replied briefly: 'We are neither a lawyer nor a squire.' An editor on a tripod bears some resemblance to 'Patience on a monument.'—Lutheran Standard.

ORIGINAL LETTER OF BISHOP JEREMY TAYLOR.

PORTMORE, Jan. 13, 1659.

SIR,—I understand by Mr. Cowly that Mr. Sheridan is out of town, and that causes to you this trouble of receiving the inclosed note both for him and yourself. Is it only the beginning of a theological library fitted to these purposes that you pretend to, that is, to be wise and learned in the Christian religion, as it is taught and professed in the Church of England; when your purses grow large, and your designs beyond all that can be done by the studies here described, if you please to command mee I will draw you a much larger, and such as shall be proportioned to your utmost aims. In the meane time I desire you to take notice onely of the easiest part of this employment pointed out by the catalogue: If you spend your time and faculties in the practicall part meerly you will best of all consult with your present condition, and the greatest of your future hopes, the happinesse of eternity. If you desire it and thinke it usefull I am ready upon your first motion to designe for you a short and usefull catalogue of practicall divinity books which will not vex your understanding, but much improve your spirit: When Mr. Sheridan returns I pray commend mee kindly to him, and tell him if hee desires a larger and more perfect note of books hee may have it for calling for. I hope to be in Dublin by the earliest spring, and then I shall bee willing to receive any of your desires, to which if I can minister, I will not refuse to doe the office of, Sir,

Your very affectionate friend to serve you,

JER. TAYLOR.

To my worthy friend, Mr. Graham, fellow of Trinity Colledg, neare Dublin. These.

Hee that would improve in the understanding of the doctrine of the Church of England, so as to be able to teach others, must be carefull to understand, and be very perfect in every part of,

1. The Common Prayer Booke, with all its rubricks, or titles of direction: The Administration of the Sacraments: The booke of ordination: and the canons made in 1572 and 1603. As auxiliaries to these I advise you reade diligently and frequently the 5th booke of Hooker's Ecclesiasticall policy: the first four books are also excellent, but they principally minister to other purposes.

Read also Mr. Fisher's Defence of the English Liturgy,* and Dr. Hammond, and Dr. Taylor his apology for Liturgies, and the prefaces before his collection of offices. These are sufficient for the explicating and confirming her manner of prayer and serving God.

2. You must understand and be able to defend her government and discipline. To this purpose you may reade Dr. Hammond's dissertations against Blondell, and Dr. Taylor his Episcopacy asserted, and what passed at the Isle of Wight between the King and Mr. Henderson, and the King and the London divines; to which you adde Bp. Andrews his two epistles which are in his opuscula.

[3.] There remains now her doctrine to be learned, that you may know what shee is pro sensu, as what she is pro cultu; and her doctrine is contained in the Common Prayer Booke, in the Church Catechisme, in the Thirty-nine Articles, and in the Booke of Homilies; for the understanding and abilities to prove and defend these, you must acquaint yourselfe with the positive and polemic discourses of such as are most eminent amongst us: Amongst our English Divines I recommend to you for controversy between us and the Church of Rome:

Bp. Andrews Tortura Torti and Responsio ad apologiam Bellarmini.

Arch. Laud against Ffisher.

Bp. White against Ffisher.

Ld. Falkland of infallibility.

Dr. Taylor of reall presence, and his two letters at the end of his Discourse of friendship.

Dr. Baron de objecto fidei, and everything of his.

Bp. Mountague against the Gagger.

Bp. Bramhall against Militiere, and of Schisme.

Dr. Overal his defensio Ecclesiae Anglicanae.

For forreiners the best I know are Chemnitius his examen concilij Tridentini; Gerhardi loci communes, which serve to all purposes of the whole body of Divinity, but you must pare away his two Lutheran spots, viz., of consubstantiation and ubi quibet.

Moulin against Cardinal Perron in defence of King James.

Episcopius, whose whole works are excellent, and containe the whole body of orthodox religion.

Chamier is a very good writer, but you must abate his Calvinisme.

Vossii Theses, and De Sacramentorum vi et efficacia.

Causabon's [sic] Epistle to Ffronto Ducaeus, and his Epistle to Cardinal Perron in behalf of King James.

For positive Theology, of our English you may choose,

Bp. Andrews' Sermons,

Ffaringdon's Sermons,

Dr. Sanderson's Sermons,

Dr. Ffield of the Church,

Dr. Hammond's practical Catechisme,

Dr. Taylor's history of the life of the Lord Jesus, and his yeare of Sermons, rule of conscience, and his doctrine and practice of repentance.

These will serve your best purposes sufficiently, and when you are master of the learning and religion contained in these, you will be better able to choose your studys than I shall be to advise you.

Only be pleased to get the Bibliotheca Criticorum which contains all the best Protestant commentaries, and some others not Protestants, upon the whole Bible, and is of itself and excellent library and sufficient to all your purposes.

For a little breviary or institution of divinity, I very much commend to you a little booke called Declaratio sententiae eorum qui ex federato Belgio vocantur Remonstrantes, together with the Apologia they published in defence of it.

* This is Ambrose Fisher's "Defence of the Liturgie of the Church of England in a Dialogue between Novatus and Irenaeus." 4to. Lond. 1630. The works of Dr. Hammond and of Taylor (who here speaks of himself in the third person) are well known.

This, Sir, you may please to make the beginning of your Library, and the entertainment of your first studys. It were well also if you could a little looke into the Ecclesiasticall history, to which purpose procure Eusebius, with Scaliger's admirable animadversions upon it.

The tripartite history.

Calvisius his Chronology.

Bp. Mountague's History of the Church.

Causabon's Exercitationes in Baronii annales, and then you may be fit to read Baronius his annals without danger.

When you are pleased to looke into Schoole Divinity the best are,

Aquinas Summs; Oecam in sententias; Estius in sent.; Capreolus with Ffareolus; Biel; Suarez upon Aquinas; hee is long, but, except Estius, is the best of them, and in some regards to be preferred before him.

To these if you will adde a collection of little tractats of the most eminent persons upon particular subjects, you will find much advantage by it. I name one or two by way of instance. Beverovicus his collection of Epistles de vitae termino; Baronius de peccato mortali, et veniali; but these are innumerable; if you err in the choice of these your losse is not much, for they are but of small price.

In the reading these authors I have recommended to you, pray, observe what quotations they have, that thereby you may perceive what authors they make use of and especially read; for 'tis likely they are the best books; many books are not usefull: These few will doe very much for you, and when you are ready, and can find time read the fathers of the first three hundred years at least, they are few, and not very voluminous, and they are the surest guides.—Irish Ecclesiastical Journal. [From the Rev. Dr. Todd].

THE FORTUNE-TELLER.

BY CHARLOTTE ELIZABETH.

The Gipsy woman* was dressed in a short jacket of dark blue cloth, the skirts of which hung down a little way over a petticoat of strange patchwork. Stuffs of all colours seemed to have been used to mend and piece out the old dirty, dark green that still remained. Her hat was of black beaver, very much the worse for wear, and it was tied under her chin with a red cotton handkerchief. Fastened to her back, in a sort of bag, she carried a little child, whose bright black eyes shone out like jet from beneath its tangled hair. Its face was dirty, even more so than its mother's, and so sun-burnt that it seemed never to have known the comfort of shade.

Besides her baby, the Gipsy woman carried a wallet slung over one shoulder, and hanging at her side; and a tattered apron was gathered up, and knotted into the piece of cord which served her for a belt. Altogether, there was something so remarkable in their appearance, that little Jessy who was running before her Mamma, in the shady green lane, stopped to look with surprise at the Gipsy woman; and then, rather frightened by the bold look of her piercing eyes, she turned back and ran to her Mamma, taking hold of her hand, and keeping close beside her.

The Gipsy passed them, making a low courtesy to the lady, but not speaking a word; and Jessy looked round to observe the baby, for it had laughed and crowed when it saw her.

"I thought she had been a beggar-woman, Mamma," said Jessy, "but she did not ask for any thing. How black her eyes are, and the baby's too."

"They are Gipsies, my dear," said Mrs. Howes, "and Gipsies do not often beg; but I am sorry to say that they often cheat, and steal, and do many bad things."

"Where do they live, Mamma?"

"They are wanderers over the earth, having no settled home, Jessy. They are found in most countries, and are very nearly the same every where. It is not known exactly from whence they came; but they are generally supposed to be what their name expresses, Egyptians. It is foretold by the prophets that the mighty Egyptians should become the basest of all people; and that they should be scattered among all nations. We here see the threat of the Lord against them as exactly fulfilled as that against the Jews."

"Oh, Mamma!" exclaimed Jessy, "tell me more about them. I am so sorry for the Jews, because God loved them very much once, and now He is so very angry with them. It is a terrible thing to have God angry with us, Mamma!"

"A terrible thing indeed, my love! and you know the Bible says, 'God is angry with the wicked every day;' and all are wicked in God's sight who do not believe in his blessed Son, Jesus Christ, and pray continually to have their sins washed away in His most precious blood."

"Do the Gipsies believe in the Lord Jesus, Mamma?"

"Oh! no, my dear, they have no religion at all, even in name: they are the most ignorant and wretched people among us. Knowing nothing themselves, they cannot instruct their children; but they bring them up in idleness and vice, to lie and swear, steal and defraud—to impose on the charitable, and deceive the unwary. It is a great pity that some among us who love to do good, do not take particular pains to find out and instruct those wretched outcasts of society. God would bless such a work: for He has commanded His servants to look even among the highways and hedges for sinners, who will be accepted if they come to Him, and admitted to sit at His table."

Mrs. Howes and her little girl had by this time nearly reached the house, through a field which led to the back gate, and there, the first thing that they saw was the Gipsy, standing at the kitchen window, and two of the maid servants very busily talking to her. Seeing their mistress, however, they quickly ran away, and left the Gipsy to answer for herself.

She was a little confused at first, but her face soon became as bold as ever, and, in a fawning tone of voice, she said she was sure the good lady would not be offended at her having begged a little stale milk for her poor child, which was very thirsty.

Mrs. Howes asked if she had got any—no, she replied, the maid would not give it without leave.

* The Gipsies are a wandering people: they are found in various parts of England and Scotland: they are, in their countenance, character, and habits, a distinct people.

Mrs. Howes called a boy who was at work, and ordered him to bring a bowl of fresh milk, of which the poor little baby drank heartily; and it was then filled again for the mother.

"And now," said Mrs. Howes, "whether you spoke truth in telling me that this draught of milk was what you asked of the maids, is known to your conscience. It is also known to God, whose eyes are in every place, who sees all that you do, hears all that you say, and knows all that you think. I hope you have not spoken falsely: for He will assuredly put the lying lip to silence; and I hope you came here with no wicked intention, for he knows the things that come into your mind, every one of them, and will punish the thought of a wicked heart."

The Gipsy said she would not for the world be a sinner. "You are one," replied the lady, "and so are all; but remember this—Jesus Christ came into the world to save sinners; and, though you should be the chief of them, He both can and will save you, if you come to Him for pardon."

Mrs. Howes ordered the boy to see that the Gipsy left the place, and then went to speak to the servants, and to caution them against suffering such people to loiter about the house.

When Jessy saw her sister Caroline and the young lady who was on a visit to them, she told all about the Gipsy, and described the poor little baby, as it was carried on its mother's back.

"'Tis the same woman," said Caroline to her friend. Her Mamma asked her what she meant, and Caroline replied that, when walking in the early part of the morning, she and Miss Wilkins had met this woman, who tried very hard to persuade them to have their fortunes told.

"And did you ask her to tell your fortune?" asked Jessy.

"No, Jessy; I knew Mamma would not approve of it; and, therefore, I refused to listen to, or stay near her."
